UNION MEETINGS IN THE OPEN AIR OUTSIDE THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, DECEMBER 19, 1859.

THE GREAT UNION MEETING AT NEW YORK.

We engrave on the preceding page the open-air meetings which were held in this city, outside the Academy of Music, on December 12; and on pages 8 and 9 the great meeting at the Academy itself.

It is hardly necessary, at the present time, to add any thing to the reports which were published of these meetings at the time. We may say, however, that they were the most enthusiastic meetings remembered in the city. The following brief memorandum, from a city paper, may be placed on record:

Long before the hour for meeting the spacious Academy was thronged from pit to dome. Even in the spacious amphitheater every seat was occupied, and throughout the house standing room within bearing distance was eagerly sought. Not less than five thousand persons were assembled within the walls, and a number perhaps equally large congregated without and listened to addresses from the street stands erected there.

The Academy had been appropriately decorated for the occasion. The Stars and Stripes hung in graceful folds about the stage, and at different points were mottoes and inscriptions, and the names of those who in the past had commanded the hearty cheers to the formation and perpetuation of the institutions of our country. Among them were the following:

"Indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts."—WASHINGTON.

"The Union must and shall be preserved."—JACKSON.

"I shall stand upon the Constitution, I need no other platform."—CLAY.

A salute of thirty-two guns was fired, and from the balcony of the Academy one branch of Dodsworth's Band discoursed their stirring music while other occupied a position on the platform within, and entertained the assemblage while it was gathering.

It would be useless to attempt to note, personally, the names of distinguished citizens present. From every profession, calling, and trade were present, with their highest representatives, and until near twelve o'clock, when the meeting adjourned, nearly all present remained, submitting to the discomforts of a crowded audience and inconvenience of elevation.

Numerous delegations of citizens from other cities were present, and participated in the enthusiasm of the occasion; and throughout, the proceedings were characterized by most perfect harmony and good feeling in favor of the subject which had called the vast assemblage together.

The meeting inside was presided over by his Honor the Mayor, who made a brief address upon assuming the chair. The preambles and resolutions were read by Mr. James Brooks; after the unanimous and clamorous approval of which, Mr. Brooks spoke briefly, defending the recitals and sentiments of the preamble and sustaining the value of the Union. Mr. Charles O'Conor followed with an able eulogy of Slavery, which was not listened to without expressions of dissatisfaction from a portion of the audience. Mr. O'Conor was succeeded by ex-Governor Hall, in a calm, conservative argument; by General John A. Dix, in a panegyric upon the Union; by Mr. James T. Brady, Professor Mitchell, and Rev. Dr. Bethune. The outside meetings were highly interesting, several speakers of distinction and popularity engaging the attention of the several groups. The meeting, upon the whole, can hardly fail to produce the salutary effect which the call contemplated.

MR. BUCHANAN'S MEXICAN POLICY.

IN the Presidential Message, from which we have given extracts elsewhere, Mr. Buchanan recommends a military occupation of Mexico, under the authority of Congress. The grounds on which the recommendation is based are, first, the numerous outrages on American citizens in Mexico, for which the government in power at the capital refuses to give any satisfaction; secondly, the insecurity of life and property in consequence of disorder on the whole boundary of the United States; and, thirdly, the assumed willingness of the Liberal party in Mexico—who are said to constitute a majority of the population—to see law and order re-established by the aid of United States troops. These grounds are solid; and the inference which from them we have drawn has been evident that nothing short of a foreign occupation would secure peace and order in Mexico.

That country exhibits the singular spectacle of a nation entirely disorganized. There are two regular governments in Mexico—the government of the priests' party, whose head is Miramon, and whose head-quarters are in the city of Mexico, and the government of the Liberals, whose head is Juarez, and whose head-quarters are at the port of Vera Cruz. Besides these, several of the States are actually independent of, and acknowledge no connection with, the federal government: in the west, Alvarez is an independent chief; in the interior of Sonora declares that he has nothing to do with Central Mexico. All these governments are supported by forced loans, outrageous exactions, plunder, and rapine. The Juarez government collects the customs duties at Vera Cruz which the Miramon government has pledged to the bond-holders, and levies duty on the staple export of Mexico—silver—is collected by Miramon in the interior, and again either day of Juarez at the port. Some of these revenues are not satisfied with collecting a mere percentage of the specie which passes through their territory. General Marquez latterly exacted from Tampico alone $100,000 in silver; and similar exploits have been performed by the Governor of Sonora. Life is as insecure as property. We illustrated, only the other day, the murder of Consul Black, of Tampico, an American citizen, by order of General Marquez; the massacre of the Americans at Tacubaya, and the imprisonment of Mr. Forsyth. Every mail from Mexico brings accounts of some American citizen being insulted, outraged, imprisoned, and robbed by one or other of the parties in power. Meantime, every month without being robbed once or more: equally impossible to obtain any satisfaction from the authorities, or to take any vengeance on the robbers. Thirds in of course will be the end, and the money which citizens of the United States have advanced for the prosecution of various enterprises is either lost or gravely funded. Our frontiers are unsafe; on the Rio Grande, Cortinas and his bandits besiege Brownsville; American citizens in Arizona are constantly molested by Mexican marauders from Sonora—not long since four sick men, in a house on American soil, were murdered by Mexicans from that State. As to the transit routes—to the sea, at common law, our citizens would be entitled were Mexico and the United States private individuals—they are all closed. The Tehuantepec route is shut to our citizens: and Arizona is likewise deprived of its only exit—Guaymas.

In a word, there is ample cause for war between the United States and Mexico. But if there were no direct casus belli, or injury to avenge, civilization and good neighborship would still impose on the United States the duty of doing what in them lay to restore peace and order to distracted, disorganized Mexico.

We have pictured that country as it is. There is no room for a foreign occupation. The radical trouble in Mexico is that no Government has the means to support itself and put down its enemies. The Church has seized so much of the productive property of the country that what is left is too poor to afford a revenue to the State: in a country incessantly disturbed by civil war and infested by bandits there is of course very little foreign trade, and the revenue from customs is small; when the interest, or a part of the interest, on the foreign debt has been paid, there is nothing left to support the standing armies, without which peace and order can not be maintained. Santa Anna contrived to maintain himself for a longer period than usual by selling territory to the United States, and supporting an army with the proceeds of the sale. Every other Mexican chief has gone to pieces on the inevitable rock—want of money. There was at one time a hope that Miramon, who is a young man, not devoid of ability, would realize his position, turn the tables on the Church, which raised him to power, and follow Comonfort's example by seizing enough Church property to support an army. But he seems to have lacked nerve; hence, he not only suffers the ports of entry to remain in the hands of his opponents, but submits to the exactions of bandits within a few miles of the capital, and allows the arsenals to become common robbers and pickpockets.

Mr. M'Lane has lately concluded a treaty with the Juarez Government, by which the United States engage, for four million dollars, a perpetual right of way across Tehuantepec and across Sonora to Guaymas—with the right of protecting their passengers by an armed occupation. It is likely that this treaty would answer all the requisite purposes; as an armed occupation of the Tehuantepec route would be used solely and only to invade Mexico from the heart of Mexico, and the garrison, by United States troops, of such points as would command that country.

It now remains to be seen whether the Senate will ratify the M'Lane Treaty, and Congress will act upon the recommendations of the President. We have before said that the feeling runs so high that the Republicans in Congress are quite likely to refuse to do the right thing for fear Mr. Buchanan might get the credit of it. It is a fact, moreover, that in our history the Democrats are the only party that has ever had a foreign policy. The Federalists, it is true, and the Republicans have always fallen short of the requirements of the country in this respect: however sound many of their domestic measures may have been, they have never been successful in dealing with foreign countries. It is possible, and even probable, therefore, that the wise and prudent recommendations of the President in regard to Mexico may lead to no practical result—in which case civilization, peace, law, and order will suffer notable injury.

OUR NATIONAL BANKRUPTCY.

By the showing of the Secretary of the Treasury the income of the United States falls short of the expenditure by thirty millions of dollars. This amount is borrowed from capitalists, who are to pay for the service of Government. How long is this to last?

The United States are the only country in the world whose income is dependent on the precarious and fluctuating resource of foreign trade. All other countries raise a revenue primarily and fairly from their people honestly for the expenses of Government. Our financiers have never had the pluck to face the question, and to tell the people of the United States: If you want a sixty million Government, tax yourselves to pay for it.

The President, seeing the impossibility of getting on with the present system,—he levied by the tariff of 1857—is quite as much as people ought to pay on the goods they require from abroad; and, besides, the slavery question has for the present so completely eclipsed the tariff, that there is very little chance of the latter being seriously considered.

There is a great name in store for the financier who shall have the courage and the sagacity to undertake a thorough reform of our financial system, so as to render the public revenue independent of the fluctuations of trade. Sooner or later we shall come to this. It is absurd to expect that this great country will go on forever alternating between bankruptcy and plethora, when a direct tax might be levied with so little inconvenience and so much fairness. Where is the claimant for this post of fame?

REMBRANDT PEALE'S "COURT OF DEATH."

MESSRS. SARONY, MAJOR, AND KNAPP have brought out a fine engraving of Rembrandt Peale's "Court of Death," painted in colors, at the extremely low price of one dollar. Such a picture was never before afforded at so low a figure, and we presume the sale will be large.

THE LOUNGER.

THEY SAY.

Do they, indeed; and who are they? What is this tyrant which rules so much private peace and public fame? They say that Deacon Dodder was seen coming home late Saturday night in such a state! Drunk? Oh, I don't know. I am sure I know nothing; but they do say that he was about the crankiest man in town last evening. They say that his wife was sitting at home crying her eyes out. Poor thing! and only married last June. It's really time that they say she wishes she had never been married; and that her uncle Timothy vows he will never give her a cent, because they say that his cousin Joshua heard him say that he had no money to spare to buy grog for Deacon Dodder.

Poor Deacon Dodder! who all this time is just as honest and sober a man as Cousin Joshua, or Uncle Timothy, or any body else; and against whom They Say has leveled his darts because he chances to be the most convenient target.

The French tell the truth about They Say. The French have a proverb that They Say is a liar; and the French are right. This sly, malicious, insidious snake, that crawls and squirms all over fair fames and pure characters, he is a liar, and the father of lies. Of course he is a perfectly irresponsible. What They Say does work, whether you find it to be true or untrue. You may prove Deacon Dodder to be as sober as Father Taylor, the most sober and honest of men. But the air tainted by They Say is poisoned air, and whoever has breathed it, though but for a moment, has inhaled death. The bride weeping for her dead husband may day her eyes when she finds him living; but you can not dry the tears that have been shed. The child, frightened at night, may be comforted and his fears removed; but who shall console the fathers that died in fear before the cruel curse? They Say may be proved the blackest of liars, but the proof does not blunt the point of the sting which it forever envenomed.

Don't suffer him in your house. Don't give him the hospitality of your conversation. If any body tries to introduce They Say, hustle him away—lug if he knows what he is doing. Whatever is told you upon the authority of They Say reject at once—sir, I mean still, sing to it, and know how false and futile it is. For, even if the thing be true, you will be sure to find it utterly cold—sure to find it so grieving all over with neglect and malignity as to be another thing altogether.

If a man lived in a tower over a beautiful city swarming with busy men and women, and teeming with lovely children, and night and day, in his lofty chamber, he were distilling poison from marsh flowers and garden vegetables and noble trees, which he secretly infused into the air, and, by his wicked machinery, drove into the streets and houses, so that the people breathed the corruption, and slowly and mysteriously withered and died—what a criminal he would be—but how would he be stormed through history!

Yet every body who gives aid and comfort to They Say, by repeating his stories, is really helping that poisoner in the lofty tower—is really distilling death for the busy men and women and the lovely children. They Say is a monster behind which envy and jealousy stab. It is a secret mine which is lighted by a slow match from a distance, and explodes only after the criminal who put the fire to it has escaped. "They Say" is an anonymous letter, spoken, not written.

HOLIDAY STORIES.

SINCE Dickens began to write Christmas stories the holiday season has returned. One of the best services to literature none is more eagerly and generally recognized than the introduction of the annual story which comes with the merry holytide of the year. Since he has been the editor of a periodical, as now for several years he has been, he has always had separate stories for each, but stories with a jolly company, and they sing, in chorus, "God rest ye, merry gentlemen!"

What a rich, deep, genial music rolls out of the batch of stories he and his friends tell! There is an undertow of sweet human sympathy which betrays the master, as the season and the holy spirit as anti-Puritan as the music of the Miserere; and as characteristically English as plum-pudding and ale. The genial geniality, manifesting itself externally in good cheer; and pictures of overflowing hampers and rosy-cheeked maidens and eager children and jolly coachmen and village churches hung with green, all belong to it, and all recall its image when they are seen.

When Mr. Dickens surrounds himself in his new periodical with a group of well known friends, and they pour out a series of tales about an old haunted house in Household Words it is published in an extra. Dickens himself introduces the series with several delicious stories of humor, and even contributions are there and most fanciful, like the ringing of fairy chimes. The little sketch of the boy Jeff Harmon is as exquisite as that of the two children who were married, in the series of two years ago. The delicate blending of the loneliest sadness with the most boisterous and limiting actuality of which the impression is an inevitable pathos, shows how true and lovely a genius it is. Mrs. Gaskell's story is a homely domestic tragedy, full of power and skill. Sala's is exceedingly humorous, a capital conceit of an aged peasant, all his dreams of happiness from being taken for chronic drunkenness. Wilkie Collins's sketch of pirate horrors, full of sharp interest and exciting expectation, and Adelaide Procter's poem, with the love tale by another woman's hand, rounding out the Christmas circle and series.

There is just enough incoherence to carry out the idea of a Twelfth Night picnic in the old haunted house. The ghosts come gliding out of experience, and, like all other ghosts, are no spirits at all, but good, honest, often melancholy, always romantic, facts of private history.

BENJAMIN HARRIS AND HIS WIFE PATIENCE.

CHAPTER I.—THE MERCERS' GARDENS.

SOMEWHERE about the close of the reign of King Charles the Second, on a fine night in summer, there was a pretty sprinkling of company in the Mercers' Gardens.

One of the walkers, who wore a Whig's green bonnet and ribbons at his breast, was a young, comely man, though his air was unconsciously severe, and his level brow was cumbered with much thought and care. He was Benjamin Harris, a printer by trade.

The young man did not care to be waylaid and drawn aside by the juvenile promenaders, and he went at last absently and unwillingly along with a company which contained mistress and maids, one of whose members called upon him to help to form an escort; for it was not altogether safe for a flock of women, unless well guarded, to traverse these cool alleys in the twilight. Chance led, him to offer his escort to one of the prettiest of the maidens—Mistress Patience Chiswell, one of the daughters of Mr. Chiswell, the carver and gilder, in Lombard Street. Master Harris really did not know very well how to begin to assure Mrs. Patience, though he was by no means stupid; so, in place of unfolding his paria in paying her the compliments of the day, and courting her smiles, he kept glancing aside at her as she tripped by his side, and by dint of noticing her much more than he would have otherwise done, or than he at one found time and inclination to do to other young women, he began to wonder, Puritan as he was, what there was that filled the heart, or lightened the pies swayed the spirit of this bright, fragile piece of humanity.

Mrs. Patience was very young, fresh, and fearless, and a little loquacious withal, as is the way with simply little heads and hearts. Not that Patience was absolutely ignorant, shallow, or witless; but she was one of the many green olive branches round a very busy man's table, where the elders were well-meaning, but commonplace and easy, and the young were very thoughtless and a little selfish, and at the same time as guileless in their faults and foibles as lads and lasses can be in this evil world.

Mrs. Patience had the loveliest bow of a rosy mouth, and a pair of the most strangely sensible gray eyes. She wore the modest apparel of a merchant's daughter, the dissenumbered but fresh, the neat linen, the hand-made for a covering; but, gravating Mrs. Patience's crimson and white colors, and her pretty ears perfectly honorant, she wore not a fan, which Master Harris deemed frivolous, and she prattled, which was a far more hopeless and heinous sin. She told him of a new sermon she had found in crossing the Strand and Snow Hill after the last rain, and she asked him if he ever went a-sparking to gather the nuts with which Holburn was still renowned, though sure they were only to be got in private gardens now. London would come to be too crabbed for young folk who must have play, and plain folks who had no fine grounds of their own; and then she wondered to the Lord Mayor the King's dead, and the last fine maggot, who would not suffer them to go there on account of the wild courtiers, but for her part she was not afraid. What could any one say to her? They would but take off their hats and laugh, and challenge her, and she would courtesy and run away, and they would have chase, she was fleet of foot and would soon escape them.

Master Harris bent his eyes on the ground, and asked his companion, was this little lass so giddy or so unprepared for offenses, or was she bold?

Of a sudden, as the staid young vendor of shovelfodge musing, there were but by no sudden outcry in the streets—a loud and riotous uproar which it was scarcely possible for quiet women to face, and which even Puritan gentlemen might deem it had been excused for shrinking from at that particular date. And upon the tranquil scene arose shrill, excited, incensed, appalled. Patience Chiswell gripped Harris's arm and shrieked outright.

"It is Whitehall," she groaned through her chattering teeth, "and they spare neither man, woman, nor child in their frolics. The good Lord have mercy on us!"

Harris had some difficulty in convincing her, what his cool judgment and better view enabled him to endure, that the hand streaming out of the entrance without attempting to invade the precincts was not one of those dissolute troops of squires and noblemen who once or twice a week in the least beat and bruised members of the resisting middle class, overcoming them by sheer force of numbers, and frightening honest women into fits by their fierce, unholy caresses.

"You should not have boasted of your confidence before you had been tried, Mrs. Patience," said Harris, reproving her, bluntly but gently, for the shuddering girl touched his manhood.

Patience gave her head. "I meant to defy them in broad day, and plenty of people by, and they only after their morning draughts. Indeed I could not but said he mightily afraid when the Scourers are abroad in the dusk, and the greater part of the city is under their own roofs."

"Nay, I have no objection to your better wits in bounds. I love not that women should be rash and fearless," answered Harris, "but I am studying to ascertain whether or no he had a right to offer an opinion. "I can decipher from where I stand that the whole affair is about a wrangling, excited orange-woman, whom Dr. Bates, or Dugdale, or Turberville, may suspect of dealings with the Pope and the Pretender and the devil and whom they confound along the kennel to prison and to judgment;" and young Harris looked gloomy and oppressed.

Patience Chiswell, taking comfort for her own safety, honor, and happiness, glanced up in his face to be more fully reassured, and felt her sympathies immediately drawn away in a new channel.

"Will no one save her?" she whispered. "She may not be guilty. She may not be so bad as she seemeth. I doubt me she is a light creature, by reason of her pursuing such a trade; yet she may have poor, honest friends, who care for her. Alas! the miserable wench is to be ducked, to be branded, to be hung! Deny, good Sir, for the sake of God, whom I am certain you fear, in the name of other women who are not come, will thou not speak a word in this sinner's cause?"

In proportion as Harris hated and waged war with sin, he had a soft, tender heart, and he was powerfully affected by this instance of a foolish young girl's trembling, spontaneous, earnest mercy, the more so that he could not act upon it, as she would have demanded of him, at a risk she little guessed. He was forced to explain to her that he could not abandon her, no light creature, but a modest, inexperienced girl, to traverse the disturbed streets, in order that he might carry aid to any other person, whatever their state; and on his single voice and arm would avail nothing against the authorities, with whom a mean orange-woman, after Stafford and Pluckett, was nothing. Since he saw the culprit pinioned by some of the town's servants and the may's own men, she would certainly have lain in her sentence, and what more could she ask, unless she were so unreasonable as to expect justice?

He finally carried his point of putting agitated Patience Chiswell into a backwater, out of the swirling most considerately and good-humorously by the bearers as far as her father's door in Lombard Street, returning to the scene of the above his sleep. He could not deny the subsequent fact—though it discounted him greatly to admit it, even to himself, and he endeavored to silence aloud his conscience and clink the new sensation—that the image of the carver and gilder's frank, transparent, light-headed little daughter, with all of a nob den distressed and pitiful, would make his calm, serious heart beat.

CHAPTER II.—CHEPE.

To those who have experience in human nature it will not be a marvel to learn that within a twelvemonth from the evening recorded in the last chapter, Benjamin Harris, the young printing printer, wedded the spinster Patience Chiswell, and that, notwithstanding she had no present portion, beyond her wedding-clothes, one of Master Guy's tibbs, a copy of pious songs from Mistress Lucy, and a maid-of-all-work from her mother.

To those who have been long in contact with the pages of pure and high hearts, neither will it seem strange to be told that, after a time, a supressed a Patience having been accommodating enough to take a lively fancy and a trustful liking to his own virtues. Patience, Puritan though she was, imbibed the young printer's lofty sentiments, because the most devoted of his disciples, and echoed his paths of life, and his hatred of the delicate womanly chords and subtle variations. Master Chiswell, her father, took no part with the aggravated Cavaliers of the time, but Archbishop and a State and Church man, employed under noble patronage.

Harris, rigid in duty, stern toward himself, proved notably indulgent to Patience, to the verge of unreasonness, even perversely protecting and standing for, almost against her husband's will, fusing to allow her to share his troubles, and insisting upon taking upon himself all the toil, all the risk, all the responsibility. Harris was not deeply conscious that his lot was likely to be clouded; he was aware, to a certain extent, of the signs of gloom in the political sky, and of the harshness which injuries had sealed, and double sealed, on his sect. He did not try to check these tendencies as far as he honestly could, because, but he was, with some excuse, perhaps, morbidly anxious to spare Patience—since he understood and valued her, and could not reciprocate her love—the young, healthy, spirited, genial tempered, unbroken wife, was a bright being indeed to the wrangling, saddened husband—the very sunshine of his existence, whose warmth, radiance, and gladness should be preserved at all hazards, except that of sin. There was cowardice bound up in Harris's love and temporizing with his proselytism.

So Harris fell into an error; was nervously, sedulously attentive to his wife's comfort and pleasure, because he knew that Patience, neglected, guarded her from all rough but invigorating shocks, denied her reasonable work, fatigue, and disappointment, put a premium to her love upon his natural disposition and education to procure for her flowers, cates, and even a subdued kind of luxury, and to bear down with a high hand resentments at Master Chiswell's, Mrs. Lucy's, and other relatives and friends and neighbors, most of them totally distasteful to his wife, and which, or less burdensome, taken as a task, and fulfilled without a chance of exemption.

In all this Harris showed himself what he was, a noble and self-denying heart with a remarkable aptitude for getting rid of narrow prejudices and unreliable, when his mind was brought into with the charities and tenderesses of his daily life; but he did not display much worldly wisdom, or a Puritan's bold, shrewd likelihood in composing and confounding female weaknesses.

Patience, like every child of Adam similarly situated, was ungrateful for his fatherly, raised to be governed by this half-and-half system, could not see why, because Harris ordained it, secretly resisted the artificial atmosphere which he had set, and hankered in her inmost soul after that of which he had first given her a taste, the natural, unconscious, effort; she grew pensive, formal, restless, without being permitted to betray her state of mind, took refuge in the most unsuitable whims which flout about all recently awakened souls, and can be grasped at any moment; and, oh! grievous mystery in family history, she secretly loved by him, was breaking from all near commission or true partnership with him.

Patience eyes filled with tears of envy—poor, energetic, earnest woman—when she saw what others were permitted to accomplish, what she might never attempt, in the way of active, serviceable herself, so as to be more worthy of him. She would have so liked to help him in the duties he had taught her, to go before him in the dangers, if it was no trite to propagate their faith under these fines and imprisonments, Rumsey and West witnesses, and Jeffrey judgment.

One morning she sat in the window of her sitting-room, with her hymns and her songs unpractised, her embroidery foiled and entangled; dark and abstracted as Benjamin Harris least liked to see her, as it pricked him to the heart to find her.

Patience had seen little of her husband for the last few days: he was unusually engrossed with business, and had been obliged to depart on a little journey without informing her of its import, although he had come in and embraced her affectionately in his usual way, and left a mark on his cheek and a stammer on his tongue. Afterward he had sent her a little note dated from his coffee-house, urging her, in place of living lonesome, to pay a visit to Mistress Lucy Sands, who was presumed to receive her and amuse her with the last new prints and women's recipes; because her worthy father, with whom she was aware he was so unhappy as not to agree, was not a proper person, as far as he had rounded him, disposed to accept his daughter's company for a week or so, with the entire comfort and familiarity which he regarded as the due of his honored wife, to whom he was forced to bid a brief but reluctant farewell.

Patience was not greatly enlightened or charmed by this communication of her husband, clearly as it indicated his concern for her. It was an annoyance, a provocation.

Still he could not think that she was very sulky or actually rebellious: she obeyed the injudicious mandate, entering her hackney-chair and forwarding her baskets and boxes the moment a messenger arrived for her.

She bore as long as she was able the aggravations of Mrs. Lucy's pointedly affectionate attentions, and her mother's doting way of staring at her, and shaking her head, and being told over and over again, "Please, madam, it is young Mrs. Benjamin Harris, who knows nothing of older folks' cares and pains, and whom dear Mr. Harris has intrusted to us to be looked after and kept cheerful."

At last, something impelled Patience to be naughty and disobedient, and quitting up early one morning, she stole a march upon Mrs. Lucy—who was a little of a sluggard—ere she betook herself to the haunts of her father (whose shops were the public libraries) and her dainty desk. Patience thinks her father with a porringer of sops, left a message that she had gone abroad to see a new sight or people, and would be back before nightfall, and started all alone for Lombard Street.

Really Patience was so perverse that she felt excited and elated by the rare sense of solitude, and the feeling of freedom and danger as she walked away in her hat and mantle, without the mask, which the court ladies adopted largely for the creditable purpose that they were true, but with the old decent muffler, in remembrance of her husband's scruples, drawn over her round chin and up to her nose, which she might have said she have been drawn hard and still. There seemed already many people abroad, and they were hurrying to their work or their watch, to where there were aggravated instance of exposure and contumely by command of the lords or magistrates of the city.

Patience entered Lombard Street in good spirits, passed rapidly through her father's shop, with its sculptured figures and its hundreds of gilding, its huge carved testers and waved canopies, and entered suddenly into the Chiswells' back parlor, brimming full of mirrors and burnished gilding by its tessellated floor in the style of the master of the house, and dispensing with a foot-cloth.

Patience found in the kitchen before bolping to cook the mid-day dinner, or putting the sleeping-rooms in order, or even painting some of the simpler screens which her father furnished; her brothers were at school, or in the working booths, or abroad attending to orders, but her father and brother and the men were engaged in close conversation. They both stooped and stared, Patience hoisted because she had not been home recently, or in relation to an ill-jointed interference which Chiswell had taken upon him to make in Harris's concerns—but the two men, the Puritan members, bowending ways to Churchmen and courtiers. However, Patience took the silence and amazement at her appearance for granted, and, after she had rushed to her cheeks when, to her consternation and bewilderment, her mother commenced to cry and wring her hands, and disorder her cool head, ruff and stiff skirts; and little round-eyed Master Chiswell arose so abruptly, that he burst half the trusses of his breeches, as he had just tied very, and addressed her in the most perturbed, incoherent, aggrieved fashion:

"Dear Mrs. Harris, you may bear me witness I did not press an alliance with this fellow Harris: it was your own free choice, and I think, having made it, it is dishonorable in you to come, and so implicating your poor friends and connections, and causing detriment and destraction to the innocent. However, I am grieved to see you softly injure," he added, in the tone of a man put upon and compelled to be publicist-spirit; "that is, if I can mend up it, and I shall not be your wrong-headed goodman did aver that he would shelter you from all hate, and that you should incur no harm. For that matter, though I am a Churchman, and free enough to stick to him, and ruin his business, and even to injure my own—feel that he was not to do all to avoid it!—there are no orders given for mutilation, and he may have hope, which he scarce deserves, to catch his own house again in safety this very night."

"Oh, Patience, Patience, my girl! to remember you might have been drowned in wood-encumbered in Surrey, and been respected and exalted. And I declare how well you did look in your pea-green pompeyron, with your hair powdered and your top-knot before that villain rendered you grave and thin with his homilies and his treason," relented Mrs. Chiswell.

"I do not understand you," answered Patience. "Master Harris hath done no ill (that I should even hint to him) to the King. It is certain I would have wedded none but he. He is but gone from home on business, if that be the accident at which your words aim."

"Oh, the misguided child! the infatuated, misguided child!" cried both the women perverse, who were sometimes cunning, sometimes impulsive, but whose instinct it was to intervene with whatever information they contained. "Do you not know?—Have you not heard?" (Talking each other down in their eagerness to divulge the count which affected her most.) "Benjamin Harris has been arraigned before the justices for a libel on the Test Act, published within his premises." "He had but received the officers in the shop, when he stepped up and took leave of her in a common way.) "He had the audacity to tell the bench that, though he had not put one objectionable word in type, he expected nothing in his favor, because Pilkington, the Lord Mayor, was fined so heavily for no other reason than that he refused to congratulate the Duke, and Ward was accused of perjury merely because he could not find a thousand men to swear with him in which Pilkington declined the ceremony. Then Harris and his cousin Janeways were sentenced to the Fleet, where he would be a minstrel for they did not extract the jail-fever, and poison a whole city ward when they came out. Where was their regard for the public in this? And, to-day, they were to stand in a pillory in Cheape for four mortal hours, to the shame of all who had any thing to do with them; and it was because enough to slaughter Paris to have been seen in Lombard Street that morning for Master Chiswell himself to be suspected, seized, and set in the stocks, when the family business and court interest—greatly damaged already—would go to stitch and staves, and they would all perish."

"Ah!" said poor dear sister mismatched, Patience, "represented her mother, piteously and repeatedly. "Sirs! how their fortunes may be wrecked by such accidents at this time!"

"Better smuzzled and dashed in their hopes, though they have to work their fingers to the bone, than buckled to enthusiasts and Master Anastic" roared Chiswell, virulently.

Patience had stood dumb, becoming very white and very cold, but with her gray eyes lightening and clearing. When she began to speak she had the answer then on her various allegations.

"No shame to any one, father! Benjamin Harris is not framed of the stuff which creates infamy. For God's sake, father, tell me the exact sum that Benjamin Harris hath borrowed your countenance. Nay, now, you will forgive me if I am frank. I will not rest to injure my sisters, mother—particularly when Benjamin calls me elsewhere."

"It was cruel in him," said Patience, as she traversed the street again with the footman, about she could summon at her imperious bidding; "it was cruel in him ever to conceal his pains, and suffer me to grow merry, but now that he has done me this wrong I will conquer him."

She went the direct road to Cheape, pushing her way through the mob—always prompt and aid, always more fired with expectation and perilous excitement—and sitter in the thoroughfare rose the stage pressed against by the van of the rabble, and enchoursed by a roar of senseless approbation. There rose the pillory, and there, seated in arm-chairs, with their necks fastened in the iron collars, sat Harris and Janeways (in their respectable suits somewhat the squalor of which they had quitted, their plain bands giving them the air of divines, their high-crowned hats, their belts and the shoulder-knots of their rapiers, and belted them from bullies and cut-throats hired by his Grace of Monmouth—he who wore the purple on the left side of the prince—to raise a cry (or at so humble a rascal as a prayer) to be gazed at, hooted, pelted with filth and rough enough missiles, till their cheeks were weary and their whole body the simple, beautiful, grand, blue summer sky contrasting with the jumble of buildings and people, the human heads, the dark and the gay gorgeous scene below. There, with those dark, serene, sagacious faces, whose power we study in many a brown picture, their hands clasped and their heads bare divided in the middle, and allowed only to fall back in a wave from the broad brows, the brave men sat and submitted to be insulted and grasped at them, thoughtless, licentious men mocked at them, enemies who were not even, but their firmness did not falter.

"Give us back our mayor's daughter, and some our merry footings on the grass, unless you want to see us all in a row swing at Tyburn."

"What! my men," remonstrated Harris, bending down to them, and speaking in his clear, distinct, penetrating voice in its gravity, "we wanted to give you bread from heaven."

"Shut his mouth; gag him; lop him; the whining, canting rogue—the Lord or [illegible] me!" burst in scarlet, foaming fury from a large, swollen, towering figure on the cubikris.

It was the famous Tory editor, Sir Roger, notorious for his shrewdness, his unscrupulousness, his want of scholarship and style, and his indecent violence, save in his bow-bender Dr. Bernet and Scelley, and their trains, turn and aim their sneers at the pillory, and call them, individually and concurtously upon them, till these resolved brains begin to reel, and these stout hearts to sicken, at the utterness of their humiliation.

"Let me in; I know one of the prisoners. I pray you suffer me to pass forward," said Patience, in her gentle, middle-class appeared, with her young, open, feeling, refined gentlewoman's face; and she spoke on till she was hoarse, never giving way to exhaustion, though nearly carried off her feet, or to keen sorrow and burning indignation at the insults.

Happily for Patience, with the half-careless good-humor which, thank Heaven! is wont to temper the brutality of all but the most depressed crowds, the apprentices, hikmen, small tradesmen, curious or sorry women, as well as the more substantial and honorable representatives of the community, after venting sundry scurrilous jests on the persistence with which the women stuck to the convertsicks, and the Puritans, were inclined to admit her claims, and hustled her on to the very front of the platform. Still Harris, who was somewhat in the closest man's heart and who was relieving himself by looking up into the cloudless air, did not observe her, and his presence intervened between Patience and the scope of Janways's vision.

"I pray you, Sir, suffer me to mount beside the prisoners: put me up with them; I am one of them," declared Patience to the officer.

Now these officers, who were some of them relics of the Protector's servants, had no great stomach for such a duty as they were in the act of performing. Patience's request was out of order, and, at the same time, a moderately kindly man, of a little more than official principle, saw a respectable, delicate young woman in a sad strait, liable to be trodden under foot, or perhaps, in her present grief, to be spirited away and misused by the reckless and abandoned.

"It was not mooted by the magistrates; however there is no statute against it;" and so, gruffly in his perplexity, but far from barbarously, the officer assisted Patience to ascend the scaffolding to a station behind her husband's chair, confronting the concourse.

Then Harris discovered her—the young girl, his much cherished wife—standing by his side in the disgrace of the pillory.

"Good Lord!" he cried, driven from his moderation of speech, "how came you here, Patience? Why did Mrs. Lucy permit you to stay? O Lord, this is indeed anguish!"

But she looked back in the face, only panting with her toil, and, while a bright red color swept over the paleness of her fatigue, uttered something that sounded like a sigh of relief, and said, with a little echo of exultation, "I have found you out, Benjamin."

He stared in wonder and doubt.

"It will kill you. Oh! how can I save you?"

Patience reasoned with him.

"Hush, Benjamin, do not be faithless. I thank God I found you out."

Then Benjamin Harris understood his wife, and was comforted for his trial, and blessed her with a mighty blessing.

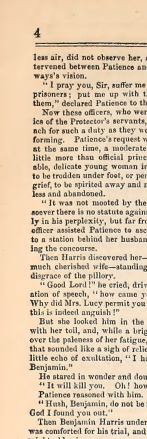
Sir Roger named the woman by a foul epithet, and demanded that she should be expelled from her post, and there were signs of contention among the by-standers. Harris's lips quivered.

"She is my wife," he said, appealingly. "Brethren, you have accused me of other thefts. Answer me this question: Have I taken from you one of your wives?"

"No, master, you are guiltless there," admitted a straightforward voice, whose owner was not very widely removed from righteousness. "Whatever scurvy tricks you've played us, we own you yield that game to the debauched cavaliers."

"No credit to you; your own is good enough," another growled out—an irrestrainable compliment.

Harris heard it, and a smile that showed sweet glimmered over the care on his face. From that moment no further opposition was attempted to Patience's intrusion; and it was observable that, though railing was still vented, it was now delivered only by the shortly senseless and abusive rullers, and all flights of gross and offensive material were either fearfully intermitted or cautiously directed wide of the pair.



Sir Roger, with a curse, strode away to some fresh oppression: the courtiers became silent in contemplation, yawned, and prepared to go in search of a lighter diversion, but, with their marvelous versatility, one or two of the professed revealers, ere they departed, lit at their hats without a jest to the loyalty on that scaffold.

"They have confiscated our goods, too, dear Patience, beyond what I can ever hope to retrieve," Harris informed her, whiling away the tedious ordeal by passing discourse; "and I have thoughts of sailing to the Americas, where a man may pursue his calling in peace, and peradventure in prosperity. I was minded to leave you in England till I was settled; but look not on me so wistfully—I will carry you with me now, though we should lie on the deck or in the forest, and built our hut with our own hands, for I have found you out." And Patience raised her head, as if he had clothed her with honor.

As the time wore past, the declining sun shot a beam through the houses, which dazzled Harris's eyes; he could not shift his position, and being in a degree spent in body and mind, and exhausted with previous confinement and sadness, he could not resist wincing and looking faint as he encountered this last drop in his cup.

Patience unfolded her muffler, advanced a step, and flung it skillfully across the balustrade, so as to succeed in screening her husband's face. The officer interposed: he durst not see the least interference with the frame-work of the blessed pillory—no, not with a rib or spar of its skeleton—but his resistance was greeted with such a hum of dissent and murmur of anger that he relinquished his purpose, and did not detain the kerchief.

Nay, when the prisoners were at length released from their so-called ignominy, and formally set at liberty, with a command to shun their presses, as the apostles were bidden close their mouths, and Harris was detected, with his wife under his arm, hieing home, as fast as his cramps would admit, to

IN THE MERCERS' GARDENS.

Gracechurch Street, actually a brief cheer greeted their ears, so irrational as well as uncouth was the old burden they had borne.

CHAPTER III.—THE NEW WORLD, AND BACK AGAIN TO OLD GRACECHURCH STREET FOR GOOD.

BENJAMIN HARRIS and his wife Patience crossed the Atlantic, beyond which Scotch Covenanters and French Huguenots were fain to wander. They reached that America which was still in its vastness virgin soil, but in which townsteads and meeting-houses and governors' mansions were fast rising in many quarters. There harried at one of those youthful log-built cities, among the pumpkin-beds and bean-stalks, and closing around them in the distance the shades of the great forest from which the chinky Indian, with his war-paint and his poisoned arrows, stalked and traded warily with the settlers, and through which John Eliot journeyed to reach the tribes with the sword of the Spirit and the shield of faith. There stood their own miniature gables round the centre chimney and the shingled roof-tree, beneath which they took up their abode, while Benjamin Harris easily established his trade among the intellectual wants of the thoughtful population.

At first the Harrises attracted considerable attention from the magnates of the place; but they were soon suffered to drop into obscurity, save among a few extravagant eccentrics, or humble-minded fools, when it was on record that, in spite of all their trials, they were so weak, or had been so corrupted, as to preach by their experiences and loose in their disciples. Then Benjamin Harris was left to reprint his forbidden English books—his Baxter, Howe, and beloved Milton, with the many charters and missives already in request; to cultivate his garden, and bring in wild plants and wild birds; to ponder and hold converse with his dear wife Patience, the children torn to them, and the few congenial spirits who adhered to them—and grew well-to-do, and bland too, and joxes in his works and his amusements, before a rival rose to supersede him, by the charm involved in the preservation of fierce denunciations.

"Good wife," owned Harris, one day, after he had been listening long to the chattering and warbling of some feathered favorites, "I must think that God has also ordained singing men and singing women to express mere human sympathies, and instinctive gladness, in addition to deliberate thanksgiving, which part no man disputes. I will not assail the class again, though, alas! many was miserably wanton; just as I have had objections to summing up the arguments against the smoker's weed here, after I once saw how it cooled down Governor Hawley's intemperate heat, which might have been the destruction of the whole state."

"Why, it seemeth to me that you have been always merciful, Benjamin, save to yourself and the boys when froward," alleged Patience.

"I would be a craven to spare myself and my own flesh and blood; but the lads understand me, think you not, Patience?"

"I fear they regard you before the minister; even Sam, who, you say, is upright, but tempted to doggedness."

"And they regard you, Patience, the most of them, GOOD."

Patience plaited the curtain of her matronly hood round a face fuller and fairer than in her youth, though she had been always, in what she would have called her graceless days, a woman of a sweet good favor, and she smiled sunnily.

"I do not say so, and yet you may give me our sons, Benjamin—our tall, active sons—for you know you have the chief share in the hearts of our foolish daughters."

"Tush, not foolish, Patience, women; free from care, and, perchance, slow of thought yet a while, though swift of feeling; but modest, and maidenly, and docile, and children of many prayers."

"I know not why it is, Benjamin, but the sons do always in some respect belong most to the mother—the daughters to the father."

"Because the daughters be the pictures of the good-wife, and the sons be the marrows of the goodman."

Yes, Patience, who had grown grave with her young husband (what he had not bargained for), was wise and happy in adopting his new humor as indefatigably. In truth, the wife and mother, promoted to her just dignity, regained her lost health and cheer, and was as contented and bright as she was laborious and untiring.

BENJAMIN HARRIS AND MASTER RICHARD CROMWELL.

The news, salted by months on shipboard, had long age reached the Puritans that another king reigned in England in the room of the vain and forbidding sons of the "Man Charles;" that toleration was proclaimed, and the fetters on men's consciences and liberties forever broken. So the Harrises returned to the old business, to the old house in Gracechurch Street.

They came again in joy where they went out weeping; dwelt in London under Anne; walked with their children in the Mercers' Gardens, and were not frightened or ashamed to show them where the pillory was reared in Cheapside; and, beyond upon it, Benjamin Harris found space and time for his curious plumed pots, his seeds, his sapling trees in pots, his creepers for porches, tulipomies, and terraces, besides his collection of battered black-letter volumes, and his ragged manuscripts; while Patience had her china closet, containing, among its valuables, some barbarous quill-work, and a few tufted heads of gorgeous feathers.

Benjamin Harris and his wife were not people of quality, nor did they let loose their principles more than righteousness warranted, so that they were not likely to frequent auctions and masquerades; but Benjamin humored his young daughters once by tucking them tightly under each arm, and standing in a door-way near Burlington House, somewhat sheltered from the crowd of sedans, linkboys, and general spectators, to watch the company pass into one of those fashionable and perilous diversions. As he kept his ground, with his grave, manly face, and his modest but eager pair, a country gentleman by the cut of his square coat, and the full hose tied at the knee, which had gone out as far back as King Charles, eyed Harris carefully, and as if satisfied with the investigation, taking off his three-cornered hat, begged meekly to be allowed to occupy a place near him and his party. The stranger was attended by a young daughter, and he wished that rustic folks like them might enjoy the gayety with more comfort and safety than exposed to the pressure and restlessness of the people.

Benjamin readily assented, and made way for the petitioner, an old man with a very homely, kindly cast of countenance, his beard close shaven, and in place of a periwig his own hair of a silvery whiteness, which no powder could emulate, and "my daughter Dorothy," a buxom, barn-door lass, with such a demure hood as her mother and grandmother might have worn before her.

The younger members of the little company were soon familiar, and the seniors conversed in a friendly way. The squire, or vicar, as he could only be, commenting on the weather with an earnestness that was scarcely in keeping with the vicinity of Bow-bell, and remarking that it was a rare fine season for the hay crop.

"I perceive your heart is in your rural domain, Sir," says Benjamin, with a slight smile.

"Where better?" asks the gentleman, simply; "it hath been there this many a year, since it was a sore-burdened heart within the precincts of Whitehall. Nay, I do not need to hide it now, I am Oliver Cromwell's son, Master Richard."

Harris started unfeignedly and removed his hat, but Master Richard declined the compliment.

"I receive only neighborly tokens of good-will, and I will be glad to accept such from you or any man—but none else. You see, Sir, my father was born Oliver Cromwell, whom the Lord compelled all men to acknowledge; but I was naught save Master Richard: as such I am not ashamed to be greeted down in our shire, where, I trust, it shames no man to greet me, and where I know it would grieve my own folk if I failed them."

But Harris bowed lower to good Master Richard than to Richard Cromwell.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER XCIII.

MRS. DELILAH JONES.

MR. NEWT'S political friends in New York were naturally anxious when he went to Washington. They had constant communication with the Honorable Mr. Ele in regard to his colleague. They were entirely sure of Mr. Ele, but they could not quite confide in Mr. Newt, nor help feeling that, in some eccentric moment, even his interest might fail to control him.

"The truth is, I begin to be sick of it," said General Belch to the calm William Condor.

That placid-faced gentleman replied that he saw no reason for apprehension.

"But he may let things out, you know," said Belch.

"Yes, but is not our word as good as his," was the assuring reply.

"Perhaps, perhaps," said General Belch, dolefully, as he remembered the little paper of hints and instructions.

But Belch and Condor were forgotten by the representative they had sent to Congress when he once swelled the air of Washington. There was something grateful to Abel Newt in the wide sphere and complicated relations of the political capital, of which the atmosphere was one of intrigue, and which was built over the mines and countermines of selfishness. In every political metropolis conscience is out of fashion; and Abel came to Washington in the mood of conspiracy. Yet it was a conspiracy of which he was the sole conspirator, and he smiled as he looked around him and felt the magnetism of sympathy.

He undwindled all Belch's spies. The Honorable Mr. Ele could never ascertain any thing about his colleague, until one day when he discovered that the report upon the Grant was to be brought in within a day or two by the Committee, and that it would be recommended. Mr. Ele hastened to Abel's lodging. He found him smoking as usual, with a decanter at hand. It was past midnight, and the room was in the disorder of a bachelor's sanctum.

Mr. Ele seated himself carelessly, so carelessly that Abel saw at once that he had come for some very particular purpose. He offered his friend a tumbler and a cigar, and they talked calmly of a thousand things. Who had come, who had gone, and how superb Mrs. Delilah Jones was, who had appeared upon the scene, invested with mystery, and bringing a note to each of the colleagues from General Belch.

"Mrs. Delilah Jones," said that gentleman, in a private note to Ele, "is our old friend, Kitty Dunham. She appears as the widow of a captain in the navy, who died a few years since upon the Brazil station. You must have some secrets from each other about our dear friend who shall be nameless."

To Abel Newt, General Belch wrote: "My dear Newt, the lady to whom I have given a letter to you is daughter of an old friend of my family. She married Captain Jones of the navy, whom she lost some years since upon the Brazil station. She has seen the world; has money; and comes to Washington to taste life, to enjoy herself; to doff the sables, perhaps, who knows? Be kind to her, and take care of your heart. Don't forget the Grant in the arms of Delilah! Yours, Belch."

Abel Newt, when he received this letter, looked over his books of reports and statistics.

"Captain Jones; Brazil station," he said, skeptically, to himself. But he found no such name or event in the obituaries; and he was only the more amused by his friend Belch's efforts at circumvention and control.

"My dear Belch, I have your private note, but I have not yet encountered the superb Delilah; nor have I forgotten what you said to me about working 'em through their wives, and sisters, etc.

I shall not begin to forget it now, and I hope to make the Delilah useful in the campaign; for there are goslings here, more than you would believe. Thank you for such an ally. You, at least, were not born to fail. Yours, A. Newt."

"Goslings, are there? I believe not," said Belch to himself, inwardly chuckling as he read and folded Abel's letter. "Ally, hey? Well, that is good." And continuing the chuckle rising into a laugh. "Well, well, I thought Abel Newt was smart; but he doesn't even suspect, and I have played a deeper game than was needed."

"I guess that will fix him," said Abel, as he looked over his letter, laughed, folded it, and sent it off.

Mr. Ele by many a devious path at length approached the object of his visit, and hoped that Mr. Newt would flesh his maiden sword in the coming fray. When he had finished the careless speech which had cost him many an anxious hour of reflection and preparation, and upon the success of which, as a skillful piece of wheedling, he greatly flattered himself, Abel said, without removing his cigar, "I think I shall speak."

He said no more. Mr. Ele shook his foot.

"The widow will do a smashing business this winter, I suppose," he said, at length.

"Likely," replied Newt.

"Know her well?"

"Pretty well."

Mr. Ele retired, for he had learned all that his friend meant he should know.

"Do I know Delilah?" laughed Abel Newt to himself, as he said "Kitty Dunham."

Yes he did. He had followed up his note to General Belch by calling upon the superb Mrs. Delilah Jones. But neither the black wig, nor the freshened cheeks, nor the general repairs which her personal appearance had undergone, could hide from Abel the face of Kitty Dunham, whom he had known in other days when supers were eaten in Grand Street and wagons were driven to Cato's. He betrayed nothing; and she wrote to General Belch that she had disguised herself so that he did not recall her in the least.

Abel was intensely amused by the espionage of the Honorable Mr. Ele upon Mrs. Delilah Jones. He told his colleague how greatly he had been impressed by her—that she was really a fascinating woman; and, by Jove! though she was a widow, and no longer twenty, still there were a good many worse things a man might do than fall in love with her. To be honest, he did not feel altogether sure of himself, though he thought he was hardened if any body was.

Mr. Ele smiled, and said, in a serious way, that she was a splendid woman, and if Abel persisted he must look out for a rival.

"For I thought it best to lead him on," he wrote to his friend Belch.

As for the lady herself, Abel was so dexterous that she really believed that she might do rather more for herself than her employers. He brought to bear upon her the whole force of the fascination which had been so irresistible. It was like a blowpipe, and melted out the whole conspiracy against him without her knowing that she had been used. The point of her instructions was that she was to persuade him to be constant to the Grant at any price.

"To-morrow, then, Mr. Newt," she said to him, as they stood together in the vault of a levee at the White House—"to-morrow our bill is to be reported, and favorably."

Mrs. Delilah Jones was pretty woman, and shrewd. She had large eyes, languishing at will—at will, also, bright and piercing. Her face was a smiling, dimpled face; the features rather coarse, the expression almost vulgar, but the vulgarity well concealed. She was dressed in the extreme of the mode, and drew Mr. Newt's arm very close to her as she spoke. She observed that Mr. Newt was more than usually impressed to-day. The honorable representative had dined.

"Our bill, Lady Delilah? Thank you for that," said Abel, in a low voice, and almost pressing the hand that lay upon his close-held arm.

The reply was a slow turn of the head, and a half languishment in the eyes as they sought his with the air of saying, "Would you deceive a woman who trusts in you utterly?"

They moved out of the throng a little, and stood by the window.

"I wish I dared to ask you one thing, as a pure favor," said the superb Mrs. Delilah Jones, and this time the eyes were firm and bright.

"I hoped, by this time, that you dared every thing," replied Abel, with a vague reproach in his tone.

Mrs. Jones looked at him for a moment with a look of honest inquiry in her eyes. His own did not falter. Their expression combined confidence and respect.

"May I then ask," she said, earnestly, and raising her other hand as if to lay it imploringly upon his shoulder, but somehow it fell into his hand, which was raised simultaneously, and which did not let it go—

"For my sake will you speak in favor of it!" she asked, casting her eyes down.

"For your sake, Delilah," he said, in a musical whisper, and under the rouge her cheeks tingled—"for your sake I will make a speech—my maiden speech."

There was more conversation between them. The Honorable Mr. Ele stood apart, so to speak, and by incessant chatter warded off the company from pressing upon them unawares. The guests smiled as they looked on; and after the levee the newspapers circulated rumors (it was before the days of "Personal"), that were read with profound interest throughout the country, that the young and talented representative from the commercial emporium had not forfeited his reputation as a squire of dames, and gossip already declared that the charming and superb Mrs. Delilah Jones were long exchange that honored name for one not less esteemed.

When Abel returned from the levee he threw himself into his chair, and said, aloud,

"Isn't a man lucky who is well paid for doing just what he meant to do?"

For Abel Newt intended to get all he could from the Grant, and to enjoy himself as fully as possible while getting it; but he had his own work to do, and to that his power was devoted. To make a telling speech upon the winning side was one of its pluses, and accordingly he made it.

When the bill was reported as it had been drafted by his friends in New York, it had been arranged that Mr. Newt should catch the speaker's eye. His figure and face attracted attention, and his career in Washington had already made him somewhat known. During the time he had been there his constant employment had been a study of the House, and of its individual members, a study of the general character and influence of the speeches. His shrewdness showed him the shallows, the currents, and the reefs. But now he was to have the action so imposingly stated; and the minority, who knew that it was useless to oppose it, enjoyed the rhetoric of the debate, and, as it was brief, and did not encroach upon dinner-time, smiled approval, and joined in the congratulation to Mr. Newt upon his graceful and admirable oration.

In the midst of the congratulations Abel raised his eyes to Mrs. Delilah Jones, who sat conspicuous in the gallery.

The fluttering Abel Newt was the lion of the hour. The days of dinner invitations and evening parties suddenly returned. He did not fail to use the time well.

He helped to float him more securely to the fulfillment of his great work. Meanwhile he saw Mrs. Jones every day. She no longer tried to play a game.

The report of his speech was scattered abroad in the papers. General Belch rubbed his hands and experimented with an energy that showed the warmth of his feelings. Far away in quiet Delaficld, when the news arrived, Mr. Savory Gray lost no time in improving the occasion at a dinner-party. The scholars were all impressed with the idea that Mr. Newt was a great man because he had been one of Mr. Gray's boys. The Washington world soon knew his story, but one conspicuous fact being that he was the favorite nephew of the rich merchant, Lawrence Newt. The dinner invitations, the evening notes, fell upon his table more profusely than ever.

CHAPTER XCIV.

PASSAGE TAKEN.

One man knew the real state of things. One man felt the total ruin of a life. One man striking blindly out in desperation and hate, scarred his smite at one blow the happiness which he had lost forever. That man sat by the side of the superb Mrs. Delilah Jones, and his name was Abel Newt. Delilah was his slave now, not General Belch's.

He had a great work to do—it was to wreak vengeance upon his foes. It was not a matter of reason; it was an impulse. Why Lawrence Newt was his enemy, or Hope Wayne, or any of their circle, or whether they were so, he could not say. He did not know. He did not care. Why had he hated Gabriel Bennet at school? He only knew that there remained but the possibility of injury. He only hesitated as to how he should strike the blow.

Nor did he hesitate long.

Ambition, political success, social prestige had no fascination for a man who was half imbruted, and utterly disappointed and worn out. One thing only he really wanted. He wanted money—money, which could buy the only pleasures of which he was now capable.

"Look here, Delilah—I like that name better than Kitty; it means something—you know Belch. So do I. Do you suppose a man would work with him or for him except for more advantage than he can insure? Or do you think I want to slave for the public—I work for the public? God! would I be every man's nigger? I'm Mrs. Delilah Jones, emphatically not. I will be my own master, and yours, and my reverend uncle will foot the bills."

The woman looked at him inquiringly. It was not love that shone in her eyes, but she was fascinated. She was a willing captive. She accepted him as master.

"It isn't for you to know how he will pay," said Abel, "but to enjoy the fruits."

The woman, in whose face there were yet the ruins of a coarse beauty, which pleased Abel now as the most fiery liquor gratified his palate, looked at him, and said,

"Abel, what are we to do?"

"To be happy," he answered, with the old hard, black light in his eyes.

She almost shuddered as she heard the tone and saw the look, and yet she did not feel as if she could escape the spell of his power.

"To be happy!" she repeated. "To be happy!"

Her voice fell as she spoke the words. Her life had not been a long one. She had laughed a great deal, but she had never been happy. She knew Abel from old days. She saw him, now, sodden, bloated—but fascinating still. Was he the magician to conjure happiness for her?

"What is your plan?" she asked.

"I have two passages taken in a brig for the Mediterranean. We go to New York a day or two before she sails. That's all."

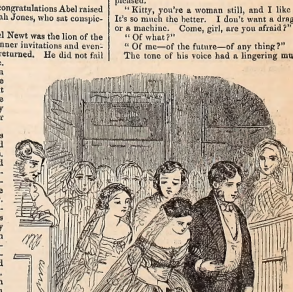
"And then?" asked his companion, with wonder and doubt in her voice.

"And then a blissful climate and happiness."

"And then?" she persisted, in a low, doubtful voice.

"Then Hell—if you are anxious for it," said Abel, in a sharp, sudden voice.

The poor woman cowered as she sat. Men had often enough sworn at her; but she recoiled from the roughness of this lover as if it hurt her. Her eyes were not languishing now, but startled—then slowly they grew dim and soft with tears.



Abel Newt looked at her, surprised and pleased.

"Kitty, you're a woman still, and I like it. It's so much the better. I don't want a dragon or a machine. Come, girl, are you afraid?"

"Of what?"

"Of—of the future—of any thing?"

The tone of his voice had a lingering music of the same kind as the lingering beauty in her face. It was a sensual, seductive sound.

"No, I am not afraid," she answered, turning to him. "But oh! my God! my God! if we were only both young again!"

She spoke with passionate hopelessness, and the tears dried in her eyes.

Later in the evening Mrs. Delilah Jones appeared at the French Minister's ball.

"I come in the whole," said Mr. Ele to his partner, "I have never seen Mrs. Jones so superb as she is to-night."

His partner looked at the widow calmly, and smoothed the skirt of her dress as she answered—

"Yes, I know she is called pretty, but I don't somehow see it. I suppose I am so jealous, you know."

And she glanced deprecatingly at her companion.

"Oh, if I could ever hope to arouse your jealousy!" said the Honorable Barabbas Jayley Ele.

Her passed into another room. And others passed, and others. The bright crowd circled and swayed. But Mrs. Delilah Jones stood by the muzzled, speechless—to the representatives from several States remarked—and all the evening fresh comers offered homage.

"Ma'am!" said the old Dominican Ambassador, as he gazed at her through his g ass, and smacked his lips.

"Umm!" responded the sexagenarian representative from Chili, half closing one eye.

They passed on also, and pouring out a glass of fiery old Madeira, looked gravely at each other over the rims of the glasses.

"Santé!" was uttered through the heavy mustaches of each.

They heard a noise, and looked at the other end of the room. Mr. Abel Newt was talking loudly.

"Your remark was offensive, Sir."

It was a gentleman of the British Legation whom he addressed, and who had observed, sotto voce, to his friend the French Secretary, something in relation to the superb Mrs. Jones.

The youthful attaché looked confused. He seemed to blush and stammer, and the Honorable Mr. Newt had an excessively belligerent air.

"I am not aware that I am responsible to you, Sir, for my remarks," said the attaché.

"By G—, Sir, do you insult me?" vociferated Mr. Newt, upon the young man.

"There's no insult. Will you explain by what right you question my remarks?"

"That's right. That's fair," said the honorable members in the vicinity.

"As a friend of the lady's, Sir."

"Have you any authority to interpose for her, Sir?"

"Yes, Sir," replied Abel, pompously, and with bullying authority.

"In that case, Sir, I beg pardon," returned the attaché.

"Yes, Sir," said Mr. Newt, with the same vengisterial gravity, shaking his head majestically. "Yes, Sir." "Yes, Sir. Yes, Sir," he continued, as if unable to stop, and evidently unaware of what he was assenting to.

The crowd left him still shaking his head unsteadily, and the attaché remarked to his friend the Secretary:

"Now I'm going to have my revenge by congratulating Mrs. Jones."

When that lady was ready to go she asked Mr. Ele to find her friend Mr. Newt, whom she had promised to set down at his lodgings. The gentleman was found soundly sleeping upon the sofa in the supper-room; and, assisted by the Honorable Mr. Ele and the superb Mrs. Delilah Jones, Mr. Newt reached the carriage, and was taken home.

CHAPTER XCV.

MARRIAGE BELLS.

All night the snow fell softly, building of the old bricks of Manhattan a city of marble. As the light wind touched it there was a low rustling sound, as if of conscious happy life. Lightly on the roofs, on the balconies, on the door-steps, on the window-sills, upon the branches of trees, and the boxes that imprisoned them—wherever a point protruded, wherever a flake could lodge—all night the snow fell soft.

By morning the white cloth of the earth, upon which the sun, rising in a cloudless heaven, sparkled.

And the eyes of Hope Wayne and of Amy Waring, and of all the friends who knew and loved them, sparkled also as they shone upon the pure white day and thought of the bright bridal for which the earth seemed to have been bridally brightened.

In Mrs. Newt's house there were signs of something strange. In Mrs. Newt's quiet home there was a swift gliding to and fro. In one room in each of those houses something was hidden—something precious for which every body was busy. Yes, there was a pearl ready in the casket—a bride waiting in her chamber.

Precisely at noon from each house there were departing carriages. They met at the door of the same church, and there was no more expectings as only happy weddings see.

Gabriel Bennet and Edward Wynne shook hands as they stood in the church porch, each with a woman upon his arm that within the hour would be a wife.

"How lovely Ellen is this morning!" whispered Gabriel, looking tenderly at Ellen.

A few moments of solemn service. Before heaven and earth, before God and men, I take this woman, of all women, for my wife—this man, of all men, for my husband. Then the sweet chorus of kisses and happy sobs, the eager not to enjoyed without envious disgrace.

Lawrence Newt and Amy Waring stood side by side and wished the young people joy. Hope Wayne smiled, gayly and playfully, and when she kissed Mrs. Edward Wynne, that lady, with the moist roses of her cheeks growing rosier, whispered, as she laid her head upon Hope's—

"Sister Hope—not a goddess, a dear, loving woman."

Sister Hope did not clearly understand, but she smiled the more, and drove home to Mrs. Bonnet's, in the carriage with Lawrence Newt and Amy Waring. There were no clouds any more, no more constraints and doubts.

Lawrence Newt and every body that should have been there was present, except Mr. Dinks, and Mr. Boniface Newt, who went to no more parties. He was ailened by the fire at home, gazing about the room sometimes, and always slowly beating his long, white, skinny fingers together and muttering. There came to some refrain which he did not utter. Mrs. Newt was not there. Her nerves, she said, would not suffer it, and the Honorable Abel Newt was detained by his public duties at Washington.

But Fanny Newt and Aunt Martha and Arthur Merlin and Mrs. Simcoe sat quiet and cheerful at the table.

"If I had your doing," said Mrs. Bennet, as she smiled through tears upon Lawrence Newt, who sat beside her. "You are the guilty man."

He looked at her, and looked then at Amy Waring had a light in her eyes that expressed the most unquestioning assent to her aunt's remark; and Hope Wayne, sitting by Lawrence Newt, smilingly shook her head in agreement.

He filled a glass, and tripped the table. Every body stopped and looked.

"I will give a toast upon one condition," said Lawrence Newt.

"Name the condition," answered Arthur.

"That nobody shall make a speech."

There was laughing all round.

"The health, then, of Mr. and Mrs. Gabriel Bennet, and Mr. and Mrs. Edward Wynne."

Mr. Arthur Merlin cried "Hear, hear!" and "Bravo, bravo!"

Gabriel turned to Edward, and said:

"There couldn't have been a nicer reply, or we must both have spoken at once."

"Not at all," replied Edward.

"How so, Mr. Malaprop?"

"Because, Sir, you are the older married man," answered Edward.

"By at least fifteen minutes," said Hope Wayne.

At a happy wedding dinner kindliness sparkles like wit. The bright sun rose here by the full moon shone upon the snow. Arthur Merlin looked out of the window and thought of his picture.

Mr. Bennet sat by his wife's side upon the old sofa. They saw their children before them married. But they felt themselves like children. Mrs. Bennet put her hand in her husband's.

"I congratulate you, Sir," she said, softly, with glistening eyes.

The dreamy, quivering sweetness lightened in his eyes, with a glimmering humor.

"Don't you pity Columbus, now, if he were never married?"

LITERARY.

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS have just published, in a neat 12mo volume, price 75 cents, "HALF HOURS WITH THE BEST AMERICAN CHARACTER AND CONDUCT," by Samuel Smiles, the well-known author of "The Life of George Stephenson."

They have also added to their excellent Library of Select Novels, MISREPRESENTATION, by Anna H. Drury, author of "Eastbury."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

THE PRESIDENT'S Message was read on Tuesday, 27th, in the senate. After the usual recognition of Providential mercies, he thus proceeds:

THE HARPER'S FERRY RAID.

While it is the duty of the President from time to time to give to Congress information of the state of the Union, I shall not refer to those events which have recently and bloody occurrences at Harper's Ferry. Still, it is proper to observe that these occurrences have led our citizens to commit themselves, derive their chief importance from the apprehension that they are but symptoms of a more wide-spread disease in the public mind, which may break out in still more dangerous outrages, and which must, if not met in an open war by the North to abolish slavery in the South, by the South for myself, a contention of such appalitation, their ought to afford a solemn warning to the people of the approach of danger. Our Union is a stake of such overwhelming importance to our country and to mankind, that vigilance for its preservation. In this view, let me implore my countrymen, let me implore the South to cultivate the ancient feelings of mutual forbearance and good-will between each other, and all to frown down the first symptom of sectional hatred and strife now alive in the land. This subject is exciting the deep interest of the whole confederacy, whose services announced in the last generation, and the people who will soon be called upon to act in their day, now nearly all passed away, and whose first and last prayers were for the Union of their country—tranquil, prosperous, united, and powerful.

AN APPEAL TO GOOD FEELING.

Public opinion in this country is all-powerful, and when it reaches a dangerous excess upon any question the good sense of the people will furnish the corrective and bring it back within safe limits. With, to hasten this auspicious result, at the present crisis, we ought to remember that every rational creature must be presumed to intend the natural consequences of his own teachings. Those who encourage slaves to rebellion by acts of the Constitution and the Union must not be surprised should they be treated precisely as others are who act on the attempt by violence to carry these doctrines into practical effect. In this view of the subject it might never to be forgotten that, however great may have been the political advantages resulting from the Union to every portion of our country, there was one evil attached to it so far as nothing should the time ever arrive when they can not be enjoyed without serious danger to the personal safety of the people of fifteen members of the Confederacy. If the fifteen slave States and the territory of the United States should ever be invaded—if the mothers of families while in a defenseless region should not be able to retire to rest at night without suffering dreadful apprehension of servile insurrection, and the murder of their children before the morning—it would be vain to appeal to the sympathy of the non-slaveholding States to put out to them from the Union. Self-preservation is the first instinct of nature, and all governments must act accordingly in which the sword is all the more unpointed over the heads of the people and not into their bosoms inflicted. But I indulge in no such gloomy forebodings. On the contrary, I firmly believe that every State from Maryland to Kerry, by causing the people to pause and reflect upon the possible perils of the unbridled institutions, will for the means, under Providence, of allaying the existing excitement and restoring the public mind to its wonted character. They will resolve that the Constitutions and the Union which have been transmitted by our forefathers, knowing that, should "the silver cord be loosed or the golden bowl be broken" by the hand of violence, the whole power could never reunite the scattered and hostile fragments.

SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES.

I ordinarily congratulate you upon the final settlement by the Supreme Court of the United States of the question of slavery in the Territories, which had presented such an aspect as to threaten the most disastrous issues of my administration. The right has been established of every citizen to take his property into the Territories with slaves, into the common Territories belonging equally to the United States and to himself, under the protection of there under the Federal constitution. Neither Congress nor a Territorial Legislature, nor any human power, has any authority to annul or impair this vested right. It has been conceded by the political departments of the co-ordinate branch of the government, has sanctioned with almost unanimity by the people of confirmed law, and finally it has been solemnly affirmed by the highest judicial tribunal established by the Constitution to expound its provisions and to decide upon its validity. The right to property in slaves is now guaranteed to the citizens of every State of the Union by the highest sanctions which can exist under our system of government. Everything else connected with this question is now to be regarded as settled in principle and in fact. Henceforth the only dangers which can menace the Union are those which may arise from the collision between the citizens of the different States in the Territories, and from the misguided interference of fanatical persons in the affairs of the people of the Territories. Both these dangers will be effectually overcome when the settlers in the Territories shall have been permitted to decide for themselves whether slavery shall or shall not exist within their limits, without foreign interference. This is the whole principle of the Kansas-Nebraska act, and it is the only principle which can or ought to be applied to the Territories hereafter to be organized. Any other principle would be in violation of the Constitution, would be inconsistent with the legislation and the settled policy of the government from the beginning of the government, and would be productive of the most fatal consequences to the peace and prosperity of the country. Experience has shown that every effort to prohibit slavery in the Territories has only aggravated the evil which it was designed to remedy. Under the Missouri restriction of 1820 the people of the Territories were excited to the introduction of slaves, while the Kansas-Nebraska act has left them free to exclude them. Under the former law the citizens of the Territories were kept in a state of unnatural excitement and agitation, while under the latter they have enjoyed the most perfect tranquillity. Under the former law the people of the Territories were unfitted for the formation of a State constitution, while under the latter they have been fitted for admission into the Union. After this has been done, no power on earth will be able to exclude slaves from any State that may be received into the Union, unless the people of such constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission. The principle of the law has properly been recognized, to some form or other, by an almost unanimous vote of both houses of Congress.

THE SLAVE-TRADE.

All law for many years of my command have been enjoyed, and shall continue to be employed, to execute with vigor the laws of the African slave-trade. After a most careful and rigorous examination of the vessels, and a thorough investigation of the subject, we have not been able to discover that any of the vessels sent from the ports of the United States except the cargo by the Wanderer, something between three and four hundred. These captured in this unlawful enterprise have been rigorously prosecuted, and the offenders punished as the law has made and decreed. A number of them are still under prosecution.

THE SAN JUAN AFFAIR.

Upon the trade, and it would be difficult to determine whether the people of that race deteriorate or the interests of the master or on those of the native born slave. Of the evils of the system, the one most to be dreaded would be the introduction of wild, heathen, and ignorant barbarians, fresh from their native wilds, into slaves, whose ancestors have been on the soil for several generations, and who have become habituated, domesticated, and exasperate the whole mass, and produce the most destructive consequences.

The effect upon the existing slave would, if possible, be still more deplorable.

THE SAN JUAN AFFAIR.

After mentioning the Many agreements with the British Government, the President continues:

Thus matters remained at the close of this arrangement until the 9th of July last, when General Harney took a visit to the island. He found upon it twenty-five American residents with their families, and also an establishment of the Hudson's Bay Company for the purposes of raising sheep. A short time before his arrival each of these persons, not an animal belonging to the company, while trespassing upon his premises, for which, he was informed, he was to be charged a rent that was refused. Soon after "the chief factor of the company at Victoria, Mr. Dallas, sent over Governor Douglas, came to the Island in the British sloop-of-war Satellite, and demanded that Captor Pickett and his battery be force to Victoria, to answer for the trespass in question, and, moreover, to extend his rule, and that Mr. Dallas if any such attempt was made he would kill him with the sword of his own hands."

Under these circumstances the American settlers presented a petition to Captain Pickett, "through the United States Inspector of Customs, Mr. Hyden, to place a force upon the island for the protection of their lives and property as well as the oppressive interference of the authorities of the British Island of Victoria with their rights as citizens of the American citizens." The General immediately reinforced Captain Pickett, and ordered Lieutenant-Col. E. Pickett, 9th Infantry, "to establish his company on the southeastern part of the island, and to use every means under his command to secure the harbor at the southeastern extremity." This force was promptly dispatched, and a military post was established at the place designated. The force was afterwards increased to 461 men, and subsequently to a number of troops then on the island amounted in the aggregate to 661 men.

BRITISH ACTS AND REPRESENTATIONS.

While I do not deem it proper, on the present occasion, to go further than to state the facts which have led to the difficulty which ought to be attached to the statements of the British colonial authorities concerning the accuracy of the information on which the gallant General acted, it was not at this time that I communicated to Congress the correspondence on the order to Captain Pickett. From these it is quite clear that the course pursued by the British authorities on Vancouver's Island from exercising jurisdiction over American citizens on this island, and that it was well as to protect them against the incursions of the Indians.

Much excitement prevailed for some time throughout that region, and serious danger of collision between the parties was apprehended. The British and a large naval force in the vicinity, and it is but an act of simple justice to the admiral on that station to state that he wisely and discreetly forbore to commit any hostile act, but determined to refer the whole affair to his government and await their instructions.

GENERAL SCOTT'S MISSION.

This aspect of the matter, in my opinion, demanded serious attention. It would have been a great calamity for both nations had they been precipitated into acts of hostility not on the question of title to the island, but merely concerning the form which it should be taken during the intervening period while the two governments might be employed in settling the question to which of them it belongs. For this reason Lieutenant-General Scott was dispatched on the 17th of September last to Washington Territory, to take immediate command of the military forces of the United States on that coast, and to act as circumstances might render necessary. The main object of his mission was to bring about the happy and pacific arrangement between the two governments which has since been effected. I have to-day the pleasure to announce the full and prompt execution between the British and American authorities of the agreement entered into between the two governments. Entertaining no doubt of the validity of the claim of the United States to the island, the military authorities were to be placed on a footing at least to prevent the title in dispute from being changed by force. Captain Pickett's company should remain on the island. The British force should be withdrawn from it. This was the state of action, and in ignorance of what might be the result of the negotiations between the two governments, it was necessary to leave such to his discretion, and I am happy to say that his course has been approved. Orders could not have been intrusted to more competent hands. General Scott has received renewed proofs of his ability, having successfully accomplished his objects, and the island is now in a condition to apprehend a collision between the forces of the two countries during the pendency of the existing negotiations.

THE STATE OF MEXICO.

The excesses which always attend upon civil war, especially in Mexico, are constantly recurring. Outrages of the most flagrant character are perpetrated both upon persons and property. There is scarcely any form of injury which has not been suffered by our citizens in Mexico during the last few years. We have been nominally at peace with Mexico, but this peace has afforded no protection to our commerce or of our citizens who have visited the country or resided among its inhabitants. In the meantime, as our record, we might as well have been at war." In the latter event, however, the government would be impossible except at a risk of less which prudent men can not be at liberty to incur. Repeated remonstrances involving large expenditures entered into by the central government, have not been able to obtain redress for these grievances. Peaceful American residents, occupying their dwellings and property, have been subjected to acts of cruelty, in defiance of treaties, and by the mere force of military power. Their dwellings have been entered and torn asunder, and a recent decree of Miramon permits the interference of governmental in the affairs of the territory. Vessels of the United States have been arrested and detained, and others forcibly and unjustified such suffering and injury, and without any hope of redress. Even the sanctuary of religion has not been inviolate without title in person, as well as the extreme and the bishop of the American, upon the soil of the United States, was compelled to journey on foot to his home. Murders of a still more atrocious character have been committed in the streets of Mexico, under the authority of Miramon's government, and the perpetrators have found at least a temporary asylum. Little less shocking was the recent fate of the Consul of the United States at Tepic on the 4th of August, by order of the same Mexican government, not only without a trial, but without any opportunity for the exercise of the commonest rights of humanity. He was dragged from his prison and shot in an inhuman manner, and his property confiscated. THE ONLY REMEDY.

In all these cases our Ministers have been constant and faithful in their demands for redress, but both they and this Government, with the utmost patience which can be resisted, have been wholly powerless to make their demands effective. The only remedy which is left is to refer the case to the only remedy which, in their judgments, would require the redress, and that is to render them impossible. "Nothing but a manifestation of the power of the Government of the United States can arrest our late Minister in 1850, and of its purpose to punish these wrongs, it will avail. I assure you that the universal belief here is that there is nothing to be apprehended from the Government of the United States, and that local decisions will continue to be made against the American citizens with absolute impunity." I hope the President of the United States will not. The people have said "will not authorized to ask from Congress the Power to call out the militia and the Army and Navy of the United States, at the call of the constitutional authorities, in order to protect the lives and the property of citizens of the United States. Unless such a power is conferred upon him, nothing will be left for him but to refer the matter to the existing state of anarchy and disorder, and the outrages already committed will soon be repeated. As soon as I assured you in my No. 23, all these evils must increase until a state of anarchy shall exist which must disappears from the country." I have been reluctantly led to the same conclusion, and, in justice to my countrymen who have suffered wrongs from Mexico, and who may still suffer them, I feel bound to announce this conclusion to Congress.

A MILITARY OCCUPATION NECESSARY.

The wrongs which we have suffered from Mexico are before the world, and have called for redress every American citizen. A government which does not protect its subjects is unfitting to be called a government. It forgets the duties. The difficulty consists in the means to apply to the constitutional authorities. We can only look to the civil and efficient government at Vera Cruz, which is not in a condition to afford us adequate redress. While its authority is acknowledged in all the interior portions of the republic, its power does not extend to the city of Mexico. Its jurisdiction is not extend to the city of Mexico. Its jurisdiction is not extended to all the recent outrages have been committed on American citizens, and the perpetrators are still unpunished. Before we can reach the offenders, and upon the limits of the Republic by passing through the territory of the constitutional government. The most active efforts will be made by the constitutional government to call it to account with that government. But, in the meantime, our citizens will be suffering. Their consent and their all call for redress, and the Government of the United States ought not ever citizens in their just rights, secured by treaty. I recommend to Congress imperative. For these reasons, I recommend, under such contingencies as may arise, to employ a sufficient military force to enter Mexico for the purpose of obtaining indemnity for the past and security for the future. I purposely refrain from any suggestion as to the number of troops necessary for such a purpose. I would only say that in my opinion, demanded serious attention. It would have been a great calamity for both nations had they been precipitated into acts of hostility not on the question of title to the island, but merely concerning the form which it should be taken during the intervening period while the two governments might be employed in settling the question to which of them it belongs. sympathies with the sufferings of our unfortunate fellow-citizens in Mexico, and with the unhappy condition of that republic. Such an accession to the forces of the constitutional government would enable it soon to reach the city of Mexico, and extend its power over the whole republic. In that event there is no reason to doubt that the just claims of our citizens would be satisfied, and adequate redress obtained for the injuries inflicted upon them. The national government have ever striven to use a strong desire to do us justice; and this might be secured by an advance by a preliminary treaty.

MR. WARD AT PEKIN.

On the arrival of Mr. Ward at Pekin he required an audience of the Emperor to present his letter of credence. This he did not obtain, in consequence of his very proper refusal to submit to the humiliating ceremonies required by the etiquette of this strange people in approaching their sovereign. Nevertheless the minister and the question were conducted in the most friendly spirit and in all that related to his personal feelings and the honor of his country. When a presentation to his Majesty was found to be impossible, the letter of credence from the President was received with peculiar honors by Kweiliang, "the Emperor's Prime Minister, and the first man in the empire to the Emperor himself." The ratifications of the treaty were afterward met on the 16th of August, exchanged in proper form at Pei-tang. As the exchange did not take place until after the time fixed upon by the treaty, it is deemed proper, before its publication, again to submit it to the Senate.

It is but simple justice to the Chinese authorities to observe that, throughout the whole transaction, they appear to have acted in good faith and in a friendly spirit toward the United States. It is true that this has been after their own peculiar fashion; but we ought to regard with a leniency the ancient customs of a people having long look for themselves of years, so far as this may be consistent with our national honor. The conduct of our Minister on the occasion has received my entire approbation.

A CHANGE IN STATE ELECTIONS PROPOSED.

The time to use the Post-office bill successfully, as set forth in serious reflections. Congress, by refusing to pass the general appropriation bill necessary to carry on the Government, may not only arrest its action, but might even destroy its existence. The Army, Navy, and Judiciary, in short, every department of the Government has no longer any means than their incomes if Congress withhold the money necessary for their support. If this failure should long continue the necessary delay of meeting a full Congress in sufficient time to enable the President to convene them in any emergency, even immediately after the old Congress has expired, it will have been productive of great evil. In a time of peace, as well as in times of danger, foreign or domestic, which all nations must expect to encounter in their progress, the very existence of our institutions may be staked upon the assembling of Congress without delay. If, under such circumstances, the President should find himself in the condition in which he was placed on the close of the last session, with nearly half the States of the Union destitute of representatives, the consequences might be disastrous. He therefore recommend to Congress to carry into effect the provisions of the Constitution in this subject, and not to allow a law appointing some day previous to the 4th of March in each year at which the election of Representatives throughout all the States. They have already appointed a day for the election of electors for President and Vice-President, and this measure has been approved by the country.

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

I would again express a most decided opinion in favor of the construction of a Pacific railroad, for which I have stated in my two last annual messages. When I reflect upon what was in the Declaration of Independence of the States and Territories west of the Rocky Mountains is a mere arid waste, a naval power entirely unknown, and a metropolis extensive with them by the restlessness the Infancy, I have been convinced than ever of the vast importance of this railroad. I have never doubted the constitutionality of the measure, and I still think that if it be constructive, let this exclusively under the war-making power. But the Constitution expressly authorizes it as an imperative duty, that "the United States shall protect each of them (the States) against invasion." It is my belief less to conceive how this protection can be afforded to California and Oregon against such a naval power as one of other means. I repeat the opinion contained in my last annual message, that it would be incumbent upon the Government to undertake this great work by agents of its own appointment and under its direct and immediate control. This would increase the patronage of the Executive to a dangerous extent, and would lead to a system of jobbing and corruption which no vigilance on the part of Federal officers could prevent. The contracts would be so vast ought, therefore, to be intrusted to incorporated companies, or other agencies, who would be responsible, effective and vigilant supervision over it which can be inagined alone by a sense of corporate and individual interest. I venture to assert that the additional cost of transportation and annuities of any kind, over and above the rates for the army across the vast intervening plains to the possessions on the Pacific Coast, would be trifling in such a war than the whole amount required to construct the road, and by this route would, after all, be indispensable for their defence and protection.

REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE.

We have been most severely removed from the habits of extravagant expenditure, produced by our overflowing Treasury, during several years prior to the commencement of my administration. The financial reverses which we have since experienced ought to last for ever. It is only thus our expenditures will the greatest vigilance, and be reduced to the lowest possible point. The Secretary of the Treasury Department have devoted themselves to the accomplishment of this object, and have been crowned with entire success, as will appear from their different reports and estimates. In these I invite the attention of Congress, for the purpose of reducing them still lower, if this can be practicable, consistent with the public interest and safety of the country. In aid of the policy of retrenchment I prefer upon the issuance directly into the hands of individuals so money, or that if any of these should inconvenience to the Government of the amount of the loss, as would unquestionably be the result, after all, be inadequate for their defence and protection.

The balance in the Treasury on the 1st of July, 1859, of $14,781,648; the receipts during the same year, including loans, $69,580,293; and the total receipts during the fiscal year 1859-60 (half of which has nearly expired), the Secretary's estimates are as follows:

REVENUE.

Balance on July 1, 1859	$4,339,276
Ordinary revenue for 1859-'60	60,207,565
To be borrowed on Treasury notes and stock of 1858	10,747,760
Total revenue	$75,584,841

EXPENDITURE.

Service of Government, as above	$56,338,356
Interest on debt	4,604,304
Total expenditure	$61,062,722

The balance thus left would be $14,581,848; but the unpaid debts of the year, the disbursements, and other appropriations required, will have to come out of this; to that, estimate for the service specified, and appropriations by Congress, the balance on 1st July, 1860, will be reduced to ten millions three hundred thousand.

The Secretary says:

It will be seen that there will be no necessity to provide additional means for the Treasury, provided its receipts should be equal to the estimates, and the appropriations made by Congress do not exceed the amounts recommended by the Secretary.

I submit, with much confidence, the estimate of probable receipts for the ensuing year, and also that for which it is based upon the operations of our trade and commerce for the past year. Nothing has occurred to question that the business of the country will continue in its present state of prosperity during 1860.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

The Secretary of War reports that, while the authorized strength of the army was 18,000 men, the force at last was only 17,498; and 11,000 of that number were on the western frontier. Of course, the field in which the force has been required to man about 130 permanent posts, and to protect the settlers over a vast area and a three millions of square miles, and consequently it has been impossible to concentrate a sufficient number on any frontiers. In relation to the Indian depredations on our Southern and Mexican borders, the Secretary says that such attention to the disposition of the troops best season as will enable them to suppress the disorders which have been taken to subdue the Camanches and Kiowas, and give protection to the settlers in Northern Texas, and give protection to the settlers in Northern Texas, and the settlers in New Mexico. He recommends that provision be made for enlisting a force of Indian scouts, to be employed for enlisting transcires is urged, as to the enlistment of foreigners, and the necessity of a large number of men to provide their own horses. He speaks favorably of experiments in breech-loading fire-arms, of the use of caissons for carrying ammunition, and of the use of camels for transporting stores. On the whole every thing is put down at $13,03 8,73 2, of which he thinks may be considerably reduced.

The Secretary of the Navy says that there is scarcely any portion of the public service that, with proper economy for the future, they will profitably soon be so brief.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

The Report of the Secretary of the Navy enters largely into the achievements of the African Squadron, and the measures which have extended arrangements for suppressing the slave-trade. The Secretary says that the force on the African Slave-trade has been added to the number of steam and steam-vessels had been increased since the accession of the present administration. No augmentation has been called for, except for the enlargement of the general force—officers, privates, &c.

The annual expenditures of the Navy Department for the six touched upon; and the explanations of Lieutenant, Brooks among the officers who were tried and acquitted. A contract executed with the Chicago Express Company for the transportation of the mails between the two of great value. It concedes large areas of land on either side of the line of the railroad, and also the entire navigation of the necessary harbors, and the ownership of all coal found on the line. Under this contract $600,000 a year are to be paid, should Congress ratify the bargain. The appropriations for the Navy Department for the fiscal year were $14,623,26; the appropriations $14,509,254. The estimated expenditures for the present administration, for 1860, were $13,970,370; the appropriation $10,464,100, for the year ending June 30, 1861, $13,970,370; and for $11,384,815.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

The Report of the Secretary of the Interior embodies a mass of information relative to the various branches of the public service. The General Land Office Bureau states that the number of acres of land sold during the year ending September 30, 1859, 16,418,183 acres were sold for cash, and 2,107,476 with land warrants. The receipts were $2,107,476; 2,017,440 acres were located with bounty land warrants; 1,711,040 were approved to States under the swamp land act; and under the swamp grants of March 2, 1849, and September 28, 1850; and 1,000,000 acres were granted to Illinois, Iowa, and Minnesota, to aid in the construction of railroads. The number of acres of land surveyed during the year was 23,055,570, and that the number of acres of land surveyed to date is 181,427,423. There are 258,000 of the Aborigines within the limits of the United States. The total number of Pensions has 11,855 pensioners on his roll, calling for $1,291,155 annually. The Secretary recommends that provision be made for the census, will require the aggregate labor of at least 1,000 men. He also recommends the act just to continue the purchase and distribution at the Agricultural Bureau of seeds, cuttings, roots, trees, and plants, etc., as have not already been introduced into the country. An appropriation of $10,000 for the proper and convenient accommodation for the Courts of the United States in the City of Boston, and for the Circuit and District Court, is also recommended.

REPORT OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The Report of the Postmaster-General dwells largely upon the financial embarrassments of the year, attributable to the liabilities of the Department for the transportation of ascertained liabilities not due by the Department, but due to that service, and which will be paid. The gross liabilities to the amount of $1,449,000 have been liquidated. The gross receipts for the year are $8,518,000. These, added to a balance on the books of the Auditor, leave to be provided for a total of $8,518,000. The sum of $12,156,239 constitutes revenue, against expenditures amounting to $13,613,239, leaving a deficiency of $1,457,000. The Postmaster-General says:

The increase for the service period are estimated at $1,675,000, and the decrease at $1,000,000, leaving a deficiency of $2,132,000. The total annual transportation of mails on the 30th June last was 53,318,493 miles, costing 13,498,71. The increase in the annual transportation is 3,000,000 miles, the causes by rail, steamboat, and coach having been largely increased, and the service by mail contractors to the extent of 16,67 miles. The number of post-offices is 28,586, an increase during the year for the year. The Postmaster-General is pregnant with subjects of reform.

One of his plans contemplates the discouragement of the system of correspondence by telegraph by the imposition of twenty per postage heretofore enjoyed by the Press; another, the award of bids for transportation to parties contracting to furnish the utmost celerity, independently of the mode of carriage; another, the final abandonment of the Tehuantepec Isthmus as a mail route. In regard to the route between Portland and New Orleans, further legislation is pronounced requisite. And that clause of the Act of June, 1858, which directs a preference to be given in the transportation of the European mails to a route between Portland and New Orleans in three days' delay, is recommended for repeal. The document is extremely long.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, 26th December, the Senate not being in session, Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, addressed a crowded floor in consideration of his speech commenced on Friday. Mr. Hunter's object is to show by interpretation of contradictory notions, none looking to an adjournment over the holidays, because he is not prepared to say that others are adjournment until Mr. Smith should have reached his point. Mr. Green, of Kentucky, also reserved privilege to obtain a hearing for a proposition advocating the exercise of the power of the Senate to call a recess. The motion to adjourn until Tuesday at length prevailed.

On Tuesday, 27th December, the Senate of the Message was listened to, after the resistance of Republican Senators to hear the message. Mr. Green recommended it to be laid on the table; Mr. Clingman, that all action be postponed until the message be printed; Mr. Wright, that the usual course be adopted—that the Message and documents be referred to a Select Committee; that his motion to that effect be over until after the holidays. Mr. Hunter's speech was then resumed, and the Senate adjourned until Friday.——The House having declined to hear the Message read, Mr. Hunter resumed and closed his speech. Mr. Houston, of Alabama, then moved that the Speaker be elected by a majority voting while the appropriations for the Post-office Department might be passed. Mr. Pennington, Republican candidate, then were ready to elect a Speaker for the whole session. A call of the House was ordered, and 208 members answered, rendering 105 necessary to a choice. Sherman received 109 votes, Bocock 88, Phillips 15; Messrs. Gilmer and Boeock, each, 14; Mr. Maclay, 1; Mr. Corwin, 1; and Mr. Pennington, 1.

On Wednesday, 28th, in the House, the Senate not being in session, Speeches were made by Messrs. Phillips, Illinois, Mr. Barksdale, and others. Mr. Etheridge, of Tennessee, placed before the House the name of Mr. Haywood, of North Carolina, as that of a conservative, conservative, in all respects entitled to the support of conservative men. He was not the first Republican who replied by constant debate, each gentleman taking pains to explain that he was not voting for Mr. Sherman. It was declared, there were found to be 116 necessary to a choice on the 114th vote. Sherman received 101; and Mr. Haywood 65. The rest were scattering.

On Thursday, 29th, Speeches, speeches were made by Mr. Morris and Mr. Millson. Mr. Grow then took the floor to reply to the remarks made by Mr. Millson, of Mr. Brooks, of North Carolina, in which the Pennsylvania representative had defended the Republican Post-office Appropriation Bill. Mr. Grow vehemently repelled the accusation that the appropriation was a party measure. A sharp colloquy ensued, in which Mr. Bocock announced that he should vote for Mr. Grow's measure. In the week, Mr. Pryor, of Virginia, obtained the floor, but was interrupted by Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, and Mr. Haywood, of Kentucky, who interpolated explanations. Previous to the ballot for Speaker, Mr. Grow withdrew his name from the list, as not likely to concentrate the necessary number. Mr. Gilmer, of California, then stepped upon the conservatives as an unexceptionable man, and received 14 votes. Mr. Bocock received 102; Scott, 85; Gilmer, 14; scattering, 11; necessary to a choice, 113. Mr. Sherman received 109.

On Friday, 30th, in the Senate, Senator Iles, of Mississippi, gave notice of a bill for the relief of Jones, et al., sufferers by the Florida Indian depredations at Pond's, were the most important. The Senate then adjourned over to Monday, 2d January. Mr. Hunter then drawn ineffectually to institute a twenty-minute rule for speeches. Mr. Grow's speech was then followed by Messrs. Boyce, Stanton, Cox, etc.; and on the 3d, by Mr. Kellogg, of Illinois. The Committee of Ways and House adjourned it adjourn to January 3 was carried, by 116 to 114. Mr. Sherman, Republican, of Ohio, is elected Speaker for twenty-four hours, so as to allow the House to go into the election of Speaker for the session of the Post-office Department. The plan was not carried out, and Mr. Grow elected.

END OF THE CLAYTON-BULWER DISPUTE.

The Herald says: "It appears that the action of our Minister to Guatemala, Mr. Dimitry, in which he has negotiated between Great Britain and Guatemala, was entirely unauthorized by instructions, as to the facts, recently received official dispatches state that by the treaty of 1850 between Great Britain and Guatemala, the former pretensions to the Bay Islands, as well as to the Mosquito coast, are to be left to the boundary line agreed to by the two governments are fixed in accordance with the terms of the convention of 1850 between Guatemala and adopted by the United States Senate. It is furthermore stated that Mr. Dimitry has exceeded his instructions in that she has not and does not intend to enter into any treaty which will impair the rights of the United States under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty."

AGGRESSION IN MISSOURI.

A telegram from St. Louis reports an act of insurrectionary violence, said to have been made by the slaves on Monday night, in Polk County, in the southwestern section of the State. The white population of Benton County was aroused by shouts and other demonstrations in the public square. Here a party of the slaves, it is said, were found to have attacked a number of whites, using stones for weapons. Some of the slaves were arrested into the mountains, where, at the latest moment, they were engaged in a conflict with the whites. Large numbers have been imprisoned and severely punished. A Vigilance Committee has been formed, and the excitement in the town is intense.

RETURN OF THE YACHT "WANDERER."

The yacht Wanderer has once more come to right, this time in the waters of Georgia. She was seized in the port on Saturday, in charge of the mate, who tells a story of wanderings, adventures, and escapes, which is in the way of interest and more fascinating chapter to the history of piracies and slave-trading than any. The history of the vessel, as stated with from the time of her departure from the port of Charleston, and the free natives who brought her back, and now in great suffering and destitute condition, have been provided for.

PERSONAL.

Senator Seward arrived in town on Wednesday evening from Europe by the Arctic. He was received by a committee of his political friends, and escorted to the Astor House, while artillery in the Park fired a salute.

Governor Wise has left Richmond for Florida. He said: "I leave that Governor Wise has laid before the joint Legislature the correspondence relative to the duties upon the subject of Mr. Dimitry's mission.

Earl of Derby has been appointed Governor of Ireland, and more of it in Charlestown, Virginia. This extraordinary occasion was signed by persons known to New England; and though names, and duties, and places of writing are obliterated from some of the letters, it nevertheless implicates persons, I am told, now little suspected by the country. The Committee in the Senate will bring these forth to light, but in all cases proof will be difficult."

Archbishop Hughes has accepted the invitation of the Senior Class of the University of North Carolina to deliver the Commencement Sermon before them on the 4th of June next.

Dempsey Upper, an esteemed citizen of Albion, Orleans County, was murdered on 25th ult., in his grocery store at that place. He was found lying a bucket, dead in the store. His body was found lying on the floor next morning. The murder is supposed to have been done with an axe or a similar instrument, as the top of his head was completely knocked in. There was no robbery of wealth, but kept little or no money in his possession. Patrick Colligan has been arrested on suspicion, and is now in custody of Dyer. A difficulty existed between them, and he had threatened Dyer's life.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

THE COURT AT COMPIEGNE.

The Times correspondent says: "If what we hear from Compiegne be correct, the Imperial court has not still, almost ingubrious affairs. The court fêtes and entertainments are reduced to a affair of grim formality; gentlemen and ladies are invited out in sets to stay three days, and the routine of amusement and occupations to go through—an etiquette as far removed from fun as the Escurial itself. Even the stage is not to be allowed a number of times daily, eat a certain number of solemn dinners, and to be present at a certain number of evening services, and are treated each to one grand hunt in the forest. The Emperor and Empress appear to be on not solemnity in front of the party by a groom, who lets him go with the rest. The Emperor is said to take care of himself. The whole set return to town together on a Saturday evening. The Empress is said to have allowed any piece of fun in the trip. The reason of this will be understood by all."

"It can not be said, however, that an attempt is not made to enliven the party. Every day after the hunt, numbering about fifty persons, they usually invite three or four persons to dine with them, of more or less conversational qualities. But whether these refuse to fill the appointment, or that the Emperor has a special element when out of their slippers and morning gown, they are generally found to be the dullest. The Minister, Lord and Lady Stafford, the Duke of Magenta, and an eccentric character.

AN ECCENTRIC CHARACTER.

Among the recent deaths in Paris, is that of Viscount Made de Fleurieu, who was remarkable as the survivor of one of the oldest families in Brittany. His name, however, is not that by which he was known, as he was the founder of the celebrated enterprise of the Restaurant Anglais, which was for many years the resort of the élite of Paris. He had twelve consulines laden with his dishes sent to every part of the world, and his tables were laden with cold dishes, and twenty-four laden with wines of the choicest vintage. He was the first person who made immense fortunes to prepare the dishes, but the project was a failure, and he died in the most abject poverty. He left the remainder of his fortune in an attempt to found a colony in Texas, but the undertaking was a failure died poor. At the time of his death he was revising the productions of a work he had written for Napoleon.

DARING FLIGHT OF FASHION.

Fashion, in the very highest circles abroad, has taken a flight, which, if it does not soar to the regions of the sun, is a diplomatic dinner recently given in that city, two ladies of the Indian empire were present, viz., the Countess I——, wore a red bonnet jacket of satin, embroidered with silver, and trimmed with fur. The other was a military cap of black velvet, surmounted by an ostrich feather. The dress was of white satin and velvet, but consisted of a black satin skirt, very short, and trimmed with a deep flounce of white satin. The Countess C——, who was of the party, wore a dragoon uniform, consisting of a scarlet coat with gold epaulettes, buttons of gold, epaulets of gold, a head-dress with a plume of feathers. The boots were worn by the dragoons.

PEOPLE WHO WON'T CONFESS CAN'T BE MARRIED.

The Novvelliste Vaudois says: "The parish priest of Bex, in the Canton of Vaud, refused to perform the ceremony of the celebrate the marriage of a couple in his parish, because the bridegroom had refused to confess himself before the communion. The bishop of the diocese, on being appealed to, approved of the decision of the priest. The affair was accordingly applied to the Council of State; but that body, finding that the law left the matter to the priest's discretion, has sent a deputation to the bishop praying him to decide. What the decision has been is not yet known."

AUSTRIA.

THE EMPEROR ABOUT TO ABDICATE.

A letter from Pesth of the 1th inst. says: "A piece of news is now circulated here which, in the political circles of this city that it is not without hesitation I venture to mention it, as I have hitherto found it the most excellent means of obtaining the silliest and best information. It is said that the Emperor Francis Joseph intends shortly abdicating the crown in favor of his son, a child born the 18th of August, 1858, and designated to inherit his brother, the Archduke Maximilian, formerly Governor of Lombardy. It is also said that the motive assigned for the present abdication is that the Emperor now with Bismay Austria in the affairs of Italy, and withdraw from the risk of figuring personally in history as 'the man who lost Lombardy.' The Emperor Francis Joseph is a strong and strong-headed young man, he will not contest the fact that the Austrian Empire has lost its principal parts of his empire, and especially to Hungary, by which alone the Emperor is now depending over Austria could, perhaps, for a time be averted."

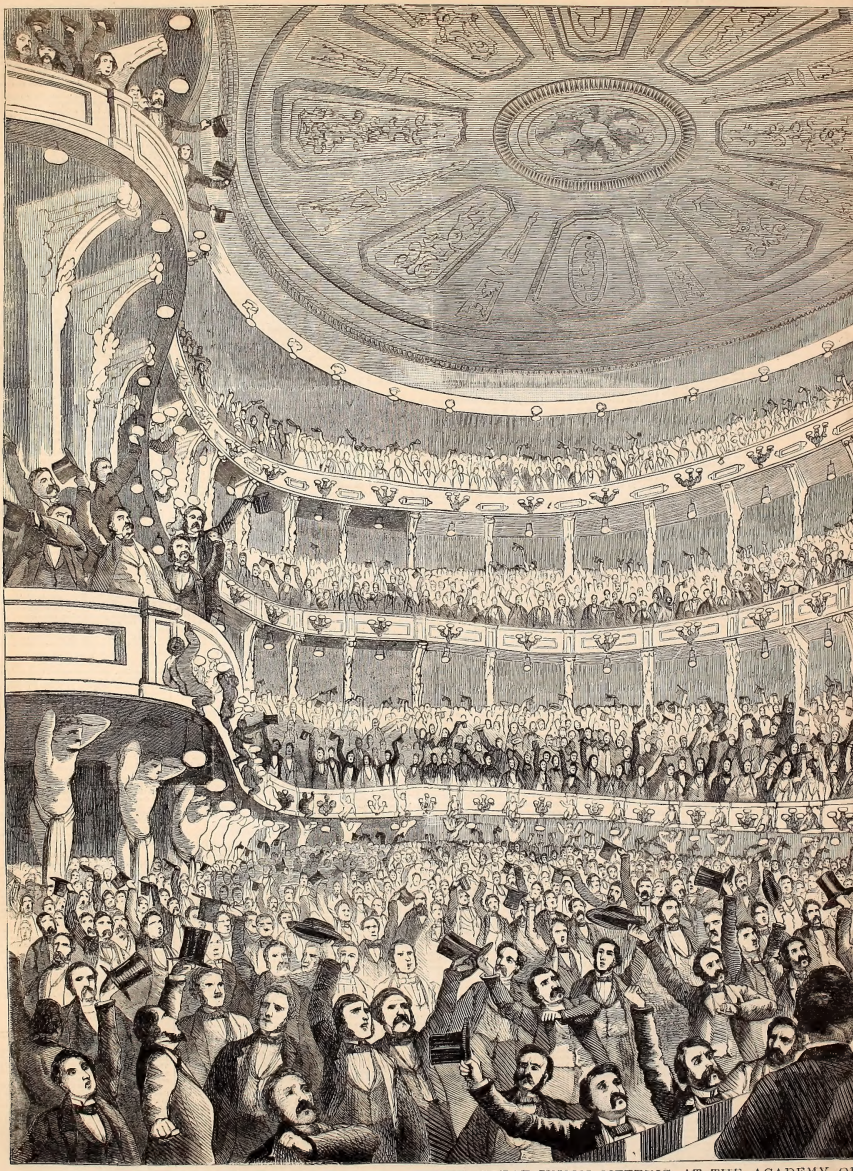
SPAIN.

THE WAR WITH MOROCCO.

A telegraphic dispatch from Madrid, dated December 10, announces as follows:

"The Spaniards have just obtained a new victory. The Moors, this time 10,000 strong, attacked the redoubt. Fighting lasted for several hours. The enemy were put to rout, which entered into line, for the first time, under the command of the Duke of Alcantara.

"The number of dead on the side of the Moors is more than 2,000. The Spanish troops have had about 500 killed and 40 killed and 320 wounded.



"The enemy receives reinforcements, and it is for the moment impossible to effect fresh embarkations."

The following dispatch was published at Madrid on the 10th:

"CASE ELOTTES, Friday Evening [9 inst.]:

"This morning the enemy impetuously attacked our redoubts, but were energetically repulsed by the gunners, and retired to the valley commanded by those redoubts. The enemy's loss in the sortie is great. We have reckoned and reptilized by 10,000 men of the Second Corps, serving as a reserve, and by the Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, and 10th corps.

"The enemy's loss is 40 killed, and 50 men wounded."

THE GREAT UNION MEETING AT THE ACADEMY O

AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL NOTES OF WASHINGTON IRVING.

WASHINGTON IRVING is dead! How reverently we think of him! How carefully we collect the scattered memories of old intercourse with him! How earnestly we attempt to preserve all that we may of new whose life was so precious to our hearts!

It was my happiness, on one occasion, to pass several hours in his company, when, in a remarkably happy frame of conversation, he related with graphic clearness various incidents in his life, each of which recalling another still farther removed from the present, he was led from point to point in his varied life, till many of its most interesting scenes passed successively before his mind and were included in the narrative addressed to him.

It was on the evening of May 16, 1857—Mr. Irving had completed his seventy-fourth year on the 3d of April—that I met him in conversation, health with a vigor and activity which few men of his years could boast, though already beginning to feel the effects of that unthankful difficulty which made his last days days of suffering.

As I had given us an account of his trip from the city that afternoon, when the fourth volume of the "Life of Washington," fresh from the publishers, had been handed about among a cluster of editors and literary friends and appreciatingly commented on.

His interest with grateful attention, and as the burden of his labors slid from his thoughts its theme sprang up with fresh interest. He remarked upon the reference made in his last volume to the neighboring localities, interesting in connection with the treason of Arnold.

As I have declined, starting up in his chair. "What a man! What bright prospects he threw away!" "What a fate! What a warning!" "What abilities he had!" "What a speech that was of his at Quebec! Thrilling!" And he quoted the words, "I too in the way of my duty, and I fear not." Thrilling! If he had died then, what a name he would have left! How honored!" His voice falling, he musingly added, "And then, the Revolution, the Revolution—thrilling! How it brought out men's characters!"

In the pause which followed Mr. Irving's last words he was apparently passing over the successive acts in the drama, and as the possibility of a different termination came before his mind he exclaimed, "It would have been a dreadful thing had the English been successful in their most ruinous! wonderful! wonderful! This Revolution is a most thrilling theme! Poor Washington!" And the speaker's countenance answered to the earnest sympathy which his tone expressed.

"Poor Washington!" Mr. Irving repeated, "how he was neglected and betrayed! There he was, with his little handful of men, without food or clothing, discouraged, disheartened, fanning the flame, fanning the flame;" and he laid one foot in his chair as he repeated these words, extending his hands with quick, short movements.

"You have been more interested in Washington's character since commencing to write about him?"

"Oh yes, yes," he replied, "I admired him before, but I thought him cold—admirable, but cold. Not so; the weight of the nation rested upon him, and he was the only man that could have carried that war through. He was so conscientious, he never did a thing but it was first determined in his mind that it was right. No waverings; no questioning about what the world would think. And every thing came out so harmoniously and nobly. He never had a thought about the future appearance of things. He did what was right then, and let the future take care of itself, in the opinion of posterity what it might. And he had to act very often without giving his reasons; the enemy must not know his plans. He was willing to be misunderstood and incur the censure of the world that he might do right. He had a most luminous comprehension, and in all his letters there is not a word about glory; the idea doesn't seem to have had a place in his mind. And such wisdom, such far-sighted! wonderful wisdom!"

A frightened bird rustling in the branches above us called Mr. Irving's attention from the subject of his thoughts. The sunset was gone, and the evening becoming too cool to remain longer in the open air we all rose to enter the house.

One of the guests asked Mr. Irving his opinion of the comparative beauty of Scottish and American scenery. "Miserable country!" said he. "The Tweed is a good, lusty stream; we wouldn't think it worth looking at. Miserable country! Bath gray hills rising one above the other in a tame, sad way, point, nothing to take hold of, nothing of the richness and grandeur which our great forests give to this country. The first time (1816) I visited Scotland was just after Scott's poems had been so much enjoyed here. Waverley had been published a year, and Guy Mannering was just out. I was all eagerness to see Scotland, and every thing connected with Scott's writings. I could not entirely disguise from him my disappointment at finding the country what it was. Scott has done much, very much, just there in the vicinity of Abbotsford, but beyond, beyond, it was dreary enough. One day we were walking together, and came out upon an open spot from which we gained extensive views in every direction. Scott was pointing out to me localities of interest, many of which I had asked about as referred to in his poems. "There is Ben Lomond and there is Ben Nevis," said he, pointing first to one and then to another of the most barren hills which rise in the distance. I said, "This shows the power of poetry, Mr. Scott [he was not then a baronet]; this indifferent landscape you have clothed with such charms in the imagination that I come here, and it is more fascinating to me from the associations which you have connected with it than the most beautiful scenery which I ever beheld; this is indeed!" "Fine scenery! grand scenery!" said he; "he wouldn't take a compliment at the expense of the country. "I don't want any better scenery. I like these bare hills. Why, when I go to Scotland, in a few months I long for these heather hills so I have to come back to them. Why," said he, "if I couldn't see these gray hills I believe I should die!" And Mr. Irving, laughing heartily, brought his hand down upon the table with an illustrative blow.

"I spoke," said Mr. Irving, "of the strong contrast between the nakedness of the country we were then looking upon and that which I had been accustomed to. In my boyhood it was an important feature in every landscape, adding a remark on my conscience and excitement to it. I can too distinctly say, 'said Scott;' 'I once saw a piece of timber that had just come from America—a splendid piece of timber. Now, I cannot tell where it must have been! Oh, if I could see one of your grand old forests and have such trees around me!"

Allusion was made by the interesting map of passing one's early years in localities where there were strong natural points to fix upon. "Yes," said he, "there's no trouble in finding how scenery any one living in this vicinity. I don't believe there is a spot in the world in many respects superior to this. It was my misfortune to have been born in a young growing city, and there is not a landmark left of what was familiar to me in my childhood as in my home. It is constantly a new feeling, that of having it all gone; nothing left of the past! In Europe it is entirely different; generation after generation have lived together there, and the old man has it the same to return to that he left it when a boy. Here it changes constantly. Why, there's no trouble in finding the spot where they were when I was a boy. It has changed, utterly changed, even here in Tarrytown, and still through this neighborhood. The world was taken there is nothing as it used to be, not even the bridges. Poor Andre! How sad! Poor Andre! Poor Arnold!"

Some one speaking of Scotland as a more interesting country than England, the remark provoked Mr. Irving asked, "Have you never been at all? Oh, the continent is much preferable! It is a great deal richer than England, cheaper, too. And it is so well I didn't care to go back to England. The continent seemed quite like home to me. I was almost constantly there from 1815 to 1829, only once, and that during my first visit to Europe. My time was mostly spent in France, Germany, and Spain.

"In some respects traveling in Spain must be peculiarly interesting," I said.

"Oh! a man must be contrary for a traveler," he replied; "and yet most disagreeable for a person who expects the ordinary comforts of travelling. The want of the most common convenient must be made with reference to protection against robbers. If you send your most valuable baggage some days in advance, it will be one of the companies of muleteers who traverse the country in all directions, it will probably escape their property; but then you have the pleasure of insupplying them; a little gold will undoubtedly save him a thrashing, or something worse. One doesn't care to be murdered by them. They often keep a poor fellow in the woods with them for weeks, until a finger or ear is sent to some family, to his friends, by way of hint as to the object of his detention. Better have the gold on hand, and they will let you alone immediately. A prudent traveler never goes any distance into the country without a 'robber's watch.' These cheap things are to be had in any town, and if you take any desire to preserve a respectable one, you must have another of some sort to satisfy the villains. I was with Prescott in Spain, and during the three Months in Spain—when he was making preparations for his first journey among the mountains. Poor fellow! he was at that time going out and getting ready; he was armed to the teeth, yet was robbed twice in eighteen months. He wrote me a most amusing account of the first affair." "I continued Mr. Irving, smiling; "he stood stoically by and saw the 'robber's watch' go first into their sack, and his own quietly follow. The fellows were easily packed after the robbery," added Mr. Irving, with a droll expression.

"Poor fellow! at one time quite ill." "Were you never robbed, Mr. Irving?"

"No," said he, "not once in all the years I was in Spain, yet I was never armed. I had scores of narrow escapes. One night while I was living at the Alhambra, which is quite a long walk from the city, I was returning from a party in Granada. It was midnight, and not a creature moving. A path which, looking from the city, seems to have been dogged me from street to street till his intentions became unmistakable. He was just upon my heels as we entered the gate of the Alhambra building, where there was one of those little crosses that one frequently meets in that country, marking the spot where a traveler has been murdered. As we came near it I felt that my hour was come; now was his time to strike. I had determined to turn and face him, when, to my surprise, just before us, a torch-light procession appeared. It was a midnight funeral, under ordinary circumstances a sight dismal enough, with the long-robed priest and bevvy bier, but far otherwise to me at that moment. I believe it saved my life. The robber disappeared instantly, and I was not the first robbed and nearly killed on that very spot. The description of the brigand answered perfectly to the one I gave him, when questioned by the police, as to what I was the same man."

The course of conversation then very naturally turned upon Mr. Irving's residence in the Alhambra. He spoke of scenes in his life in that place in a most graphic but fragmentary way, giving us occasionally an exquisite bit of finished description, graceful as the delicate sculpture of the fairy halls through which he led us. Then, leaving a broad blank untouched, he would bring into strong relief, with a few bold strokes, battlement or tower, or the lofty arch of some neighboring hall.

"Those who have read his volume entitled "The Alhambra" are familiar with the members of the little family of which he formed a part while living among those ruins: "The good dame Tia Antonia," the matron of the place, with her pretty little niece, "bright-eyed Dolores;" Mateo Ximenes, the "son of the Alhambra," his self-imposed sexton and constant attendant; and Manuel, the half-cousin and lover of charming little Dolores. These names were mentioned by Mr. Irving in the evident delight at the old favorite friends.

In alluding to his "Alhambra," he said there was nothing premeditated in it; he had written about himself in that book, and remarked that all the stories were facts or legends which he gathered from various sources, saying that there was but much romance in the facts themselves to be improved by the imagination.

"It was a happy time," said he, "but full of the most romantic fascination. I took a fancy at one time to a suit of rooms quite remote from that part of the palace usually occupied by Tia Antonia and her family, and in which I had previously had my apartments. The good dame was quite shocked at my moving to such miserable quarters, and the whole family were horrified at the danger I was placing myself in. But I was not to be deterred from my purpose. That evening the family joined in making their legends of the place so frightful as possible: murdered men guarding certain hidden treasures, ghostly hulls echoing midnight mutterings, were strongly dwelt upon to dissuade me, if possible, from passing the night in the "haunted rooms." But the dear Dolores and her cousin [they were lovers and were afterward married," said Mr. Irving, parenthetically], "with light lanterns, led the way to my distant apartments. We passed through immense halls and long echoing corridors in darkness, and all was absolutely opaque. As they left me at my door, Dolores, with a look as mournful as it this were to be the last act of her life, gave me the small lantern in my hands, and Manuel, with extended arms, solemnly repeated a benediction over me. The sound of the great key turning in the rusty lock caused them side to side as I closed the heavy door. I was alone in the stately sleeping apartment which had been in such humble use for so long a time, and overcome with loneliness and excitement, I rushed out of my room, and alone, with my lantern, explored hall and corridor and chapel, till, tired out, I threw myself upon a couch in a spacious apartment in which was an immense basin of the purest water, where in summer I often bathed. The place was full of the most horrible darkness, I heard moans and clanking chains and unmistakable human shriek! A feeling of fear and loneliness came over me, and I was glad to lie down, but this was too much. I rushed to my room, and, with a sigh of relief, locked my door.

"I slept well, notwithstanding the excitement," added Mr. Irving, smilingly, as his features relaxed from their serious expression to the fountain playing in the bright sunlight, and the grass and flowers as fresh and fragrant as if I had not suspected them of treason. I have always claimed of the agitations of the previous night; but the remembrance of those shrieks and rattling chains was too intensely real to be summoned by imagination, and I was glad to hear Ximenes's explanation in the fact that a lunatic brother of my good hostess was occasionally confined there, and in his most romantic place," he added, "that whole vicinity. You can't conceive any thing like it; and the city of Granada—a most romantic place. I wrote 'The Conquest of Granada' on the very spot."

Without interrupting the conversation, tea, with simple refreshments usual in that hour, was set and were sitting, and as the hours moved on Mr. Irving's spirits seemed to rise and his communications were made in a more active interesting gleam. Pictures of his life in a country house a few miles beyond the walls of Seville. There, in the midst of a lane, unpretending to the dignity of even the eye except the lazy stream that drags itself along over the yellow sand, he spent several months, his only companion and friend whom he called Don Shall, an English gentleman, whose acquaintance he had made in traveling. The house was a low one, inclosed by a high white-washed wall, and at sunset the gates were locked, and they were shut in for the night. Looking from the upper windows, which Mr. Irving spoke of as about four times the size of the small room we were in. their evenings were often spent in the terrace roof following or conversation. From that place they sometimes watched, in the gathering darkness, a single horseman or occasional group of wood-laden fellows crossing the open plain. "As they drew nearer," said Mr. Irving, 'and their appearance and weapons gave rather an unpleasant hint that we were not the most peaceable character, Hall would say, 'They have come for us now'" And when their footsteps resounded upon the stones that led to our entrance, and the gate opened to admit them, and was relocked after them, a momentary thrill of danger ran through us, from the thought of our being so completely at the mercy of such creatures. We had not the most perfect confidence either in Costa, the keeper of the house, and strongly suspected his being in league with the banditti. We had nothing of value with us, and kept our doors open, lest they should imagine they contained bags of gold.

One evening I was late in returning from Seville, and, coming near a crossing of the stream, I saw a man, fearfully armed, sitting in the middle of the bridge, as if to dispute its passage. Just before reaching him I passed a small pile of stones, forming one of those rude crosses to remind the passer-by to offer a prayer for the soul of the poor creature murdered on that spot. When I saw him lying motionless, I paused before him, and—Mr. Irving hesitated, smiled, and crossed himself. "I was riding Hall's powerful black horse, and as I reached the bridge the man did not move, but sat fiercely grasping his gun. I had never shown the white feather; should I turn now? While I was debating the horse went on into the stream just under the man. In answer to the salutation which is always given in casual meetings, he gave me a courteous bow, lifting his hat, and I passed.

The two friends spent a part of the summer at the St. Mary's, opposite Cadiz. "Hall was skeptical," said Mr. Irving, "and often, of an evening, while the sea was roaring without, would talk for hours of the unreality of the future state, of his doubts, and of the possibility of the annihilation of spirits. In the fervor of the moment, on one occasion, he promised most solemnly that, if he died first, he would die first, and he could come to me from the land of spirits, he would do so. Not long after I went to Seville to spend the winter, and that winter, I had scarcely arrived when I received word that a fall from his horse had produced a hemorrhage which resulted in almost instant death. With this news his horse, with every thing belonging to him, was sent on to me. That evening I visited the house near Seville where we had lived so long together. I rode his horse over that dreary plain, was alone in that desolate place where he had been my only friend. It was the most awful night in my life," said Mr. Irving, "that when I entered his room that evening. There was every thing just as he had left it; his negro, both, his study, as he had sat in it, the little lamp on the table dimly lighting the vaulted chamber, every thing as it had been when we had spent long evenings talking together. Those conversations returned to me with startling interest. I remembered the promise he had made to me. I was intensely excited, and [Mr. Irving whispered the words] I included for ghosts."

Our excitement had increased with the strong emotion of the speaker. Every inflection of his voice, every change in his countenance, every motion of his hand, showed that this had been an occasion of uncommon interest to him. We had yielded ourselves to the mighty influence which he infused into his manner of relating this strange incident. As he paused we were each ready to start at any unusual sound, and when the wind rushed by from in the recesses of a deep window whose curtained drapery hung in heavy folds behind him.

It was a positive relief when he spoke again, with an entirely altered tone and manner, as if wishing to check the emotion which he had allowed to break the current of his gentle flow of spirit which had evidently moved us with unusual power. "He never came! He never came!" he repeated, "and if he could have done so, I know he would. It was a very strong case, and to me a sufficient proof of the falsity of Spiritualism."

By request Mr. Irving soon led our thoughts from the shadowy region of excitement to which he had taken us, and gave us several fanciful descriptions of his life in his little cottage. Among them was a gay picture of a horseback ride in company with Mr. Queen of Spain, and Don Shall.

Speaking of his long absence from the United States, some one asked if he was not at times homesick. "Homesick!" he smilingly repeated. "My home was there. I left America under distressing circumstances, and all the first of my visit was most unpleasant. I had no desire to return, and had nothing to return to. I was in disgrace, a bankrupt!" said Mr. Irving, in a manner which showed that he felt acutely. Then, with one of peculiar trial, the memory of which could bring from him an expression of such bitter suffering.

"With no hope for commercial purposes he had been admitted by his two elder brothers as a partner with them in an extensive mercantile concern which was carried on business in both in New York and Liverpool. The sudden close of the war of 1812 caused great reverses in the financial world. Their house suffered severely. My youngest brother left New York for Liverpool early in the spring of 1815. "On my arrival," said he, "I found that my eldest brother had died, and had failed, and had been for some time at a watering-place. I suspected that things were going wrong, and perfect ignorance of every thing about business affairs I came in and made them teach me. It was all wrong; I turned every thing out and began anew; every thing was in confusion. As I began to learn the business I saw the difficulties, the brokers ahead. For two years I struggled against it. It was deep in commerce; with the change in the war came a fall in every thing."

In short business sentences Mr. Irving recapitulated the acts in the drama so tragic to him; the certainty of ruin; the struggle to keep up the position of the house; the sacrifice of every thing; the horror of asking to have a note renewed; ashamed to look any body in the face, yet struggling to keep up appearances. "It is a struggle with one's pride," said he, "yet the disgrace must be kept off as long as possible. There it was, day after day; week after all day and night to bed him, a wreck of sleep, for three hours perhaps, and then wake up; thump, thump, thump, all the hours that he could to answer sleep for that night; then up and off to the coffee-house to see the wind dial; wind due east, due east, due after day, no ships coming in, no payments must be made, and nowhere for remittances to come from. Then comes an invitation to a grand dinner; I go to keep up appearances; I sit at the table half asleep; no life for any thing; stupid myself and every body else stupid; stay here three mortal hours; then to bed with three hours of broken sleep again; and the same thing over, day after day, week after week. Oh! what a two years! Nothing would tempt me to another such. Nor would he an inducement. How I grew old!" Then suddenly starting up he exclaimed, "How came I to talk almost this? Miserable subject! I never think of it; I don't want to think about it."

At the time of this conversation the great financial crisis of 1857 was drawing near, failures were becoming frequent, and business men felt the pressure of the panic that was commencing. In connection with some remarks made in reference to these facts Mr. Irving emphatically exclaimed, "When a man fails you needn't pity him; the agony is over. The time for pity is before. There he is, knowing what must come—afraid to tell his wife—can't deny his children—don't know how to curtail. Misery! misery! How I pity those men! No one knows what beds they lie on—no one knows what bad days and nights there are which men's homes in that city of New York."

Mr. Irving never held the mind long on the pathetic; it had been possible, he would have smoothed every sharp corner in the universe, that nothing might suffer from contact with it. He passed rapidly by a lighter tone: "They can't make their daughters' hoops smaller." Then, turning to the ladies, he added, in parenthesis: "All this trouble has come since the great hoops came in fashion"; and then continued: "And these great dinners; they can't cut down their dinners—they must all be Lord Mayor's dinners. The world seems to think that a man's digestive powers increase with his wealth—one sees it in gold and silver. You can't have a good old-fashioned, cosy dinner, nowadays, of a simple joint of meat, and get through in reasonable time; there must be a dozen courses, and then you can't eat what you like, but must take a little of every thing; and then the flummery comes after all the rest, and you must take candy and bonbons home to make the children sick. And these great, long tables! could have twenty to sit down—only a modest man can't say any thing—once get stuck between two dull people, and you are fixed for three months at least. Have a round table, and every body can talk together, and all enjoy it; but a table half a dozen yards long is too bad —a modest man can't talk—no one but a bold, noisy fellow can say any thing—and of course the diners are stupid affairs."

Reference was made to the commencement of his literary career, he alluded in a light, passing way, to what he had written previous to the "Sketch Book," and said: "That anxiety and trouble in England, disgusted me with business and literature for a year. I had just started with the 'Sketch Book,' when I received a letter from my brother William, telling me he had obtained a situation for me as clerk in the Navy. I declined the offer but couldn't give my reasons. My brother was disappointed and mortified; I knew he would be, and so distressed me that for two months I couldn't write a line. I had given up all for the muse, and the muse deserted me! When I wrote again it was to some purpose. I had now enough to commence publishing in numbers. When the first number was out, I sent it to my brother, telling him he was what I had been doing, and that I felt there was something more in me than had yet been developed; I had determined to make this effort, and failed, I was willing to cut work, draw water, dig, or do any thing."

As he left, he told the ladies they must not forget their promise to take a ride with him to the Sleepy Hollow in "apple-blossom time." Who could forget such an invitation?

Apple-blossom time is forever past at Sunnyside. The golden fruit has been garnered. We gather a few autumn leaves ere they are faded by time, or scattered by careless winds.

XIII.

HALF an hour later I was back at the house and was informing Miss Halcombe of all that had happened.

She listened to me from beginning to end with a steady, silent attention, which, in a woman of her temperament and disposition, was the strongest proof that could be offered of the serious manner in which my narrative affected her.

"Mr. Gilmore agrees me," were all she said when I had done. "My mind misgives me sadly about the future."

"The future may depend," I suggested, "on the use we make of the present. It is not improbable that Anne Catherick may speak more readily and unreservedly to a woman than she has spoken to me. If Miss Fairlie—"

"Not to be thought of for a moment," interposed Miss Halcombe, in her most decided manner.

"Let me suggest, then," I continued, "that you should see Anne Catherick yourself, and that all you can to win her confidence. For my own part, I shrink from the idea of alarming the poor creature a second time, as I have most unhappily alarmed her already. Do you see any objection to accompanying me to the farm-house to-morrow?"

"None whatever. I will go any where and do any thing to serve Laura's interests. What did you say the place was called?"

"You must know it well. It is called Todd's Corner."

"Certainly. Todd's Corner is one of Mr. Fairlie's farms. Our dairy-maid here is the farmer's second daughter. She gets sweetbread and forward constantly between this house and her father's farm, and she may have heard or seen something which it may be useful for us to know. Shall I ascertain at once if the girl is down stairs?"

She rang the bell, and sent the servant with his message. He returned, and announced that the dairy-maid was then at the farm. She had not been there for the last three days, and the housekeeper had given her leave to go home for an hour or two that evening.

"I can speak to her to-morrow," said Miss Halcombe, when the servant had left the room again. "In the mean time, let me thoroughly understand the object to be gained by my interview with Anne Catherick. Is there no doubt in your own mind that the person to be confined her in the Asylum was Sir Percival Glyde?"

"There is not the shadow of a doubt. The only mystery that remains is the mystery of his motive. Looking to the great importance to him of his station in life and his character to preclude all idea of the most distant relationship between them, it is of the last importance—even assuming that she could be induced to tell us—to place under restraint—to know why he should have been the person to assume the serious responsibility of putting her there."

"In a private Asylum, I think you said?"

"Yes, in a private Asylum, where a sum of money which no person could afford to give must have been paid for her maintenance as a patient."

"I see where the doubt lies, Mr. Hartright; and I promise you that it shall be set at rest, whether Anne Catherick assists us to-morrow or not. Sir Percival Glyde shall not be a day in his house without satisfying Mr. Gilmore, and satisfying me. My sister's future is my dearest care in life, and I shall be sharp enough over her to give me some power, where her marriage is concerned, in the disposal of it."

She paused for the first time.

After breakfast the next morning an obstacle, which the events of the evening before had put out of my memory, interposed to prevent our proceeding immediately to the farm. This was my last day at Limmeridge House; and it was necessary, as soon as the post came in, to follow Miss Halcombe's example, and ask Mr. Fairlie's permission to shorten my engagement by a month, in consideration of an unforeseen necessity for my presence in London.

Fortunately for the probability of this excuse, so far as appearances were concerned, the post brought me nothing by the morning delivery that morning. I took them away at once to my own room, and sent the servant with a message to Mr. Fairlie, requesting to know when I could see him on a matter of business.

I awaited the man's return, free from the slightest feeling of anxiety on the one matter in which his master might receive my application. With Mr. Fairlie's leave or without it I must go. The consciousness of this gave me full self-possession to draw up the letter in which I was to ask, for the first step on the dreary journey which was henceforth to separate my life from Miss Fairlie's second to have informed me, without any reference to my own affairs, that Mr. Fairlie's health was in such a condition as to make it necessary for me to remain a solitary prisoner in his own room. A verbal message to this effect would have done, but he never been well enough to see me for a second time. The servant took every fresh batch of drawing that I produced for my employer, but his master with my "respects," and returned empty-handed with Mr. Fairlie's "kind compliments," "best thanks," and "sincere regrets" that the state of his health still obliged him to remain a solitary prisoner in his own room. A verbal satisfactory arrangement on both sides could not possibly have been adopted. It would be hard to say which of us, under the circumstances, felt the most grateful for the obliging solution to Mr. Fairlie's accommodating nerves.

I sat down at once to write the letter, expressing myself in it as briefly, clearly, and as civilly as possible. Mr. Fairlie did not hurry his reply. Nearly an hour elapsed before the answer was placed in my hands. It was written with beautiful regularity and neatness of character, in violet-colored ink, on note-paper as smooth as ivory and almost as thick as cardboard: and it addressed me in these terms:

"Mr. Fairlie's compliments to Mr. Hartright. Mr. Fairlie is more surprised and disappointed than he can express (in his present delicate state of health) by Mr. Hartright's application. Mr. Fairlie is not a man of business, but he has considered his annual, ruling income sufficient to transform Mr. Fairlie's opinion that Mr. Hartright's request to be allowed to break his engagement can not be justified by any necessity whatever, excepting perhaps a case of life and death. If the highly-appreciative feeling toward Art and its professors, which Mr. Hartright mentions as happiness of Mr. Fairlie's suffering existence to cultivate, could be easily shaken, Mr. Hartright's present proceeding would be sufficient. It has not done so—except in the instance of Mr. Hartright himself.

"Having stated his opinion—so far, that is to say, as acute nervous suffering will allow him to state any thing—Mr. Fairlie has nothing to add but the expression of his decision, in reference to the highly irregular application that has been made to him. Mr. Fairlie has not yet made up mind being to the last degree important in his case, Mr. Fairlie will not suffer Mr. Hartright to disturb that repose by remaining in the house under circumstances of an essentially irritating nature to both sides. Accordingly, Mr. Fairlie waves his right of refusal, purely with a view to the preservation of his own tranquillity—and informs Mr. Hartright that he may go."

I folded the letter up, and put it away with my other papers. The time that had been when I should have resented it as an insult: I accepted it now as a written release from my engagement. It was a relief to my mind, it was almost out of my memory, when I went down stairs to the breakfast-room and informed Miss Halcombe that I was ready to walk with her to the farm.

"Has Mr. Fairlie given you a satisfactory answer?" she asked, as I left the door.

"He has allowed me to go, Miss Halcombe."

She looked up at me quickly; and then, for the first time, noticed the letter in my hand and the arm of her own accord. No words could have expressed so delicately that she understood how the permission to leave my employment had been granted, and that she gave me her sympathy, not as my superior, but as my friend. I had not felt my own mean's loneliest letter, but I felt deeply the woman's stoning kindness.

On our way to the farm we arranged that Miss Halcombe was to conduct the first interview, and that I was to wait outside, within call. We adopted this mode of proceeding from no apprehension of a hostile reference, after what had happened in the church-yard the evening before, might have the effect of renewing Anne Catherick's violence, and of rendering her still additionally distrustful of the advances of a lady who was a stranger to her. Miss Halcombe left me, at the entrance of the yard, with the first instance, to the farmer's wife (of whose family she knew by her name as well as she was well assumed), while I waited for her in the near neighborhood of the house.

I had little more than a quarter of an hour to be left alone for some time. To my surprise, however, little more than five minutes had elapsed before Miss Halcombe returned.

"Does Anne Catherick refuse to see you?" I asked, in astonishment.

"Anne Catherick is gone," replied Miss Halcombe.

"Gone!"

"Gone, with Mrs. Clements. They both left the farm at eight o'clock this morning."

I could say nothing—I could only feel that our last chance of discovery had gone with them.

"All that Mrs. Todd knows about her guests is, I know," Miss Halcombe went on; "and it leaves me, as it leaves her, in the dark. They both came back safe, last night, after they left you, and they went away in the first part of the evening with Mr. Todd's family, as usual. Just before supper-time, however, Anne Catherick startled them all by being suddenly seized with faintness. She had had a similar attack, of a less alarming kind, on the day she arrived at the farm; and Mrs. Todd had conducted it, on that occasion, with something like more than reading at the time in our local newspaper, which lay on the farm table, and which she had taken up only a minute or two before."

"Does Mrs. Todd know what particular passage in the newspaper affected her in that way?" I inquired.

"No," replied Miss Halcombe. "She had looked it over, and had seen nothing in it to agitate any one. I asked leave, however, to look it over myself, and found on the top of the page I opened I found that the editor had enriched his small stock of news by drawing upon our family circular, and published my sister's marriage engagement, among his other announcements, copied from the London papers. Mr. Marriage and Mr. Arrive. I concluded at once that this was the paragraph which had so strangely affected Anne Catherick; and I thought I saw in it also the origin of the letter which she sent to our house the next day."

"There can be no doubt in either case. But what did you do when your second attack of faintness yesterday evening?"

"Nothing. The cause of it is a complete mystery. Mrs. Clements and I were sitting in the room. The only visitor was our dairy-maid, who, as told you, is one of Mr. Todd's daughters; and the only employment was the usual gossip and about local affairs. They heard her cry out, and saw her turn deadly pale, without the slightest apparent reason. Mrs. Todd and Mrs. Clements took her up stairs; and Mrs. Clements returned with me. They were heard talking together until long after the usual bedtime; and, early this morning, Mrs. Clements took Mrs. Todd's place, and they left the farm. If any power of expression by saying that they must go. The only explanation Mrs. Todd could extract from Anne Catherick, that something had happened, which was not the fault of any one at the farm-house, but which was serious enough to make Anne Catherick resolve to leave Limmeridge immediately. It was quite useless to press Miss Clements to be more explicit. She only shook her head, and said that, for Anne's sake, she must beg and pray that no one would question her. All she could repeat, with every appearance of the most unaffected honesty, was that Anne must go, that she must go with her, and that the destination to which they thought both ladies would be best to keep the secret from every body. I spare you the recital of Mrs. Todd's boundless remonstrance and refusals. It ended in her driving them both to the nearest station, more than three hours since. She tried hard, on the way, to get them to speak more plainly; but without success. And she set them down outside the station-door, an hour and a half before the commencement of the departure and their unfriendly reluctance to place the least confidence in her, that she drove away in anger, without so much as stopping to bid them good-by. That is exactly what has taken place. Search your own memory, Mr. Hartright, and tell me if any thing happened in the burial-ground yesterday evening which can at all account for the extraordinary departure of these two women this morning."

"I should like to account first, Miss Halcombe, for the sudden change in Anne Catherick which alarmed them at the farm-house, hours after she and I had parted, and when there appeared to be no cause for any violent agitation that I might have been unfortunate enough to cause. Did you inquire particularly about the gossip which was going on in the room when she turned faint?"

"Yes. But Mrs. Todd's household affairs seem to have engrossed her attention while evening with the talk in the farm-house parlor. Mrs. Todd could tell me that it was 'just the news'—meaning, I suppose, that they all talked as usual about each other."

"My dairy-maid's memory may be better than her mother's," I said. "It may be as well for you to speak to the girl, Miss Halcombe, as soon as we get back."

My suggestion was acted on the moment we returned to the house. Miss Halcombe led me round to the servants' offices, and we found the girl in the dairy, with her sleeves tucked up to her shoulders, cleaning a large milk-pan, and singing lustily over her work.

"I have brought this gentleman to see your dairy, Hannah," said Miss Halcombe. "It is one of the sights of the house, and it always does you credit."

The girl blushed and courtsied, and said, shyly, that she hoped she always did her best to keep things neat and clean.

"You have just come from your father's," Miss Halcombe continued. "I dare say there yesterday evening, I hear; and you found visitors at the house?"

"Yes, miss."

"One of them was taken faint and ill, I am told? I suppose nothing was said or done to frighten her? You were not talking of any thing very terrible, were you?"

"Oh no, miss," said the girl, laughing. "We were only talking of the news."

"Your sisters told you the news at Todd's Corner, I suppose?"

"Yes, miss."

"And you told them the news at Limmeridge House?"

"Yes, miss. And I'm quite sure nothing was said to frighten the poor thing, for I was talking about my own self. When it's my turn, it's my turn, miss, to see it, never having been taken faint myself."

Before any more questions could be put to her, she was called away to receive a basket of eggs at the dairy door. As she left us, I whispered to Miss Halcombe,

"Ask her if she happened to mention, last night, that visitors were expected at Limmeridge House."

Miss Halcombe showed me, by a look, that she understood, and put the question as soon as the dairy-maid returned to us.

"Oh yes, miss; I mentioned that," said the girl, simply. "The company coming, and the preparations for the bridal cozy, was all the news I had to take to the farm."

"Did you mention names? Did you tell them that Sir Percival Glyde was expected on Monday?"

"Yes, miss—I told them Sir Percival Glyde was coming. I hope there was no harm in it; I hope I didn't do wrong."

"Oh no, no harm. Come, Mr. Hartright; Hannah will begin to think us in the way if we interrupt her any longer over her work."

The girl courtsied, and looked at one another the moment we were alone again.

"Is there any doubt in your mind now, Miss Halcombe?"

"Sir Percival Glyde shall remove that doubt, Mr. Hartright—or, Laura Fairlie shall never be his wife."

XIV.

As we walked round to the front of the house, a fly from the station-house approached to meet the drive. Miss Halcombe waited on the door-steps until the fly drew up; and then advanced to shake hands with the one old gentleman who got out briskly the moment the steps were let down. Mr. Gilmore had arrived.

I looked at him, when we were introduced to each other, with an interest and a curiosity which I should have concealed. This old man was to remain at Limmeridge House after I had left it; he was to hear Sir Percival Glyde's explanations, and to act as the adviser, under the assistance of his experience in forming her judgment; he was to wait until the question of the marriage or no marriage was decided, if that question were decided in the affirmative, was to draw the settlement which bound Miss Fairlie to become Sir Percival Glyde's wife. Even then, when I knew nothing by comparison with what I know now, I looked at the family lawyer with an interest which I had never felt before in the presence of any man breathing who was a total stranger to me.

In external appearance Mr. Gilmore was the exact opposite of the conventional idea of an old lawyer. He was fat, corpulent, and jolly; his white hair was worn rather long and kept carefully brushed; his black coat, waistcoat, and trowsers, fitted him with perfect neatness; his white cravat was carefully tied; and his lavender-colored kid gloves might have adorned the hands of a fashionable clergyman without fear and without reproach. His manners were pleasantly marked by the formal grace and refinement of the old school of politeness, qualified by the invigorating sharpness and readiness of a man whose business in life obliges him always to keep his faculties in good working order. A sanguine constitution and fair prospects to begin with; a long subsequent career of creditable and comfortable prosperity; a cheerful, diligent, widely-respected old age—such were the general impressions I derived from my introduction to Mr. Gilmore; and it is but fair to him to add, that the knowledge I gained by later and better experience only tended to confirm them.

I left the old gentleman and Miss Halcombe to enter the house together, and to talk of family matters undisturbed by the restraint of a stranger's presence. They crossed the hall on their way to the drawing-room, and I descended the steps again, to wander about the garden alone.

My hours were numbered at Limmeridge House; my departure the next morning was irrevocably settled: my share in the investigation which the anonymous letter had rendered necessary was at an end. No harm could be done to any one but myself, if I let my heart loose again, for the little time that was left me, from the cold cruelty of restraint which necessity had forced me to inflict upon it, and took my farewell of the scenes which were associated with the brief days of my time of happiness and my love.

I turned instinctively to the walk beneath my study-window, where I had seen her the evening before—to her little dog, and followed the path which her dear feet had trodden so often, till I came to the wicket-gate that led into her rose garden. The winter breezes spread unheedfully over it now. The flowers that she had taught me to distinguish by their names, the flowers that I had taught her to paint from, were gone; and the tiny white paths that led between the beds were damp and green already. I went on to the avenue of trees, where we had breathed together the warm fragrance of August evenings; where we had admired together the myriad combinations of shade and sunlight that dappled the ground at our feet. The leaves fell about me from the groaning branches, and the earthy decay in the atmosphere chilled me to the bones. A little farther on, and I was out of the grounds and following the lane that wound gently upward to the nearest hills. The old felled tree by the wayside, on which we had sat to rest, was sodden with rain; and the tuft of ferns and grasses which I had shaded for her, nestling under the rough stone-wall in front of us, had turned to a pool of water stagnating round an islet of draggled weeds. I gained the summit of the hill, and looked at the view which we had so often admired in the happier time. It was cold and barren—it was no longer the view that I remembered. The sunshine of her presence was far from me; the charm of her voice no longer murmured in my ear. She had talked to me, on the spot from which I now look down, of her father, who was her last surviving parent; had told me how fond of each other they had been, and how sadly the mind him still, when she entered certain rooms in the house, and when she took up forgotten occupations and amusements with which he had been associated. What the view that I had seen, while listening to those words, the view that I saw now, standing on the hill-top by myself! I turned and left it; I wound my way back again, over the moor and round the sandhills, down to the beach. There was the white rage of the surf, and the multitudinous glory of the leaping waves; but where was the place on which she had once drawn idle figures with her parasol in the sand—the place where we had sat together, while she talked to me about myself and my home, while she asked me a woman's minutely observant questions about my mother and my sister, and innocently wondered whether I should ever leave my lonely chambers and have a wife and a house of my own? Wind and wave had long since smoothed out the trace of her which she had left in those marks on the sand. I looked over the wide monotony of the sea-side prospect, and the place in which we two had idled away the sunny hours was as lost to me as if I had never known it—as strange to me as if I stood already on a foreign shore.

The empty silence of the beach struck cold to my heart. I returned to the house and the garden, where traces were left to speak of her at every turn.

On the west terrace walk I met Mr. Gilmore. He was evidently in search of me, for he quickened his pace when we caught sight of each other. The state of my spirits little fitted me for the society of a stranger. But the meeting was inevitable, and I resigned myself to make the best of it.

"You are the very person I wanted to see," said the old gentleman. "I have a few words to say to you, my dear Sir, and if you have no objection I will avail myself of the present opportunity. To put it plainly, Miss Halcombe and I have been talking over family affairs—affairs which are the cause of my being here—and, in the course of our conversation, she was naturally led to tell me of this unpleasant matter connected with the anonymous letter, and of the share which you have essentially and properly taken in the proceedings so far. That share, I quite understand, gives you an interest which you might not otherwise have felt in knowing that the future management of the investigation, which you have begun, will be placed in safe hands. My dear Sir, make your self quite easy on that point—it will be placed in my hands."

You are, in every way, Mr. Gilmore, much fitter to advise and to act in the matter than I am. It is an indiscretion, on my part, to ask if you have decided yet as to the course of proceeding?"

"So far as it is possible to decide, Mr. Hartright, I have decided. I mean to send a copy of the letter, accompanied by a statement of the circumstances, to Mr. Percival Glyde's solicitor in London, with whom I have some acquaintance. The letter itself I shall keep here, to show to Sir Percival as soon as he arrives. The tracing of the two women I have already provided for, by sending one of Mr. Fairlie's servants—an confidential person—to the station to make inquiries: the man has his money and his directions, and he will follow the women in the event of their leaving Hampden. This is all that can be done until Sir Percival comes on Monday. I have no doubt myself that every explanation which he may be expected from a gentleman and a man of honor he will readily give. Sir Percival stands very high, Sir—an eminent position, a magnificent estate—and—I feel quite easy about results; quite easy, I am rejoiced to assure you. Things of this sort happen constantly in families. Annoying, nervous letters—unfortunate woman—sad state of society. I don't deny that there are peculiar complications in this case, but they are, I repeat, is, most unhappily, common—common."

I am afraid, Mr. Gilmore, I have the misfortune to differ from you on the view I take of the case."

"Pooh, my dear Sir—just so. I am an old man, and I take the practical view. You are a young man, and you take the romantic view. Let us not dispute about trifles. We will, professionally, in an atmosphere of dispatation, Mr. Hartright; and I am only too glad to escape from it, as I am sure you are. We will wait for events—yes, yes; yes: we will wait for events. Charming place, this. Good shooting? Probably not—ah, no—Mr. Fairlie's land is preserved. I think. Charming place, though; and delightful people. You draw and paint, I hear, Mr. Hartright? Enviable accomplishment. What style?"

We dropped into general conversation—or, rather, Mr. Gilmore talked, and I listened. My attention was far from him, and from the topics on which he discoursed so fluently. The solitary walk of the morning had had strange and its effect on me—it had set the idea in my mind of hastening my departure from Limmeridge House. Why should I remain the hard trial of saying farewell by one unnecessary minute? What further service was required of me by any one? There was no useful purpose to be served by my stay in Cumberland; there was no restriction of time on the permission to leave me which my employer had granted to me. Why not end it, there and then?

I determined to end it. There were some hours of daylight still left—there was no reason why my journey back to London should not begin on that afternoon. I made the first civil excuse that occurred to me for leaving Mr. Gilmore; and returned at once to the house.

On my way up to my own room I met Miss Halcombe on the stairs. She saw, by the hurry of my movements and the change in my manner, that I had some new purpose in view, and asked what had happened.

I told her the reasons which induced me to think of hastening my departure, exactly as I have told them here.

"No, no," she said, earnestly and kindly, "leave us like a friend; break bread with us once more. Stay here and dine; stay here and help us to spend our last evening with you as happily, as like our first evening, as we can. It is my invitation; Mrs. Vesey's invitation—" she hesitated a little, and then added, "Laura's invitation as well."

I promised to remain. God knows I had no wish to leave even the shadow of a sorrowful impression with any one of them.

My own room was the best place for me till the dinner bell rang. I waited there till it was time to go down stairs.

I had not spoken to Miss Fairlie—I had not even seen her—all that day. The first meeting with her, when I entered the drawing-room, was a hard trial to her self-control and to mine. She, too, had done her best to make our last evening renew the golden by-gone time—the time that could never come again. She had put on the dress which I used to admire more than any other that she possessed—a dark-blue silk, trimmed quaintly and prettily with old-fashioned lace; she came forward to meet me with her former readiness; she gave me her hand with the frank, innocent good-will of happier days. The cold fingers that trembled round mine; the pale cheeks with a bright red spot burning in the midst of them; the faint smile that struggled to live on her lips and died away from them while I looked at it, told me at what sacrifice of herself her outward composure was maintained. My heart could take her no closer to me, and I felt that love loved her then as I had never loved her yet.

Mr. Gilmore was a great assistance to us. He was in high good-humor, and he led the conversation with unflagging spirit. Miss Halcombe seconded him resolutely; and I did all I could to follow her example. The kind blue eyes whose slightest changes of expression I had learned to interpret so well, looked at me appealingly when we first sat down to table. Help my sister—the sweet anxious face seemed to say—help my sister, and you will help me.

We got through the dinner, to all outward appearance at least, happily enough. When the ladies had risen from table, and when Mr. Gilmore and I were left alone in the dining-room, a new interest presented itself to occupy our attention, and to give me an opportunity of quieting myself by a few minutes of needful and welcome silence. The servant who had been dispatched to trace Anne Catherick and Mrs. Clement had returned with his report, and was shown into the dining-room immediately.

"Well," said Mr. Gilmore, "what have you found out?"

"I have found out, Sir," answered the man, "that both the women took tickets, at our station here, for Carlisle."

"You went to Carlisle, of course, when you heard that?"

"I did, Sir; but I am sorry to say I could find out further trace of them."

"You inquired at the railway?"

"Yes, Sir."

"And at the different inns?"

"Yes, Sir."

"And you left the statement I wrote for you at the police-station?"

"I did, Sir."

"Well, my friend, you have done all you could, and I have done all I could; and there the matter must rest till further notice. We have played our trump cards, Mr. Hartright," continued the old gentleman, when the servant had withdrawn. "For the present, at least, the women have outmaneuvered us; and our only resource now is to wait till Sir Percival Glyde comes here on Monday next. Won't you fill your glass again? Good bottle of port, that—sound, substantial wine. I have got better in my own cellar, though."

We returned to the drawing-room—the room in which the happiest evenings of my life had been passed; the room which, after this last night, I was never to see again. Its aspect was altered since the days had shortened and the weather had grown cold. The glass doors on the terrace side were closed, and hidden by thick curtains. Instead of the soft twilight obscurity, in which we used to sit, the bright radiant glow of lamplight now dazzled my eyes. All was changed—indoors and out, all was changed.

Miss Halcombe and Mr. Gilmore sat down together at the card-table; Mrs. Vesey took her customary chair. There was no restraint on the disposal of their evening; and I felt the restraint on the disposal of mine all the more painfully from observing it. I saw Miss Fairlie lingering near the music-stand. The time had been when I might have joined her there. I waited irresolutely—I knew neither where to go nor what to do next. She cast one quick glance at me, took a piece of music suddenly from the stand, and came toward me of her own accord.

"Shall I play some of those little melodies of Mozart's which you used to like so much?" she asked, opening the music nervously, and looking down at it while she spoke.

Before I could thank her she hastened to the piano. The chair near it, which I had always been accustomed to occupy, stood empty. She struck a few chords—then glanced round at me —then looked back again at her music.

"Won't you take your old place?" she said, speaking very abruptly, and in very low tones.

"I can't take it on the last night," I answered.

She did not reply: she kept her attention riveted on the music—music which she knew by memory, which she had played over and over again, in former times, without book. Only knew that she had heard me, I only knew that she was aware of my being close to her, by seeing the red spot on the cheek that was nearest to me, fade out, and the face grow pale all over.

"I am very sorry you are going," she said, her voice almost sinking to a whisper; her eyes looking more and more intently at the music, her fingers flying over the keys of the piano with a strange feverish energy which I had never noticed in her before.

"I shall remember those kind words, Miss Fairlie, long after to-morrow has come and gone."

The paleness grew whiter on her face, and she turned it further away from me.

"Don't speak of to-morrow," she said. "Let the music speak to us of to-night in a happier language than ours."

Her lips trembled—a faint sigh fluttered from them, which she tried vainly to suppress. Her fingers wavered on the piano; she struck a false note; confused herself in trying to set it right; and dropped her hands angrily on her lap. Miss Halcombe and Mr. Gilmore looked up in astonishment from the card-table at which they were playing. Even Mrs. Vesey, dozing in her chair, woke at the sudden cessation of the music, and inquired what had happened.

"You play at whist, Mr. Hartright?" asked Miss Halcombe, with her eyes directed significantly at the place I occupied.

I knew what she meant; I knew she was right; and I rose at once to go to the card-table. As I left the piano Miss Fairlie turned a page of the music, and touched the keys again with a surer hand.

"I will play it," she said, striking the notes almost passionately. "I will play it on the last night."

"Come, Mrs. Vesey," said Miss Halcombe: "Mr. Gilmore and I are tired of cards—come and be Mr. Hartright's partner at whist."

The old lawyer smiled satirically. His had been the winning hand; and he had just turned up a king. He exhibited it toward Miss Halcombe's abrupt change in the card-table arrangements to a lady's inability to play the losing game.

The rest of the evening passed without a word or a look from her. She kept her place at the piano; and I kept mine at the card-table. She played uninterruptedly—played as if the music was her only refuge from herself. Sometimes her fingers touched the notes with a lingering fondness, a soft, plaintive, dying tenderness, unutterably beautiful and mournful to hear—sometimes they faltered and failed her, or hurried over the instrument mechanically, as if their task was a burden to them. But still, change and waver as they might in the expression they imparted to the music, their resolution to play never faltered. She only rose from the piano when we all rose to say good-night.

"MY HEAD DROOPED OVER IT, MY TEARS FELL ON IT, MY LIPS PRESSED IT," ETC.

Mrs. Vesey was the nearest to the door, and the first to shake hands with me.

"I shall not see you again, Mr. Hartright," said the old lady. "I am truly sorry you are going away. You have been very kind and attentive; and an old woman, like me, feels kindness and attention. I wish you happy, Sir—I wish you a kind good-by."

Mr. Gilmore came next.

"I hope we shall have a future opportunity of bettering our acquaintance, Mr. Hartright. You quite understand about that little matter of business being safe in my hands? Yes, yes, of course. Bless me, how cold it is! Don't let me keep you at the door. Bon voyage, my dear Sir—bon voyage, in the French say."

Miss Halcombe followed.

"Half past seven to-morrow morning," she said; then added, in a whisper, "I have heard and seen more than you think. Your conduct to-night has made me your friend for life."

Miss Halcombe made. I could not trust myself to look at her when I took her hand, and when I thought of the next morning.

"My dear mamma will be very early one," I said. "I shall be gone, Miss Fairlie, before you."

"No, no," she interposed, hastily; "not before I am out of my room. I shall be down to breakfast to-morrow. I am not so ungrateful, not so forgetful of the past three months—"

Her voice failed her; her hand closed gently round mine, then dropped it suddenly. Before I could say "Good-night" she was gone.

The end comes fast to meet me—comes inevitably, as the light of the last morning came at Limmeridge House.

It was barely half past seven when I went down stairs, but I found them both at the breakfast-table waiting for me. In the chill air, in the dim light, in the gloomy morning science of the house, we three sat down together, and tried to eat, tried to talk. The struggle to preserve appearances was hopeless and useless, and I rose to end it.

As I held out my hand, to Miss Halcombe, who was nearest to me, took it. Miss Fairlie turned away suddenly and hurried from the room.

"Better so," said Miss Halcombe, when the door had closed—"better so, for you and for her."

I waited a moment before I could speak—it was hard to lose her, without a parting word or a parting look. I controlled myself; I tried to take leave of Miss Halcombe in fitting terms; but all the farewell words I would fain have spoken dwindled to one sentence.

"Have I deserved that you should write to me?" was all I could say.

"You have nobly deserved every thing that I can do for you, so long as we both live. Whatever the end is, you shall know it."

"And if I can ever be of help again, at any future time, long after the memory of my presumption and folly is forgotten—"

I could add no more. My voice faltered, my eyes moistened, in spite of me.

She rose, and, lost by both hands—she pressed them with the strong, steady grasp of a man—her dark eyes, clear brown complexion flushed deep—the force and energy of her face glowed and grew beautiful with the pure inner light of her generosity and her pity.

"I will trust you—if ever the time comes, I will trust you as my friend and her friend; as my brother, and her brother." She stopped; drew me nearer to her—the fearless, noble creature—touched my forehead, sister-like, with her lips; and kissed me by my Christian name. "God bless you, Walter," she said. "Walter, here alone, and compose yourself—I had better not stay for her and our sakes; I had better see you go from the balcony up stairs."

She left the room. I turned away toward the window, with nothing fixed nor bat the lonely autumn landscape—I turned away to master myself, before I, too, left the room in my turn, and left it forever.

A minute passed—it could hardly have been more—when I heard the door open again softly; and the rustling of a woman's dress on the carpet moved toward me. My heart beat violently as I turned round. Miss Fairlie was approaching me from the farther end of the room.

She stopped and hesitated when our eyes met, and when she saw that we were alone. Then, with that courage which women lose so often in the small emergency, and so seldom in the great, she came on nearer to me, strangely pale and strangely quiet, drawing one hand after her along the table by which she walked, and holding something in her side in the other, which was hidden by the folds of her dress.

"I only went into the drawing-room," she said, "to look for this. It may remind you of your visit here, and of the friends you leave behind you. You told me I had improved very much when I did it—and I thought you might like—"

She turned her head away, and offered me a little sketch drawn throughout by her own pencil, of the summer-house in which we had first met. The paper trembled in her hand as she held it out to me—trembled in mine as I took it from her.

I was afraid to say what I felt—I only answered: "I shall never leave you; all my life long it shall be the treasure that I prize most. I am very grateful for it—very grateful to you, for not letting me go away without bidding you good-by."

"Oh!" she said, innocently, "how could I let you go, after we have passed so many happy days together!"

"Those days may never return again, Miss Fairlie—my way of life and yours are very far apart. But if a time should come when the devotion of my whole heart and soul and strength will give you a moment's happiness or spare you a moment's sorrow, will you try to remember the poor drawing-master who has taught you? Miss Halcombe has promised to trust me—will you promise, too?"

The farewell sadness in the kind blue eyes shone dimly through her gathering tears.

"I promise it," she said, in broken tones. "Oh, don't look at me like that! I promise it with all my heart."

I ventured a little nearer to her, and held out my hand.

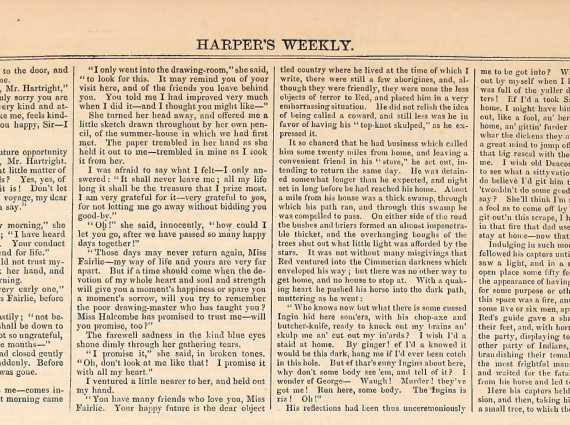
"You have many friends who love you, Miss Fairlie. Your happy future is the dear object of many hopes. May I say, at parting, that it is the dear object of my hopes too?"

The tears flowed fast down her cheeks. She rested one trembling hand on the table to steady herself, while she gave me the other. I took it in mine—I held it fast. My head drooped over it, my tears fell on it, my lips pressed it—not in love; oh, not in love, at that last moment, but in the agony and the self-abandonment of despair.

"For God's sake, leave me!" she said, faintly.

The confession of her heart's secret burst from her in those pleading words. I had no right to hear them, no right to answer them: they were the words that banished me, in the name of her sacred weakness, from the room. It was all over. I dropped her hand; I said no more. Miss Fairlie was shut her out from my eyes, and I dashed them away to look at her for the last time. One look, as she sank into a chair, as her arms fell on the table, as her fair head dropped on them wearily. One farewell look; and the door had closed on her—the great gulf of separation had opened between us—the image of Laura Fairlie was a memory of the past already.

AN ALABAMA BACKWOODS SKETCH.



REDHORN AND REDSKIN.

Of all things on the earth, or under it, or in the waters that encompass it round about, that ever crossed Redhorn's path, nothing animate or inanimate was so repugnant to him as Indians. With all his boasted prowess among people of his own color, he could not bear even the thought of encountering the red men of the forest, and the bare mention of their name was at any time sufficient to make him quake in his shoes. In the thinly-settled country where he lived at the time of which I write, there were still a few aborigines, and, although they were friendly, they were none the less objects of terror to Red, and placed him in a very embarrassing situation. He did not relish the idea of being called a coward, and still less was he in favor of having his "top-knot skulped," as he expressed it.

It so chanced that he had business which called him some twenty miles from home, and leaving a convenient friend in his "stove," he set out, intending to return the same day. He was detained somewhat longer than he expected, and night set in long before he had reached his home. About a mile from his house was a thick swamp, through which his path ran, and through this swamp he was compelled to pass. On either side of the road the bushes and briers formed an almost impenetrable thicket, and the overhanging boughs of the trees shut out what little light was afforded by the stars. It was not without many misgivings that Red ventured into the Cimmerian darkness which enveloped his way; but there was no other way to get home, and no house to stop at. With a quaking heart he pushed his horse into the dark path, muttering as he went:

"Wha knows now but what there is some cussed Ingin hid here somewhars, with his chop-axe and butcher-knife, ready to knock out my brains as quick as an' cut out my in'ards? I wish I'd a staid at home. By gingers! ef I'd a knowed it would be this dark, hang me if I'd ever been cotch in this hole. But ef that's every Ingian about here, why don't some body see 'em, and tell of it? I wonder of George— Waugh! Murder! they've got us! Run here, some body. The Ingins is fire! Oh!"

His reflections had been thus unceremoniously interrupted by his horse, which suddenly stopped with a loud snort, and appeared terribly frightened. Before Red had time to collect his thoughts at this interruption, his horse's bridle was seized, and to his utter astonishment and great terror he found himself in the rough grasp of four stalwart Indians!

He might have continued his outcries, but one of the savages produced a light, and drawing a large and dangerous-looking knife, signified to his prisoner that if he did not remain quiet he would draw it across his throat. With such imminent danger as this staring him in the face, poor Red could do no less than remain passive. One of the savages took the bridle, and turning the horse around, set off at a rapid walk; while the other three guarded the prisoner—one on each side, and the other behind. In this way they reached the creek, when they halted, and the warriors held a short consultation, from which Red could gather nothing, except that three of them appeared, from their actions, to be in favor of knocking him on the head and leaving him; this was earnestly opposed by the fourth, and finally they appeared to settle the matter, for they resumed their previous positions, and set off down the creek, still maintaining a strict silence.

"Looker here," at length said Red, losing all patience at this strange proceeding, "who, in the name o' Jehosaphat, are ye, any how, and what are ye so-scarvin' me for?"

"Ugh!" exclaimed the foremost Indian, at the same time ill-playing his flint again, and repeating his silent threat. Red was "allowed I'd not convinced," and closed his inquiries, but his grim guide should carry his threat into immediate execution, and discharge to his breathing apparatus. But they could not restrain his thoughts, which were running at a 2.40 rate, something after this fashion:

"Now ain't this a nice fix for a white feller like me to be got into? What a fool I was to ventur' out by myself when I knowed the whole country was full of the yuller devils as thick as muskeeters! If I'd a took Sally's advice, and staid at home, I might have his sofa; but no, I must eat out, like a fool, an' here I am—forty miles from home, an' gittin' fooder every minnit. I wonder whar the dickens they are a-carryin' me to? I've a great mind to jump off and give 'em a race; but that big rascal with the knife would lunge it into me. I wish old Deacon Bridges could here now, to see what a sitty-vation his son had come to. I do believe I'd git him to pray for me, and see ef 'twouldn't do some good. I wonder what'll Sally say? She'll think I'm served right for being such a fool as to come off by myself. Well, ef I should git out'n this scrape, I hope I may be hanged up in that fire that died used to pray about ef I don't stay at home—now that's so."

Indulging in such moody reflections as this, Red followed his captors until about midnight, when he saw a light, and in a short time reached an open place some fifty feet in diameter, which had the appearance of having been recently cleared out for some purpose or other. About the centre of this space was a fire, and around it were extended some five or six men, apparently asleep; but when Red's guide gave a shrill whoop they sprang to their feet, and, with horrid yells, advanced toward the party, displaying to the terrified prisoner another party of Indians, who rushed from the brushy thickets and from their tomahawks around his head in the most frightful manner. He closed his eyes and waited for the fatal blow, but he was pulled from his horse and led to the fire.

Here his captors held another animated discussion, and then, taking him by the arms, led him to a small tree, to which they firmly bound him, hand and foot.

"See here, Mr. Ingin," said he, "what have yer got me here for, any how?"

"He love you heap, me good friend," replied the savage, who then turned off, and, with the others, entered the woods. The prisoner thought they were now gone, and that he would yet escape; but he was doomed to disappointment, for they soon returned, each with an armful of dried brushwood, which they threw down at his feet, and one of them commenced piling it around him. He watched these proceedings for some time with much curiosity, until the pile had reached to his knees, when he could wait no longer.

"I say, Mr. Ingin, what are you doin' that fur?" he asked.

"He build pen; keep off wolf," answered the savage, still plying his work.

"Ugh!" grunted the Indian again, as the others returned with more wood, which they piled round him until it had reached his breast.

"Now me warm you," said the speaker, going to the fire and returning with a lighted brand, which he applied to the pile. The horrible truth now flashed on Red's mind; he was to be burned alive!

The sweat stood in beads on his forehead, and his hair rose on end.

"Oh, goodness!" he whined, "for God's sake, Mr. Ingin, let me off this time, and I'll give you a whole gallon o' whisky!"

"Ugh! you owned," replied the savage, slapping him on the cheek.

"Now, see here," roared Red, "quit yer co that agin, and I wish I may be cussed ef I don't kick your hashels out!" But here he thought of his helpless condition, and changed his tone to one of entreaty. But the fire still spread; it was beginning to warm him pretty thoroughly, and he was about to break forth again, when suddenly the Indians appeared to be listening intently. Then they tore down the fire, and throwing them selves on the ground became still as the dead. Greek to Red, and he was getting impatient, when the Indian who had tied him cautiously approached, brandishing his knife, and looking stealthily about him.

Making a sign to Red to remain silent, he cut the cord and pointed to his horse. He needed no second bidding, but mounted his steed and put spurs. Hardly had he got into the saddle when the warriors started to their feet, rushed after him with howls and yells of rage. Then occurred a stampede such as is seldom seen. The darkness of the night, and the thickness of the woods were forgotten, and Red never drew rein until he arrived at the creek, which, in his astonishment, he found he had never been more than a mile from. His pursuers halted at the river, but Red stopped not until he arrived at his own door.

It is but truth to add that the Indians were a synod of Red's neighbors dressed and painted for the occasion, who took this method of giving him a good fright. He never forgave them for it; neither did he forget the time when he came so near being made a martyr of by the "infernal red devils."

A New Volume of that popular and highly useful and instructive journal,

THE SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN,

Commences on the 1st January. Now is therefore the best time to subscribe in order to get the work complete for preservation and binding.

THE SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN has been published for nearly fifteen years, and is acknowledged to be the best weekly and most reliable journal of its class, and is read weekly by more than one hundred thousand people.

The numbers for a year, coating but $2, will contain between 500 and 600 pages of matter, written in popular style upon art, science, invention, mechanism, manufactures, agriculture, and all kindred subjects—illustrated by over 500 beautiful engravings—the whole forming a volume of useful and entertaining information, not to be found elsewhere.

From the long experience of the Editors and Publishers, and their abundant resources for gaining information, they are enabled to give a weekly resume of information in connection with the progress of invention and discovery beyond the reach of any other conteraporary. They are determined, as they enter upon the year 1860, to employ every facility in their reach to render it much the cheapest and most. It is the only journal published in New York which gives the claims of inventors patented each week.

U. S. PATENT OFFICE.

Hon. W. D. BISHOP, Commissioner.

IMPORTANT TO INVENTORS.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN PATENT SOLICITORS.—Messrs. MUNN & CO., Proprietors of the Scientific American, continue to procure Patents for Inventors in the United States and all foreign countries on the most liberal terms. Our experience of thirteen years' standing, and our facilities are unequaled by any other Agency in the world. The long experience we have had in preparing Specifications and Drawings enables us to perfectly coverteant with the mode of doing business at the United States Patent Office, and with most of the inventions which have been patented. Information concerning the patentability of inventions is given free, without charge, on sending a model or drawing and description to this office.

Consultation may be had with the firm, between 9AM and 9PM o'clock, daily, at their PRINCIPAL OFFICE, No. 37 Park Row, New York City. We have also established a BRANCH OFFICE in the CITY OF WASHINGTON, on the corner of F and 7th streets, Seventh Judicial District, United States Patent Office. This office is under the general supervision of one of the firm, and will be in daily communication with the Principal Office in New York, and personal attention will be given at the Patent Office to all such cases as may require it. Inventors and others who may visit Washington, having business at the Patent Office, are cordially invited to call at our office.

We have had extensively engaged in the preparation and securing of Patents in the various European countries. For the security of this business we have offices of Nos. 66 Chancery Lane, London; 29 Boulevard St. Martin, Paris, and 26 Rue des Eperonniers, Brussels. We think we may safely say that three fourths of all the European Patents secured to American citizens are procured through our Agency.

Inventors will do well to bear in mind that the English law does not limit the issue of Patents to Inventors. Any one can take out a Patent there.

A pamphlet of information concerning the proper course to be pursued in obtaining Patents through our Agency, the requirements of the Patent Office, &c., may be had gratis upon application at the Principal Office or any of the Branches. We also furnish a Circular of information about Foreign Patents.

The annexed letters from the last two Commissioners of Patents we commend to the perusal of all persons interested in obtaining Patents.

Messrs. MUNN & Co.—I take pleasure in stating that while I held the office of Commissioner of Patents, more than one-quarter of all the applications for patents that came through your hands. I have no doubt that the public confidence was indicated has since been increased as I have always observed, in all your intercourse with the Office, the highest degree of promptness, skill and fidelity to the interests of your employers.

Yours, very truly, CHAS. MASON.

Immediately after the appointment of Mr. Holt to the office of Postmaster-General of the United States, he addressed to us the subjoined very gratifying testimonial:

Messrs. MUNN & Co.:—It affords me much pleasure to bear testimony to the able and efficient manner in which you discharged your duties as Solicitors of Patents while I had the honor of holding the office of Commissioner. Your business was very large, and you examined each, I doubt not, justly deserved the reputation of exercising ability, and uncompromising fidelity in performing your professional engagements. Very respectfully, Your obedient servant, J. HOLT.

Communications and remittances should be addressed to MUNN & CO.,

LOOMIS—MINE 56.

The Subscriber is now issuing 100,000 Splendid Colored Engravings, of Rembrandt Peale's celebrated original Painting of the COURT OF DEATH,
at the unprecedentedly low price of ONE DOLLAR EACH. Size 23 by 31 inches.

The lowest regular price for Engravings of the size and quality of this is $25—and in answer to the question "how can they be sold for One Dollar?" the subscriber would state, that instead of issuing 5,000 copies at $5, he issues 100,000 copies at $1. Also, instead of only a week, is now in the course of one month, in getting up the plates. 21 5,000 only are sold, $5 is but a fair price. But if 100,000 are sold at $1, the aggregate profits are larger than on the 5,000.

The Original Painting, of which the Engravings are a Fac-simile Copy, was painted by Rembrandt Peale, in the city of Baltimore, in 1820, and has been the study and admiration of tens of thousands of our citizens. It has long been valued at 25,000 DOLLARS.

Death is personified in a king of terrors, and there is not a skeleton or any thing repulsive in the picture.

There are forty-three full and half figures in the engravings, and arranged into five groups, presenting living representations of DEATH, WAR, SICKNESS, FAMINE, INTEMPERANCE, and the TRIUMPH OF CHRISTIAN FAITH OVER THE TERRORS OF DEATH.

It is a work to benefit the eye and improve the heart. It can be studied and understood by a child, while its sublime conception affords scope to the strongest imagination.

It has been made the subject of special discourse by Rev. Dr. Sprague, Rev. Dr. Welch, Rev. Dr. Bacon, Rev. Dr. Cleveland, Rev. Dr. Wayland, and others.

A more impressive, instructive, or beautiful PARLOR ORNAMENT could not be purchased.

The subscriber was advised to have the drapery of the figures brilliant and showy, to gratify the taste of the country people; but he demands that his name exactly the splendid painting in their respect. The opinion of this decision is verified, not only by the Artists in this city, but by the venerable Rembrandt Peale himself, as will be seen by the following certificate:

"PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 16, 1859.

"I have seen the Chromo-Lithographic Engraving of my Painting of the Court of Death, recently executed for Dr. G. Q. Colton, (the present proprietor,) by Sarony, Major & Knapp, of New York, and can entirely that it is an accurate and admirable copy of the original Painting. REMBRANDT PEALE."

☞ Each subscriber is entitled to a Numbered Certificate of Proprietorship in the Original Painting. The painting to be at the disposal of the subscribers as soon as the last $100 payment is made.

The subscriber refers to the following gentlemen: The venerable Rembrandt Peale, Philadelphia; the Hon. Millard Fillmore, Buffalo; the Rev. S. I. Prime, D.D., Editor N. Y. Observer; and Rev. A. D. Gillette, D.D., the Rev. Dr. Abel Stevens, Editor Christian Advocate and Journal, New York; the Rev. Gerhenis D. Abbott, (Spiegle Institute); the Hon. Erastus Brooks, New York; the Hon. Henry C. Sherwood, New York.

From the New York Observer of Nov. 24.

"It is widely known as one of the greatest and best productions of American Art. * * Mr. Colton is a responsible man, and we can confidently in sending the money for his picture."

PRICE $1, and postage, 12 cents. SIX COPIES will be sent for $5, postage free.

Agents supplied at a discount. One Dollar and 15 cents from those desiring specimen—in return, they will receive one Engraving and a Circular of Agency (giving terms, &c.), and 40 Descriptive and Historical Pamphlets.

To avoid mistakes, the name Town, County and State, should be plainly written. Address

32. HEALTH OF AMERICAN WOMEN. 32.
It has often been a sad reflection that the physiological anatomy of women has rendered her liable to suffering and disease, for which a reliable remedy has never been found in the regular medical profession. Every mother of a family, and most females above 15 years of age, fully understand this. Social position, wealth and fashion unite offer no exemption to this rule. So universal are these sufferings of women from the age of 15 to 45 years, that every one is interested in obtaining certain relief.

Irregularities, local displacements, general debility and nervousness seem to be the common lot of women during the happy period of their life.

The experience of many years, the severe tests of investigation by scientific medical men, the use of the medicines in the practice and in the families of physicians, and its present use in the families of clergymen and among the most cultivated and refined in the country, has resulted in stamping the elegant and well-known preparation of the Graefenberg Company as the only reliable remedy ever known for the universal and distressing diseases of women.

It is prepared by an educated physician of great experience, and it will always be found fully equal to representations contained in it. It is known as the Parturient Company's MARSHALL'S UTERINE CATHOLICON.

Price, $1 50 per bottle. ☞ FOR SIX DOLLARS SIX BOTTLES AND ONE PACKAGE OF INJECTION WILL BE PAID TO ANY OF EXPRESS LINES FROM NEW YORK. Address JOSHUA T. BRIDGE, M.D., Secretary and Consulting Physician, Graefenberg Company, No. 32 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

All of the Graefenberg medicines may be confidently relied upon. They have been before the public for 12 years, and consist of eleven remedies, suited to all disease, of either sex, incident to this country and climate.

I hereby certify that I have examined a number of testimonials exhibited to me by the Secretary of the Company, relative to the merits of their medicines, and I take pleasure in saying that they appear to be genuine documents, and are therefore entitled to the confidence of the public. R. BARCLAY, D.D., of the Methodist Church.

Having examined certificates of the Graefenberg Company, I take pleasure in saying that they present evidences of genuineness, and are entitled to the confidence of the public. My personal acquaintance with some of the members of the Graefenberg Company enables me in expressing the opinion that their medicines are worthy of confidence. FRANCIS HALL,
Editor and Proprietor New York Commercial Advertiser.

PREVITAN FRENCH Medicines most persons are justly prejudiced. Health is too valuable to be trifled with, and the common sense and unbiassed sense would wish to take a patent medicine of which he can know nothing until he satisfied by the test of practice, it a person who, for all he know, may be an arrant knave or a consummate fool, is the last one to try them in category. There is every evidence to believe that there is a reality in it. It is a solution of the iodide of potassium of iron, prepared by a new method. The proprietors are men of high character, and are gentlemen of good education the utmost reliance can be placed. They do not publish certificates of cures, but refer to all of those diseases in which the use of iron is indicated it will be found a valuable remedy. The diseases of women are prescribed by physicians are many, and though this remedy is no specific for all of the ills to which the female is susceptible, yet the results desired are not always obtained, for the reason that it is not administered in that in what form it should be administered. If, as has been asserted, iodine is a powerful stimulant, it can act surer and assimilate with the blood in the form of protoiodide, then if administered in that form it would be a most successful unnecessary lober. The protoiode, however, is said to be a very unstable compound, and liable to be converted into another form by the absorption of oxygen from the air. It is claimed that in the Peruvian Syrup it is so combined by chemical ingenuity as to remain permanent, further oxidation being impossible.

Pamphlets containing numerous certificates of cures from eminent physicians, and others, can be had on application to the Agent, or to

WOLFGANG;

OR,

THE WRECKER'S BEACON.

CHAPTER I.

BEFORE THE GALE.

The good ship PATHFINDER, of New York, and bound to Copenhagen, had entered the North Sea, having left the Straits of Dover two days behind.

The commander of the ship was a young man, not over eight-and-twenty, and his name was MARMION LESTER. He stood by the taffrail, gazing off upon the horizon to the eastward, over and anon raising his hand above his head to feel if there was any wind stirring, and as often casting his eye aloft to see how the canvas hung. As he stood, thus he was interrupted, and spoke to him:

"What d'ye think of this, Cap'n?"

"I think we're in for a storm, sir," the master replied.

"And I tell you what it is, Griffin," he added, after sweeping the horizon again with his eye, "when it comes it will be an earnest one. None of your broad Ocean puffs, with nothing but water to hotch wind from; but we'll have it right fresh from some of those places where they know how to make things blow."

"Then you think we'll have a hard one?" said Griffin.

"Aye," answered the captain, with almost a shudder, "I feel it in my bones."

In the meantime, Captain Lester had been watching the sea and sky as before, and he fancied that the signs of the storm were growing more and more palpable every moment. The sun was going down in a thick bank, giving to the whole western horizon a dull, purplish red, bloody hue, with here and there spots of a darker tinge, like openings, through the fiery cloud, looking upon a fearful battle-field.

"Do you see how strangely it looks off there?" said the captain, raising his finger towards the point where the sun was setting.

"Aye," returned Griffin, "I have been watching those dark places."

And others noticed the same thing, and spoke of it, too. Seven o'clock came and went. Eight o'clock came, and the first watch was set.

"Don't go below," said the captain, as the men of the last dog-watch left their stations. "This calm can't last a great while. You had better be locked into the hatches now, while there is nothing else to do; for I am sure there will be need of having them close before the ensuing of another day."

The men had no thoughts of going below, for they could see and feel; and they were not wholly ignorant of what was coming; so they went at work and secured the hatches and companion-hatch, and when this was done those who had no particular station collected about the wheel. Another hour passed away—and another. Ten o'clock came, and still not a breath. The ship lay upon the water like a dead thing, with the yards, sails, blocks, and sails, rattling and flapping as she was swayed to and fro by the force of the sea.

"What does it mean?" cried Griffin, as the boy struck five bells.

"Hark!" said the captain, almost instantly. "I guess you'll soon see. Did you feel that?—Ha!—and that?"

It was a puff of wind, and a light flying of spray; or, perhaps it was a spit of rain. At all events, the puff was felt; and the drops of water fell upon other checks than Maurice Lester's; and other ears than his heard the dull moaning which came over the dark waters. So other ears heard the roar which followed, and other bodies quivered beneath the shock of the storm-giant when he came in his might.

Aye—the storm had come. It came with wind and rain, and with an angry heaving of the sea, it came with a darkness like Erebus, and with the voice of thunder. The gale continued to increase, and for a long night it passed away. When the morning came the scene was one of awful grandeur. The wind was howling with terrific fury; and the sea was tossed into huge mountains, that foamed, and tumbled, and leaped along over the bosom of the deep, seeming every moment ready to whelm and engulf the frail bark that struggled within the demon grasp.

When Captain Lester had observed the signs of the morning, he knew that the storm must continue through the day, and so he told his men. The sky wore a hue of horror, and rain was now driving down, mingling with the lashing sea. At noon it was still worse.

At length night shut in again, and not a sign yet of the passing away of the storm! The frightful howling of the tempest seemed to have become more intense than before. The men gathered upon the quarter-deck, clinging for support to the ratks and rails—for the life-lines swayed so much that they could not be used—gathered as near to the light of the binnacle-lamp as they could, as though even from such feeble beams they might find some comfort. But not a word was spoken. Each and all! Four stout, brave-hearted men had been swept away by the storm. Near a score were left; but how many shall see the light of another day?

At nine o'clock Captain Lester went below. He took down a chart of the North Sea, and having spread it upon the table, he sat down to examine it. His brain was engaged when Mr. Griffin came down; but he did not look up until he had finished the calculation.

"How is it?" the mate asked, as he saw his commander lay down the dividers.

"I have been making a reckoning, and I find that we have but little room to spare. The course we have made since we were, has been, as near as I can calculate, north-east-by-east, so that we must have been driving towards the coast of Northumberland. I think we have plenty of room to stand on until midnight; but we cannot stand on much longer. If the gale does not abate by that time I know not what we shall do."

The captain started up from the table, and presently shortly have walked across the cabin, but at that moment a heavy sea caught the ship, and gave her a pitch forward, which caused him to catch his seat as quickly as possible. As soon as the boat had gone from the deck, and the vessel had struggled up from the shock, he looked into his companion's face, and said, in a voice made tremulous by deeper emotion than he had before manifested:

"Griffin, I have recently spoken my mind more than you know; and I am anxious to communicate it, too. I must tell it now, for I have a strange foreboding of coming ill. Something is to happen that will bear great calamity to some of us. I am not croaking—I am only reading what the Unseen has written in my soul. However, you shall hear my story. You have heard that my parents were both lost at sea?"

"Yes," said the mate.

"And perhaps you know that they were lost in this sea?"

"I have heard so, sir."

"Aye—so it was. I was a boy then. They were on their way to Copenhagen, as we should be now. My father commanded the ship—she was called the 'Cloud Rover.' She was a good ship, and one that was a staunch noble craft. I was at school then, in Troy; and when I knew that my parents were dead I was well nigh broken-hearted. I loved them, in my first hours of exchange, that my heart would break; and, I think such would have been the case if they had kept me at school. But soon after I was cured for ever of such woe; and it was finally arranged that I should go to sea. And I prospered—prospered so well that, when I was twenty years old, they gave the command of a ship.

"The man who owned the ship which I first commanded was named Thornton. He had a daughter named Carrie—one of the sweetest, purest, most perfect creatures that ever graced this poor life of earth. She was four years younger than myself; but even when I first knew her—and she was then but a child—I fancied—for she was a woman in intellect and grace, though a child in simplicity of love and confidence. Mr. Thornton did not object to my suit, for he loved her with all my soul, and was blessed to know that she loved me in return. It had been arranged that we should be married when she was twenty years old—and that was to be only one more than two years, Mr. Thornton having set the bounds himself. It lacked two months of the time, and I had arranged to return at that period and claim my bride. But—Thornton had a heavy ship freighted for Copenhagen, and her captain was dying. He could find no one to take his place but me, and he asked me to go. I could not refuse; but I asked that I might be married first. Mr. Thornton shook his head, and said no. But he had another plan which he said would be better. He had been planning to visit Copenhagen, and he had also been in business—they were in company with him—and he said he would take the next ship, and bring Carrie out with him, and we could be married there. To this I consented to take out the new ship, and Mr. Thornton, with his daughter, was to meet me in Copenhagen, and there we were to be married, and sail for home together. The evening before I sailed I spent with Carrie, and when I left her I felt that I was leaving my very life.

"Well," continued Lester, wiping his eyes, "I went to Copenhagen. I waited a month—then I heard that the American ship 'Cloud Rover' had been wrecked on and slaughter on board, had touched at Dover, and that all were safe and well when she left. I waited another week, and then I sailed for home, for I knew that I could learn nothing there. Next I went to London, and there I learned enough to assure me that the ship had been lost! But the second ship that left Dover in the fierce storm had arisen, and several vessels had been reported lost. I sent my ship home in charge of the mate, and I remained another month in search of the lost ones; but I could gain no trace of them. Not even a piece of the wreck could I find—not a mark of the ship nor one of its crew! I came home with a sad and heavy heart."

Maurice Lester stopped a few moments, and bowed his head between his hands as the memory of those days came home. In a little while, however, he looked up again, and added, in a touching tone,—

"I have told you this, Griffin, that you know what I have suffered—tongue cannot tell it, nor can pen write it. That blue did break my heart—broke it in the rending of its tenderest fibres; and the crashing of all its earthly hopes!—Do you believe in dreams?"

The mate started, not so much at the character of the question, as from the sudden manner in which it was put.

"Why, sir," he said, "I—I don't know. I have had dream repeated many times; but never has it come to me so directly and so vividly as within the past three or four days. Sometimes I think it is a warning, and at others not!—she has appeared to me repeatedly in a dream, and calls upon me to save her! To-night, as I stood all alone by the mizzen-rigging, having got out of the way of the gloom, I heard her voice as plainly as you now hear mine, and she called out for me to save her. Of course what followed was the result of excitement, and nothing else much: I thought I saw her, standing not far off, upon a huge sea, with her arms stretched imploringly towards me—saw her mouth open, and open, as I have often seen her in my sleeping dreams!—"

At this point the captain was cut short in his speech by the cry of a sailor from the deck. They hurried up and found the men crowding forward.

"What is it?" Lester asked.

"It think I see a light," replied Parker. "Here, sir,—just stand here.—Now turn your eye about four points upon the larboard bow.—Wait, now, till she rises.—Ah,—there!—there!—don't you see it, sir?"

Yes—he had seen it; and he knew it must be a light upon the shore: but it was a great way off. He watched until he had lost it several times, and then he remarked to his mate that it must be a light-house. The wind was cold and distinct, and evidently at a considerable height above the level of the sea. The light, it is not seen, it could not have been seen at that distance. And such a constitution, during which reference was had to the character of the benighted coast, it was decided that this light must be upon Durnen Point. To the north of Durnen, as the captain knew from personal experience, as well as from the chart, there was a snug harbor, of easy entrance. These things were settled.

As soon as it had been determined where the light was, Captain Lester made all possible haste to determine his course of action. He stood for the light, intending that he would have laid his ship by; but that could not be done. No one even gave it a serious thought. So it was determined that the ship should stand on, at least till something further was discovered.

An half-past twelve the gale had moderated considerably. The light was now to be seen very plainly wherever the ship rose, and the captain and his officers felt sure that they were right in their calculations.

"At all events," said the former, "we have no choice but to stand on, at least.—"

He was interrupted by a cry from the boy that made every heart start with horror!

"BREAKERS! BREAKERS!"

Captain Lester sprang forward, and in a very few moments he was satisfied that the warning had not been a false one; for he could not only hear the awful roar of the breakers, but he fancied that he could see the gleaming of the white foam as it flew high in the air. As quickly as possible the topsail was taken off, and the anchors cast loose. The pandereas grapplings plunged into the hissing sea, and the iron cables were sped through the hawse-holes like lightning. Snap went the starboard chain; and in a moment more a shock was felt as the larboard anchor found bottom; but it could not hold. The cable parted as though it had been a lamprey string, and on swept the devoted ship.

"In heaven's name, Griffin," what does this mean? Sent! The light is still burning as bright as ever—at least a league away—and yet here are the rocks directly under our lee! We can't escape!"

Maurice Lester did not answer; but an old weather-beaten sailor, who stood at the wheel, and who had looked a thousand dangers in the face, answered for him:

"It's a WRECKER'S BEACON! I've seen such things afore. There isn't no use to pray for the gun, sir. That light was put there to lure some fool to his death that the coast-sharks might pick his bones!"

"BREAKERS! ROCKS!—On the starboard bow!—No!—On the larboard bow!—Both!"

But it was too late for mortal help. The ship had met her doom. She went upon the rocks with a crash that sounded high above the roar of the elements.

CHAPTER II.

WOLFGANG.

Maurice Lester was near the starboard gangway when the ship struck, having started all to look to the helm. The shock threw him upon his back, and he tried to get up; but ere he could regain his feet the flood of mad waters came surging over the deck, and he was thrown—he knew not where. He only knew that the flood came—that it caught him in its giant grasp—that it hurled him as the sea-bird is hurled—that his head was hurt—that his body was tossed and bruised—and then the lamp of his consciousness went out. When he came to himself it was daylight, and the rays of the sun were beaming above him. At first he did not attempt to move, any further than simply to assure himself that he was living alive and well; but he sought to recall the events of the past, which he did, very clearly, up to the time when his ship struck upon the rocks,—he could go no further. After that all was a blank! upon his elbow, and tried to gaze about him. He found himself upon a bed of sand, between two immense rocks. He had been thrown high upon the beach, and the tide had gone out and left him. In a little while he rose to his feet, and managed to crawl up, by the aid of a stranded spar, over a low part of one of the rocks.

After seeing all that was to be observed from this point, he moved on towards where he thought he should succeed in finding a path down to the point and sea, and he was wished to find help as soon as possible. After toiling over slippery, slimy rocks, and crawl, tearing crags, until the clothing was torn from his limbs, and his hands and knees bleeding, he finally reached an open space among the rocks, where many pieces of the wreck had been lodged, and where he found the bodies of three of his men. He hastened to the spot where they lay—two of them being clasped in each other's arms—but he found no signs of life.

With a sad, heavy heart, Lester passed on, and presently he found two more dead ones, and one of them was David Parker, the boy. He kneeled down by the officer's side, and felt the body; but it was cold and lifeless and the skull was broken! Gently he laid it back upon the rock, and then passed on again. And he saw more dead men also! Could it be possible that he had been the only one saved?

He!—well—what is this? It moves—it has life!

David Parker was moaning! Not as fast as his feeble strength would permit, and found two men lying by the side of a heavy spar, which had been a part of the mast. The other gazed up into his commander's face, and stretched forth his hand with a feeble cry for help and for mercy. That hand was Dick Maggio, and he had been one of the best seamen in the ship's crew.

"Poor Dick!" said Lester, kneeling by his side and lifting his head. "Can you speak to me?"

"They've done it for us!" the sailor answered, in a hoarse, gasping voice. "They've done it for us, Cap'n, dead or—"

But the body of stout Tom Bricket that lay close by, and when the captain had made himself sure that there was no sign of life in it, he turned to the other man.

"What is it?" Lester asked.

"Wolfgang, sir!" replied Parker. "Here, sir,—just stand here.—Now turn your eye about four points upon the larboard bow.—Wait, now, till she rises.—Ah,—there!—there!—don't you see it, sir?"

Yes—he had seen it; and he knew it must be a light upon the shore: but it was a great way off. He watched until he had lost it several times, and then he remarked to his mate that it must be a light-house. The wind was bold and distinct, and evidently at a considerable height above the level of the sea. The light, it is not seen, it could not have been seen at that distance. And such a constitution, during which reference was had to the character of the benighted coast, it was decided that this light must be upon Durnen Point. To the north of Durnen, as the captain knew from personal experience, as well as from the chart, there was a snug harbor, of easy entrance. These things were settled.

As soon as it had been determined where the light was, Captain Lester made all possible haste to determine his course of action. He stood for the light, intending that he would have laid his ship by; but that could not be done. No one even gave it a serious thought. So it was determined that the ship should stand on, at least till something further was discovered.

Messrs. J. Siegling & Son:

Gentlemen,—I can only repeat that which has been said so often by others, (as well as myself,) that I consider the Chickering & Sons' Pianos far beyond comparison, the best I have ever seen in America; and I am also happy to add, that they are quite fortunate in being so ably represented in the South, by so respectable a house as that of J. Siegling and Son.

Yours respectfully,

2d.—They have received the FIRST PREMIUM in every instance where exhibited in competition with others,—no less than TWENTY of which (consisting of gold and silver medals and diplomas) have been awarded during the past three years.

3d.—Upwards of TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY Churches have already been furnished with their Harmoniums, all of which, so far as known, have proved entirely satisfactory.

4th.—Upwards of THIRTY-TWO HUNDRED of their Melodeons have been sold, all of which, so far as known, have given entire satisfaction.

A CARD TO THE PUBLIC.

☞ Recent developments having made fully apparent the fact that there are numerous imitations of our "trade mark" throughout the United States, and there being for us no legal means of redress for such attempts to impose upon the public by a spurious article, and thus lessen our reputation as manufacturers, we have deemed it judicious, as the only way to put our friends and customers upon their guard against imposition, to say to them that all Pianos made by us bear upon the "name board" "CHICKERING, BOSTON." In Old English and Roman letters, and upon the "sounding board" the address of the firm in full, "CHICKERING & SONS, BOSTON," in German text and ornamented capitals, with the number of the Piano in plain numerals between the two lines.

Should any person have in his possession, or become aware of the existence of any of the counterfeit instruments above referred to, an advisal of the same to us would be considered as an especial favor.

AUTHOR OF "THE HASHEESH EATER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER I.

UNDER THE DOG-STAR.—A SIRIUS CHAPTER.

ALL Cheswick said that Clingham & Co. were going to the dogs. In the market of East Cheswick—at the Gold Eagle Tavern of West Cheswick—about the pump where the ore-teams were watered at Cheswick Centre—in Cheswick at all points of the compass and in all varieties of position, was to be heard the time-honored name of Clingham & Co. in connection with that dreadful abandonment to canine clemency aforesaid.

As yet, not in anger was it said; for of all who spread the rumor there was not one who could say that either he or his most remote grandfather had ever lost a cent by the firm. Clingham under various modifications—as combined with Son, or Brother, or Co.—had been coeval probably with the oldest traceable generation of any family now living at Cheswick, and from its first foundation as a firm had done the money business of all the country within a circuit of fifty miles—wisely, reputably, profitably to itself and its customers. So identified was it with the prosperity of the quiet little old town in which it stood, that I have frequently heard one of the first men of the place, Mr. Briggs (since gathered to his fathers), say that the very first object upon which his eye instinctively rested as he looked out of the window upon rising, was the massive stone and iron structure which was the material embodiment of the destinies of Clingham; and upon his perceiving that no earthquake had swallowed that building in the night, he betook himself to his prayers and his toast and coffee with the feeling of a good Christian who has money safely invested and is perfectly satisfied with the dealings of Providence.

As yet Clingham & Co. had had no notes protested, found no difficulty in disposing of their paper on the very best of terms, and gave no external symptoms of failure or dissolution; which fact necessarily, as I have stated, tinctured more with sorrow than with anger the pretty universal asseveration that C. & Co. were verging dogward as fast as time could carry them.

The reason of the asseveration seemed to be this: This being only a branch banking-house, and entirely subordinate to the great head at the metropolis, had never been attended to with any degree of consistency by a member of the celebrated firm in person, but was under the management habitually of some well-tried sub, cashier, teller, or otherwise, who, after a long apprenticeship and trial in the central or some larger branch establishment, had been thought worthy of promotion to a post of command. Such a person, one Luke Green, was now in charge of the Cheswick Clingham, supported by a staff of half a dozen assistants in various grades of honor and trust. Green had never been under the head men immediately; but by regularity of habit, financial alertness, and several adroit services he had rendered the firm as cashier of the Woodstock branch, had so commended himself that when old Tucker died from behind the desk he had elbow-rubbed for thirty years, Green was immediately elevated to his place of Managing Superintendent of the Cheswick Department. Now there was no objection whatever to Green. He was at his post early and left it late; never seemed supervision more eagle-eyed than his; and in his habits, the old lady, who was most attentive to individual morals, and had nothing else to do, could not pick a flaw. But the boys, as they were called—the underlings—ah! there was the trouble—there was grief of heart and cause to the Cheswickians for all-prophecy in abundance! Now they noticed that the cashier —a good, substantial, and once very promising "boy" of about thirty—came to his desk very late in the morning, somewhat bleared about the eyes, and having a general aspect of up-all-night-ishness which was unfinancial, irresponsible in the extreme. Paying-teller Bradby drove the very raciest of rapid horses at a speed and an expense hitherto inconceivable in a paying-teller, and somewhat eccentric even in the head of a firm. The various clerks, great and small, without much regard to size or means, devoted their elegant leisure to the investigation of rules of cards and the discussion of subtle differences between Mumm and Verzenay — or whatever native compounds occupied their talents under these denominations. In fact, a more goodly fellowship of dilettante loafers, to speak the plain, disagreeable truth, could not be found by searching the whole circle of young persons who affect that style of thing in the American nineteenth century, and being the sons of retired Yankee tradesmen, think it exceedingly English to lounge at tippling places, and say, "Aw! mei de-ah fellaw!"

Now Luke Green, Cheswick Superintendent, like Eli of old, was by no means in the dark as to the doings of these boys of his. Bless you! how could he be? Was it not all over Cheswick when Todds the cashier, in a fit of combined heroism and patriotic enthusiasm, threw up his window at eleven o'clock of an extraordingly frosty December night, and invited the whole universe to come up stairs and keep Fourth of July with him? And when paying-teller Bradby dashed his trotting sulky to pieces against a stupefied incoming butter-wagon—was there any concealing that, or the sling he carried his left arm in (well for him, as Pat the porter said, that it wasn't his head!) for the next three months thereafter? And how could Mr. Luke Green discharge his soul of all acquaintance with the fact that little Filkins, second bookkeeper, devoted an unprofitable surplus of his time to brandy-and-water with his billiards, when that young gentleman had awakened him at three o'clock of one morning with the alarm-bell, and informed him, as he came down quite tremulous in his wrapper, that "if I had any f'gard for th' welfare of th' instushun" he had better come out immediately, as somebody had set up another bank in opposition directly next door? Of course there was no such thing as being hoodwinked to these facts. But, like the sacerdotal old gentleman we have before mentioned, Mr. Luke Green felt that boys would be boys, and treated them invariably on the delicate remonstrance principle: "Todds, I regret to hear," etc.; or, "Bradby, really it pains me to learn;" or, "Filkins, you will see the impossibility of this continuing." Really, Cheswick in general did not know what to make of Mr. Green; but it came pretty unanimously to the conclusion, after due debate, that he was altogether too kind-hearted, too sweet-mannered a man to have control of such an important establishment as Clingham & Co., Cheswick Branch. And this was the reason why Cheswick said that Clingham & Co. were going to the dogs.

The state of popular opinion at Cheswick could not fail to reach the metropolis, there being facilities for unobstructed land and water carriage between those celebrated places daily. All sorts of remonstrances, complaints, menaces of withdrawal of deposits, suggestions of the antique stocking which had held cash safely before banks were ever thought of, and could do it again—all these, and many more pleasant love-missives, came from Cheswick to the grand central Clingham & Co. which held the reins of destiny; and, as a natural rebound from that state of pressure, rumors began flying Cheswickward from the central Clingham, that one of the partners would shortly be up to take charge of the affairs of the branch in person. Cheswick was delighted. Cheswick felt safe! The glory of contemporary children and remote grandsires, the financial bulwark of fifty miles around, was still impregnable; gray-haired men, who had most of their earliest associations and all their stock concentred in that granite building, would still point strangers to it with a proud enthusiasm, saying, "Clingham & Co., Sir! Firm as a rock! Long before I was a boy, Sir!"

It was pretty well known what day the partner would be there. Every one somehow seemed to have settled upon four o'clock P.M. of a Thursday—and there was such a crowd assembled at the station to meet that train as had not been seen since Henry Clay came through and spoke to Cheswick from the platform. But though every one knew the hour, very few seemed to know the man. "It would be old Clingham, probably," remarked a financially very young person. To whom, answering in a voice of intense sarcasm, replied a gentleman of broad-er monetary experience, "No doubt! He very likely intends to leave New York for this place! We shall possibly soon hear of the New York branch of Cheswick!" And through the multitude ran undefined rumors of different other members of the firm; now it was George—now young Som—now Lawrence Clingham, whose epiphany by railroad was to be expected.

Shifting about among the crowd, hearkening now to this, now to that hearsay, was Mr. Luke Green observable—for at three banking hours closed, and it was now nearly four. Observable —I use that word forcibly—for though I said that he was in the crowd, he certainly was not of it. Among the heaving mass of shoulders and heads he seemed as markedly discernible and separate as a dead body floating on a rocking sea; for in the midst of many flushed, some embrowned, and all pleasurably anxious faces, Mr. Luke Green's was the only white, pallidly white, and immovable one. Ever and anon he looked up the long stretch of track to where it curved out of eyeshot through the rock cut in the distance, as if he devoured the moments till the train should bear in sight; yet he started, just perceptibly, whenever any sound as of a whistle or a rumbling struck his ear. Necessarily, it was a trying season for a superintendent—this time of giving up the charge of headmanship to a superior, however delicately it might be received—this becoming once more a subaltern in station, with whatever undinished continuance or even increase of salary. And not even Mr. Green knew precisely who was coming. The only partner he had ever seen was "the old gentleman"—Clingham the head —the great Clingham; whom, as suggested before with extinguishing sarcasm, it would be impossible to expect unless he intended to make New York a branch.

At easy distances from their superior—easy in all respects, for they looked as if they had not the slightest trouble upon their minds, unless it were the advisableness on that afternoon of not getting drunk and playing for drinks to get drunken—lounged the subalterns of Cheswick Branch about the station.

The train—as all trains are almost always sure to, unless they are going to Philadelphia—arrived in due time. Perhaps a dozen persons got out. Nothing in any of them identified the mas. But the knowing ones, who had posted themselves where the baggage car disgorged its contents, sent down a runner to the ranks who had formed about the passenger exits, that a trunk was distinctly visible to the naked eye in their field of view, marked "To Clingham & Co.'s Banking House." Immediately afterward reliable report had located a carpet bag with the same destination upon the top of said trunk. Upon which, naturally enough, there was a rush to see who would call for these articles of luggage.

The evident sensation of surprise ran through the crowd as a tall but somewhat slender man, decidedly Saxon in the mould of his features, his bright and almost laughing blue eyes, his light-brown side-whiskers, mustache, and hair, and very prepossessingly, for no one would have set him down as more than twenty-three or four years old, approached the notable pile above mentioned, and, touching it lightly with his umbrella, said, "Send this up immediately, if you please." The surprise of the crowd was reciprocated by his face—for it flushed a little for a moment to find itself gazed at by so many eyes—and then bowing, as if to acknowledge what was an unmistakable compliment to his coming, he slightly drew himself up with a self-possessed dignity, and passed through the throng, which made room for him, as quietly as though unnoticing and unnoticed. Passed through, leaving even Cheswick quite mute at his unexpected look and bearing—a portion of disappointed that its appetite for a corpulent man with sharp eyes, sesa, gold-headed cane, and decided, inscrutable appearance was so woefully unsated, and another portion smitten with enthusiasm for the fair-haired young stranger who was so early in life worthy of a momentous treat like Cheswick Branch.

And as he passed away, Todds, cashier, elevated himself to the extreme height of five feet six inches, boot-heels inclusive, and turned to paying close scrutiny with the remark:

"Weally! I'm quite welieved—Demme if I didn't think he was going to be some old muff we'd be afraid of."

Todds, cashier, belonged to that species of which there can be no doubt he was, two years ago, the last survivor, and which we may therefore now believe to be wholly extinct—which can not realize such a possibility as feeling reverence for any man or thing which does not knock them down. They was How-are-ye-old-fellowish with the sun who has the possibilities to laugh in him—but have as a sublime veneration for the dignity of the pump-handle, whose contact floored them during the last lark. Have?

—Imean had. For can they now set about it?

Who of us but knows their dignity by sight? Bah! is the world an ass?

CHAPTER II.

IN WHICH THE COUNTENANCE OF CHESWICK FALLS.

Todds, cashier, seemed not so far from right after all. The terribleness of this new purpose in the sky of Cheswick Branch was diminished exceedingly when Cheswick came into the counting-house the next morning: not so much to have its own business attended to as to attend to that of Clingham & Co., and found the tall desk in the back room still occupied by Mr. Lot Green. Since the earliest foundation of Clingham & Co., such a run of custom had not been known. People holding notes which they had thoroughly made up their minds to keep till maturity were induced to the rail to have them discounted; tradesmen came to make deposits which they were absolutely sure to draw entirely out the next day or the day after that; even every old lady or young gentleman, so fortunate as to possess a dollar bill, approached to have it converted into specie, while they looked through the little picket fence that hedged in the majesty of a real partner. Wretched multitude! keenly sensitive and sensible to the quick that they had been sold for naught when they beheld, shining through the hither windows of the managerial sanctum, the bland face of Mr. Green, reclad in all its former mansuetude, nowise scarfed, but emery-polished into a purer refulgence by the right hand of yesterday's cuff, and as much of triumph in it as that gentleman could think of permitting to be thereconscientiously gentle to be sure, had opposited the use of all such stimulants as strong emotion. There had been one change, however—one most irritating, perplexing, absolutely inexplicable change. Cheswick, as a great whole, scratched its head and began to considering itself, but could discover no earthly, proper, defensible, adoptable reason why this change should have occured. Little Elkins, second book-keeper to Cheswick Branch, had utterly disappeared; as utterly as if the heaviest of his tremendous ledgers had fallen atop on him when he was between covers hunting an entry, and locked him up for sad posterity, like Geniva or a pressed bluerose. Gone was he, and inexplicably gone was little Elkins, and in his place sat—Oh! that miserable, paltry make-believe—the young man of Saxon face and slender figure, just as quietly as if nothing had happened, and all Cheswick had not been yesterday at the cars to see him come in as the real partner!

The young man at little Elkins's desk could not avoid knowing that his pretensions were detected; that the gilding of yesterday's eventful moment had been entirely rubbed off overnight, so that his actual brass showed through. He could not help hearing how the popular feeling, justly irritated, took sides with his ousted predecessor, and the inquiry "What has little Elkins done?" ran with a wrathful sorrow from murmuring mouth to mouth. He could not help knowing that he was not at all what was wanted; that Cheswick had asked for bread and been given, in him, a pebble-stone of the very grittiest nature to its enamel. But in spite of all these considerations, this young man of twenty-two or three scratched away importunably at his books, instead of bursting into tears or being warmed into a generous shame at the dispensation of so many of his edicts. And to make matters worse, every now and then as he took breathing-time at the bottom of a column, he looked up from the pen and surveyed through the rails, steadily into the faces of his severe jury with a frank, caught-fleeing peacefulness, and a half smile about his lips unwarranted by what they were absolutely intolerable. The most saucy brave of little Elkins, at the time when he had been trusted at the teller's for a new pelisot, and was sanctest, was easily to be put up with compared with this wonderful good-humor. And persons who noticed it took occasion to repeat, in a louder and still more antagonistic tone, the inquiry, "What has little Elkins done?"

Two or three of the oldest inhabitants of Cheswick, who, by the mere fact of their being older and able to walk, can place and talk with longer about one thing than any body else, were, of course, providentially fitted to become consultors upon all difficult subjects, availed themselves of the proper reverence in which they were held to mediate between a justly exasperated public and the new relation to the practical joke which Cheswick had experienced at the hands of Clingham & Co., Central Firm.

On pretense of relief from the strain, communicate immediately the fact which had only just been discovered in the Journal of Commerce three days before, that Cheswick and Linkumdoxly R.R. stocks, held by Cheswick Branch to the extent of fifty shares, had risen 3 per cent., Mr. Lot Green, Mr. Todds, and Mr. Dodgers, pushed through the glass door which intervened between an offended Cheswick and Mr. Luke Green.

"The fact is, Mr. Tollogue," said Mr. Green, the worthy old soul—having boxed the compass of conversation around to the subject, his heart was upon with such unwonted rapidity for him, that he had only answered a leer on things totally irrelevant, "The fact is, Mr. Dodgers," that Mr. Filkins, deeply as I grieve to say it, has been guilty—an irresponsible act—being impossible to mar the peace of the absent, I will add, a reckless office for an institution representing such tremendous interests as ours. A long time it had been represented to me that he spent much time, and large sums of money, at—at what do you call the game with balls and sticks, where you shove, you know?"

Mr. Dodgers with cheerful promptness suggested billiards, but in reality was much grieved to have been caught in knowing that very improper and frivolous game.

"Billiards! Thank you. That was the thing. At first I hardly believed it, such is my faith in the perfect goodness of men I meet—believed I'm afraid I'm quite a child; but when I discovered Mr. Filkins one night upon my front stoop, shoving snow-balls with his cane, and his only reply to my remonstrance that he was to get out of the way, old fellow! and let him come down on the cushion and earom on the light red, and—and—and—I was convinced. I—"

"Misplaced confidence," said Mr. Briggs, in a homilitic manner.

"Precisely," said when upon my still further interrogating him as to his singular manner, he replied that he had been moistening his clay, I translate into more genteele expression as meaning brandy and water."

"Of course!" rejoined Mr. Dodgers, with a deeply appreciative and shocking himself directly with visible exaltation of color at his detection in being so expert in the vocabulary of slang.

"The point of all was, that suspicion of his behavior reached the Messrs. Clingham, and they, feeling deeply desirous that the welfare of Cheswick Branch, and I may add, Cheswick people, with whom we feel gratefully identified"—Mr. Tollogue's voice was heavy with people—"should not be imperiled by any such behavior on the part of one of their officers. He was accordingly removed."

"This young person sent up in his room?" put in Mr. Briggs, briskly.

"With immediate dispatch, and having low to the representatives of Cheswick, Mr. Green replied that he had yet to learn of any; but when these three gentlemen, Messrs. Tollogue, Dodgers, and Briggs should be his earliest confidents. Carrying which answer to the outer world, into one's emergency, would be prudent, but in no pre-eminent degree wiser men than they were in.

It is little enough to say that this answer did not satisfy Cheswick. It might not have been intended to. If so, it completely eminently attained its purpose, for all over town the question that "Clingham & Co. were going to the bad," which, made lightly, baby, had been black-dropped and cradled for a day or two, was now taken up again, wakened, doudled, trotted, clamored, made lusty to the further verge of lung-capability, and with it sounded the new inquiry, "What had little Filkins done? Necessarily it was impossible for Cheswick to see what. Todds, cashier, devoted a great deal of time to the amusement of getting very drunk, though to be sure in a very quiet way ordinarily, and in the bosom of his boarding-house, and came to the bank very late, and was very cross and uncivil. Paying-teller Bradby seemed to spend as much money on sulkies and animals of fabulous time and pedigree, as if he were the son of some Broad street father washed ashore upon a golden beach by a rapid rise in the tide of his professional train oil. And all the clerks, great and small, seemed at liberty to do very much as they pleased out of bank hours, and to run the whole delightful gamut of pig-blessedness from doing nothing and feeling no sensation from it, up to getting drunk and enjoying it hugely, without a word of reproof upon the subject. While little Filkins, the latest disgusting to Cheswick of all the clerks, was singled out to be made an example of peremptorily then, what had little Filkins done?

ANOTHER NEW SERIAL.

WE commence in the present number of Harper's Weekly the publication of a new Serial Story of American Life, entitled

The New Partner

IN

"CLINGHAM & CO., BANKERS."

BY FITZ HUGH LUDLOW, ESQ., AUTHOR OF THE "HASHEESH EATER," ETC., ETC.

This story will be illustrated by JOHN MCLENAN, Esq.

We commenced in No. 152 the publication of a new Serial Story by WILKIE COLLINS, Esq., entitled which is illustrated expressly for this journal by JOHN MCLENAN, Esq.

The Woman in White:

The publication of the delicious Story of American Life, by GEORGE W. CURTIS, Esq., with HOPPIN'S Illustrations, was commenced in No. 119 of Harper's Weekly.

Trumps,

As Harper's Weekly is electrotyped, we can supply the back numbers from the commencement to any person who sends us the money.

THE IDLENESS OF CONGRESS.

MORE than one of the three months of the short session of Congress has elapsed and no appropriation bill has been passed. Less than fifty working days remain; during which all the appropriation bills of this session and the Post-office Appropriation Bill of last session must be passed, Kansas must be admitted, and whatever measures are taken with regard to Mexico must be adopted. Is it almost doubtful whether the business can be got through in the time that is left.

It is hardly necessary to say that the delay is disgraceful to all parties; and more especially to those who, professing to be anxiously in either action of the Union, refuse to range themselves on either side, and thus prevent an organization.

Passing this over, and taking a practical view of the subject, it seems to be admitted at Washington that none but a Republican can be elected Speaker. The reason to believe that this is the view of the clearest-headed men among the Democrats. They assume that the party which has a plurality will not, if it can help it, submit to a man of another party in the chair of the House. We have also reason to believe that some leading men among the Democrats and Southern Opposition would, for the sake of an organization, vote for a Republican Speaker, or for the plurality rule, which would amount to the same thing, provided the Republicans would agree to drop Sherman and concentrate their strength on some Republican who had not indorsed the Helper book.

Under these circumstances this seems the best alternative that is left. The House must be organized in some way or other, and the Republicans will be alone to blame for the non-performance of their duty if they refuse to nominate one of their own party whose election the Democrats agree to permit. Where parties are so evenly balanced, compromise is the only feasible course; and this seems the best of all feasible compromises.

TRADE CHANNELS.

THERE is every year a certain amount of wheat, flour, corn, cornmeal, pork, beef, ashes, and other produce of the field and the forest, which travels from the great producing States of the West to the Atlantic sea-board for sale or shipment to Europe. For all this produce, of whatever kind, Chicago may be regarded as the central Western depôt; Milwaukie and St. Louis being, so to say, sub-depôts, obeying the same laws, in respect to trade channels, as Chicago. Several great railroad lines compete for the business of conveying this produce from Chicago and the sub-depôts to the sea-board—to wit, the Grand Trunk line of Canada, whose harbor is Portland; the New York lines, the Central and Erie, whose harbor is New York; the Pennsylvania and Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago lines, whose harbor is Philadelphia; the Baltimore and Ohio, and its connections, whose harbor is Baltimore. Between these several lines the competition is sharp and severe—the more serious as the sea-ports, which form the termini of the rival lines, are fully alive to the importance of securing the business, and take an active and direct share in the contest.

The owners of the Grand Trunk line are so desirous to secure the business that they are carrying produce from Chicago to Portland for little more than one-half what it costs them to do the business; being somewhat peculiarly in the struggle by the Government of Canada, which is largely interested in the road. Pennsylvania is equally alive to the importance of victory in such a fight. Her public works have sold, and nothing has been left undone by the Legislature to enable the Pittsburgh line through Pittsburgh to compete successfully with its rivals. The Baltimore and Ohio enjoys the entire favor of the Legislatures on which it depends; it has only to ask, and the States are ready to grant any thing it wants, while the city of Baltimore sagaciously lends its aid whenever it becomes necessary.

New York alone holds aloof from the struggle, and while the rival States are straining every nerve to secure the traffic, proposes to initiate a policy which will tend to injure itself and help its rivals. Governor Morgan, in his Message, proposes to toll the railroads of this State, so as to render it impossible for them to compete on equal terms with their rivals in Canada, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Maryland.

The ostensible motive for this proceeding is a desire to make the canals pay.

The fact is that the canals, which are a superior mode of conveyance to canals, have beaten them in this State in the contest for traffic; and Governor Morgan, who, our readers will be astonished to learn, is a New York merchant, proposes to lay such loads on the roads as will once more place them on a level with the canals. The Governor, in a word, belongs to the respectable race of old fogies who think railways are altogether too fast, and must be checked, in the interest of slower and more antiquated conveyances.

We will not discuss the principle of his method. Governor Morgan is the head of the Republican party in this State, and as such the Republicans being the dominant faction—is an authority too high to be disputed. But we insist, if his plan be adopted, and tolls laid on the railroads so as to place them on a par with the canals, that the system be carried out fairly and generally. We want to see tolls levied on the canals for the support of engine-coaches between New York and Albany. If it be right to tax railroads, so as to render the contest between them and the canals equal, the canals themselves have the same right to protection. We likewise want to see taxes laid on steamers, so as to render the contest between them and the canals fair and equal. It would be only right, too, to lay a tax on the telegraph lines, for the benefit of the postal revenue, which has been seriously reduced by the competition of the electric telegraph. If the Morgan principles prevail, and each new step in civilization be bound to carry its defunct predecessor on its back, there is no saying where we must stop. If railroads are to pay an indemnity for superseding canals, steam presses should be taxed for the benefit of the old race of hand-pressmen; city railroads should pay something to omnibus proprietors; modern hotels should hand over an annual bonus to old-fashioned taverns; triple-sheet newspapers should be taxed for the benefit of decaying contemporaries; we should all of us pay a trifle for knowing more than our fathers.

We repeat—we don't mean to discuss the principle; we only want to see it fairly carried out. If the Morgan plan of taxing improvements, as such, be the rule of this State, let us see it put in force, and those who dare to suggest any forward step in the march of progress and civilization.

THE LOUNGER.

MOUNT VERNON.

THE ladies have now done their work, and Mount Vernon now belongs to them. It only remains to raise about a hundred thousand more dollars to have a fund for the support and repairs of the estate. Of the whole sum thus far collected, Mr. Everett has contributed about one-fourth, or nearly seventy thousand dollars; and it would be interesting to know precisely how many subscribers to the fund there have been in the country. The oration of Mr. Everett alone has produced about fifty thousand dollars—and when we remember that it was first delivered only three years ago upon the coming anniversary of Washington's birth, we may safely say that it has produced much larger pecuniary results than any oration ever before spoken. Thus the estate of Mount Vernon becomes a memorial of Mr. Everett as well as of Washington.

Meanwhile the excellent Mr. John Washington seems to have failed, at least there was some such story in the newspapers, and this ought to be satisfactorily explained. Because if he was compelled to sell the estate by reason of his poverty, and received much more than the mere market value, as real estate, how does he happen to fail just as the money is paid? There is plainly in some mistake in the story which it would be very refreshing to have contradicted.

And now that the work is done, we suppose Mount Vernon will be kept as a kind of sacred park, a national neutral ground, where we may all gain and cultivate not morality, and invigorate our mental constitutions by reflection upon the simple, austere heroism of the man we all reverence so deeply and truly that whoever speaks of him in words other than those of panegyric seems to be blaspheming.

Let it be so! Let the gates be opened wide to the North and South and East and West, that we may all stand upon the porch which Rossiter has painted, and look upon the lovely landscape which Mignot has reproduced, and feel as we do so that we stand where our greatest man stood; a man so calm and wise that men of all times and all nations have praised him—who saw so clearly, who judged so justly, who spoke so well, that Time, which dwindles other greatness, only enhances his; and the increasing light, which shows so many gaps in other revered images of the Past, only glorifies him the more.

THE NEW SINGER.

WE Americans take great pleasure in abusing ourselves, and insisting that we are led by the nose in all affairs of art and in literary judgment. Yet how often are these errors. Some of the most sturdy English literary reputations have been made, and many confirmed, in this country. There is a story, not yet contradicted, that the first full and fair complete edition of Bollingbroke was collected in Philadelphia. The Miscellanies of Carlyle and De Quincy were first issued, as books, in London, and England knows much less of Robert Browning than we do. Festus Bailey was first hailed here, but somehow never came to his crowning point, as Martin Farquhar Tupper, A.M., if not LL.D., was idolized by us for at least three years.

Nor is it always that we require the approval of England before we approve our own men. Bancroft, and Hawthorne, and Prescott, and Motley, and Bryant, and Longfellow, and Lowell, and Holmes, and all the rest, we know and like, and have known and liked, whether England did or did not. If she does like and laud us, it was pleasant to hear. If she did not, she was at liberty to have her own tastes.

And certainly we have not been deceived by singers or actors. Not even the pronunciamentos of Signor Ullman have persuaded any body to think that there was a good one, or even to believe in M. Musard because he had the same name as his father. Even Ole Bull's fame, we have all heard, in New York was much more polite than Madrid, but it recognized quite as clearly that Is Gilda was no longer la dia. But Bosio, with no flourish of trumpets, had charmed because she was charming. Benedetti and Truffi have made the remembrance of one season in Astor Place radiant to many and many a hearer, yet their claims were not counterfeigned by European repute. And all the folded or worn visiting cards have been heralded with such blare of puffery, have failed to deceive a solitary hearer.

Now, at last, comes a little lady, with no prestige of any kind,—who was heard a few years since as a prodigy, who was not introduced as an angel, or a siren, or a sky-lark, or even as a gentle lyric tragedienne, but who trips on to the stage and warbles her way straight into the hearts of the hearers and into the very highest position. She is in no other sense an American than that soon after her birth her family removed to this country. But even if she has been a Yankee girl, does any body think she would have been any more or any less successful? Or had she sung as the poor Speranza sung, would her Italian birth and name have saved her?

There is no mistake in our appreciation of Jenny Lind; and whoever supposes Barnum made her career in this country, pays Barnum a great compliment. Barnum's sagacity lay in seeing that so great a singer as Jenny Lind was sure to succeed. Hackett's mistake was in supposing that Grisi, in her decline, would succeed because she had been famous in her prime.

If the Signori Managers will always provide good singers they may save one fortune in printing bills, and make another by the generous appreciation of the public.

HATS.

Do we owe our emancipation from the "tile" or the stove-pipe continuation to Kossuth, from whom the soft slouch hats are named? It is easy to believe so, for the Magyar race is Oriental in its origin—languid, luxurious; and what is the soft hat truly seen but a mingling of the turban and the hat—the East and the West—poetry, if you please, and prose. At least which of our poets, unless it be Willis in some metropolitan moment, wears a tile?

Yet, on the other hand, before Kossuth came—whom last week we partially shouted—and in England and on the other continent, the easy hat is called a "wide-awake," certainly the reverse of any Oriental dignification. Why wide-awake? Plainly because the wearing of so convenient and comely a covering for the head showed a man wide-awake to common sense and uncommon comfort—a man fully wide-awake to the regnant absurdities of fashion, and who rose early enough in the morning to know fully what he was doing.

See, too, how the head has set the fashion for the rest of the body! Since the highest point of all has been comfortable, how the human form has been emancipated from tight tailoring! With loose hats come loose coats; with loose coats, in due order, peg-top trowsers and ample waistcoats; and so, by developing supposititious symmetry, the human form divine is stimulated to make those proportions real. If a man's waistcoat be fullcircled, how naturally he resolves to make his chest correspond! If the thighs of his trowsers bulge, how inevitably he will endeavor to fill them themselves! And all the invigoration and expansion of muscle and lungs—and consequent increase in human and general health—which corresponding higher flights in the action of the brain, and wider grasp of philanthropic sympathy, all unfolded from that single hint of the soft hat—what juror takes out of any old beaver new chickens, fresh butter, and gay ribbons! How clear it is that this hat does come from the East, realm of miracle and mystery!

Think, now, to what perfection this thing is carried! We speak of the improved unlooping, of the constant discoveries in the sun-painting arts—of new coffa-pots and of unimaginable preserved meats that might be laid away in a pyramid, and taken out three thousand centuries hence and cooked into delicious freshness of davor by the New Zealander who is to sit down contemplative on the ruins of the City Hall or the Post-office. That is all well; but what do you think of a hat poked into an envelope and mailed to you, then taken out and unfolded into airy symmetry, so that you seem to wear a sunset cloud, for lightness; a brazen casque, for strength; and you can see to read comfort!

Of course there are cavilers. There are people who assert that your nose-pipe is the perfect possibility, and who, as they survey the luxurious fullness of fashionable drapery and tailoring, declaim, cynically, that Christianity has not taught us how vries in the head goes through all the state; and that every layer of society is corrupted when the top layer is tainted.

Avisto re! The slouch hat is practical democracy—namely, comfort and beauty. It is the symbol of the free and easy American life. It is the connecting link between the oldest and newest civilizations; the ease that was sloth in the extreme East, and is intense life in the extreme West.

So no more at present about the slouch hat.

WHAT A NEWSPAPER IS, AND IS NOT.

IT is very natural to suppose that a man publishes a newspaper to express his own views. It is to believe that great poets sing for the pleasure of singing, and that novelists write for the pleasure of telling stories. But the whole experience of experience upon this supposition is very incessant and very amusing, especially in the case of publishers and editors. Let the Lounger have a word with his many friends about it.

There are, probably, not a dozen papers in the country published in a spirit so loyal to the idea of maintaining a principle. And it is a good thing that there are not; for, until a principle and its friends can support a paper, there is not actually any need of an organ. It should be inculcated orally, and at individual expense.

But when a paper is established, not as moral or other organs or agents, but simply as lucrious enterprises, then they are to be managed like all other lucrious, by the two main rules to expect peculiar generosity or self-sacrifice of the man who undertakes it for the sake of a man who engages in shoemaking or cotton manufacturing. The object in all the cases is individual advantage. The proprietors, indeed, do not wish to outrage honesty or decency; on the contrary, they may have no doubt that honesty and decency pay; but their motive is not the interests of those two qualities, but their own private and especial advantages.

Among the attractions of the paper, let us suppose, is a brief and conspicuous advertising page. We will suppose the rates to be high, because it is the general habit to regard editorial and correspondence advertisements. Now the theory is, and it is a perfectly just mercantile theory, that the money received for the advertising is properly and fully balanced by its publication and the notice consequently attracted to the wares. The actual result is, Mr. Smith brings the quality of his bug-powder plainly before the public, and Mr. Jones his exquisite edition of "Lalla Rookh."

Now imagine the public not reading only the editor and saying that he has inserted an advertisement of his book, and paid for it, and would like an editorial! But such is the fact. Smith has paid for? and how long do you suppose I shall keep my other advertisers if I favor one and not the other? And if I favor the other hand, if I give a notice to all, what is the value of my notice? It is soon seen to be only a part of the advertisement, and any editorial opinion has lost all its importance. If an advertisement in my columns is not worth to me what you pay for it, you can, of course, cease to pay it at any moment. Also, please to take notice that it is only space in my paper, not my opinion, that you buy. You may pay for the room to announce your splendid edition of "Lalla Rookh," but if you wish me to speak of it editorially, how if I choose to think that it is fustian and rubbish, and say so? Or do you propose to pay me roundly for saying that, upon the whole, Tommy Moore is superior to Milton?

That is what every editor may justly say to advertisers who will "a notice." He must be impartial, and trust all his friends alike. If, indeed, any work upon an important or interesting subject be issued, he will naturally speak of it in connection with a topic which interests the public; but in so doing he will not make his notice of the subject a puff of the publisher of the book.

What is true of books is true of every thing else. No sensible editor, of course, will omit to speak of the beautiful bindings (for instance) of beautiful books, if he thinks it to be an affair of real interest, or as showing improvement or unusual excellence: but the point is, that part of his capital as a sagacious editor is a power of just discrimination, and a perfect willingness to say No to every body who wants his own axe ground, upon the claim that every body is interested in that particular axe.

And if all this be true of an editor and a proprietor, think of a mere Lounger, and what is true of him!

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—J. B. Smith, make for your "Thoughts." Plays are pointed and rare. The Lounger has handed them to the Easy Chair, who promises to give some of them room, and to talk with you about them.

—F. A. The Lounger has read the lines. They are full of kind feeling; but are they poetry? As intention, the Lounger considers them "favorably," but he can not do so as performance.

—LILY DALE. The lines are respectfully declined.

—The Lounger's correspondents are exhorted to be patient. Questions asked several months since will yet be answered.

—OLD SWISS says:

"1. There is no such town as Schalcigier in Germany.

"2. Schalcigier is a word borrowed from the German verb Schalen, to grate; rieser kase means sour cheese.

"3. 'Schalcigier kase,' or sage sage cheese, is made nowhere else than in the canton of Glarus, in Switzerland, on whose mountains alone are found the Alpine plants necessary to the manufacturing and to the particular flavor of the Schalcigier kase."

—DISCOSSUS. Now that the Atlantic wire has been laid and Europe has agreed for the transmission of messages, the project of a line ein Behring's Straits will hardly be discussed. An Atlantic wire will doubtless be laid until it works.

Father Prout's Inaugurative Ode

TO THE AUTHOR OF "VANITY FAIR."

[From the first number of Thackeray's "Cornhill Magazine."]

I.

OCEUS is a fuiter, quicker age:
Yet erst at Goldsmith's homely Wakefield Vicarage,
While Lucas Collins rattled the West End gloss
Mid the Primroses,
Fudge! cries Squire Thornhill,
Much to the wonder of the young greenhorn Moses.
Such word of scorn ill
Matches the "Vanity Fair" thy whim proposes
To hold on Cornhill.

II.

With Fudge, or Blarney, or the "Flamies on Fire!"
Treat not thy Public!
But proffer good material—
A goodly Entertainment!
Value for twelvepence, and not dear at twenty.
Such wit replenishes thy Horn of Plenty.

III.

Nor wit alone dispense,
But sense:
And with thy sparkling Xeres
Let us have Ceres.
Of loaf thou hast no lack,
Nor set, like modern Lords, a scanty fare, forth,
With bits of sack,
Of bread no counterworth.

IV.

Sprightly, and yet sagacious,
Funny, yet facetious,
Dashing, yet intellectual—
So may thy periodical,
On this momentous morn,
Exalt its horn,
Thron'd on the Hill of Cornhill!

V.

Of aught that smacks of sect, surplice, or synod,
Be thy grain winnow'd!
Nor deign to sell or lend aught
With empty chaff
Shun aught o'er which dullard or bigot gleats;
Nor with cant
Mix thy Nectar.
With meat from Titus Oates
Or flour of Joseph Miller.

VI.

There's corn in Egypt still (Pilgrim from Cairo to Cornhill!),
Give that!
But all comers among
Let no man be hungry:
Fill the big brothers' knapsacks from thy bins,
But stip the Cup of Love in Benjamin's.

VII.

Next as to those
Who bring their lumbering vers or ponderous prose
To whom a modest Bard
Have so long held their
Well garnish'd Cornhill storehouse,
Bid them not bore us
Tell them instead
To take their lead next street, the Hall of Lead!

VIII.

Only one word besides—
As he who tannish hides
Blacketh with powder implements his tannery:
So then, friend! do not fail
Thy store to garnish full,
Even as thy sister thy Cornhill granary.
Of old there waxed afraid,
Prompt as right worthy, Cullf Haroun al Rashid:
Deal then with Fraud,
Or Jeb or Humbug—banish it!

IX.

Courage, old Friend! long fond
Firm at thy task, nor its drear purpose fold:
Up! choose the ground,
Put forth thy shining sickle:
Show the clear way to Lord Lovel
Of Dunce or Dunderhead:
But reap North, South, East, Far West,
The world-wide Harvest!

A STAG HUNT AT COMPIEGNE.

WE print on the following page an engraving which represents the Emperor and Empress of the French at a stag-hunt at Compiègne. As the sport is not familiar to many of our readers, we give the following account of it from the pen of an American who was an invited guest at the Imperial residence:

"At an early hour on the morning of the eventful day I was up, and was allowed, through the kindness of a friend who belongs to his Majesty's household, to visit the stables and kennels. I admired the horses, and after having proved by some profound horse-talk that I knew all about the merits of those matchless animals, I expressed a desire to become better acquainted with the dogs, and went to the chiens the stag.

"I entered the large house used as a kennel for the pack with many misgivings, having a lively recollection of a misadventure in the Imperial kennels at Fontainebleau, on which occasion the wind blew the door to, leaving me alone with the pack, one of which—and ugly, old, one-eyed dog—evinced a savage desire to come to close quarters, very much to my intense disgust and to the unkind amusement of the keeper, who came in just in time to prevent my becoming dog-meat—a sad fate, even if the dogs be those of his Imperial Majesty. On this occasion, however, I suffered no inconvenience, save a reasonable feeling of disgust in recognizing old acquaintances.

"The Imperial kennel contains one hundred English dogs and twenty-five bloodhounds, the latter being French dogs, belonging to the breed called 'Briquet Anglais.'

"The personnel of the hunt consists of the veneurs or huntsmen, whose duty is to attend to the hounds, and the chefs d'equipage, or grand prevost who have charge of the horses. The veneurs are of two classes: those of the first class are called valets de chiens ordinaires, those of the second class are on foot (valets de chiens ayeux).

"Having visited the horses and dogs, I started to meet my friend at the chateau, and found him in all the glory of his hunting-suit, which is that of the reign of Louis XV. While dressing, I noticed several pairs of spurs, because, it sit as once flashed across my mind that I had not made a blunder in my costume, and I could not appear at the hour except only attired à la Louis XV. Here was an embarrassment—I had a horse, but no costume. My friend kindly undertook to procure one, and finally succeeded in borrowing the hunting-suit of one of his companions who was not to accompany us out. He triumphantly bore back to me the much-desired garment, which I, in my haste donned, never for a moment thinking in so doing, as it was over at least six feet high and large in proportion, while I am a small man.

"I was determined to witness the hunt, however, and the size of my costume could not deter me.

"At about noon the cavalcade left the chateau for the meet in the forest, and most splendidly did it look.

"The Emperor and Empress rode along, side by side, in front; near their Majesties was Prince Napoleon, who rode by the side of General Fleury, the Emperor's favorite aid-de-camp.

"The Empress looked most beautiful in her natty and most becoming riding-costume, while the lovely Princess Anna Murat attracted universal admiration.

"I failed not attempting giving you the names of all the beautiful ladies present, containing myself with remarking that the cavalcade that started from the chateau was the finest I ever beheld in the forest was a most brilliant one.

"Arrived at the meet, we found the hunting horses and the dogs ready, while the veneurs were anxious to begin what they call sport. I thought of the Wisconsin and Iowa deer-hunt, in which that I had myself killed in these prairies; and I looked upon the present hunting with feelings of the most unmixed supercilious. Time elapsed ere the hunters could all be suitably mounted, while the ladies, of course, required considerable care.

"I observed that the Emperor was particularly attentive as to the secure fastening of the Empress's saddle, taking hold of it himself to assure its safety. At last all were mounted and were ready, and at a sign from the grand veneur the dogs were unleashed, and with consequently Majestics and guests.

"What a magnificent sight was this start! The bright hues of the riders and the increased splendor to the glittering gold-lace adorned costumes, while the barking of the dogs and the quick tramp of the horses made up a chorus, in the excitement of the moment, the unpleasant fact of my being torn limb from limb by the voracious hunting pack.

"In less time than I could recount it the hunters and dogs had disappeared, and I remained striving and struggling with a refractory horse of a horse that would not go, but kept backing and turning round and round, with a degree of composure that astonished me exactly. I was taken as a disadvantage by the beast of a horse, owing to the huge size of my trousers and to the fact that my coat covered me up, so as to almost deprive me of the use of my limbs. But Yankee ingenuity is hard to beat; and after a time by striking my legs into the horse I started him off at a pace that soon brought us up with the hunters, and without any further effort on my part, until I was far in advance of the hunt, and lost in the mazes of a forest, totally unknown to me. Having accomplished this feat, my horror became more reasonable, and I managed to stop him.

"I had not remained long ere I heard the horns off in the distance, and was enabled thus to rejoin the hunting party once more. Not having as I met with the slightest adventure: Galloping up an avenue, I saw before me a hunter who was slowly walking his horse, whom second was best forward in a reflective mood. Fired with the ardor of the chase, I dashed toward the retreating gentleman, and was as I passed a feed of "Bourbon" or something to that effect, for the purpose of arousing the latent energies of the beast of the hunting-cry. This revolve was somewhat changed by my recognizing, as I swept on the hunter, that it was no less a personage than Napoleon III., Emperor of the French.

"As I emerged from the avenue a stag met my gaze that would not be a stand-still at once. You will perhaps imagine that 'twas a fine ten-antlered stag at bay, surrounded by the forest pack, or that from some mere fiercest were pulling down the stag they had just overtaken. Not 'twas a fine long-tailed coward with a most succulent lunch, and many, very many bottles of wine, some of which had the peculiar property of containing champagne bottles. I at once fell my order for the close nosing at every pore, and I gladly consigned my horse to the mounted groom.

"Not far from the table I have mentioned was a small-sized tree, which I ascended with ease, and there the script invite to partake of their lunch. I observed, as a curious coincidence, that just about this time almost all the hunters, male and female, arrived at the place I had so unexpectedly discovered, and that soon no vestige of the lunch remained—violent exercise does give one such an excellent appetite. After a brief repose the hunt began again, and by five o'clock the dogs succeeded in running down a fine stag, which was carried to the chateau at Compiègne for the curée, which was to take place in the court-yard of the castle. This ceremony is neither more nor less than skinning the beast, which is done by the light of torches, and while the hands of the regimental are discovering sweet music."

THE NARRATIVE OF VINCENT GILMORE, SOLICITOR, OF CHANCERY-LANE, LONDON.

I.

I WRITE these lines at the request of my friend, Mr. Walter Hartright. They are intended to convey a description of certain events which seriously affected Miss Fairlie's interests, and which took place after the period of Mr. Hartright's departure from Limmeridge House.

There is no need for me to say whether my own opinion does or does not sanction the disclosure of the remarkable family story, of which my narrative forms an important supporting part. Mr. Hartright has taken that responsibility on himself; and circumstances yet to be related will show that he has amply earned the right to do so, if he chooses to exercise it. The plan he has adopted for presenting the story to others, in the most truthful and most vivid manner, requires that it should be told, at each successive stage in the march of events, by the persons who were directly concerned in those events at the time of their occurrence. My appearance here, as narrator, is the necessary consequence of this arrangement. I was present during the sojourn of Sir Percival Glyde in Cumberland, and was personally concerned in one important result of his short residence under Mr. Fairlie's roof. It is my duty, therefore, to add these few links to the chain of events, and to take up the chain itself at the point where, for the present only, Mr. Hartright has dropped it.

I arrived at Limmeridge House, on a Friday in the week, either at the end of October or the beginning of November—it is not material to my present purpose to say precisely which.

My object was to remain at Mr. Fairlie's until the arrival of Sir Percival Glyde. If that event led to the appointment of any given day for Sir Percival's union with Miss Fairlie, I was to take the necessary instructions back with me to London, and to occupy myself in drawing the lady's marriage settlement.

On the Friday I was not favored by Mr. Fairlie with an interview. He had been, or had fancied himself to be, an invalid for years past; and he was not well enough to receive me. Miss Halcombe was the first member of the family whom I saw. She met me at the house-door; and introduced me to Mr. Hartright, who had been staying at Limmeridge for some time past.

I did not see Miss Fairlie until later in the day at dinner-time. She was not looking well, and I was sorry to observe it. She is a very lovable girl, as amiable and attentive to every one about her as her excellent mother used to be—though, personally speaking, she takes after her father. Mrs. Fairlie had dark eyes and hair; and her elder daughter, Miss Halcombe, strongly reminds me of her. Miss Fairlie played to us in the evening—not so well as usual, I thought. We had a rubber at whist; a mere profanation, so far as play was concerned, of that noble game. I had been favorably impressed by Mr. Hartright on our first introduction to one another; but I soon discovered that he was not free from the social failings incidental to his age. There are three things that none of the young men of the present generation can do. They can't sit over their wine; they can't play at whist; and they can't pay a lady a compliment. Mr. Hartright was no exception to the general rule. Otherwise, even in those early days and on that short acquaintance, he struck me as being a modest and gentlemanlike young man.

So the Friday passed. I say nothing about the more serious matters which engaged my attention on that day—the anonymous letter to Miss Fairlie; the measures I thought it right to adopt when the matter was mentioned to me; and the conviction I entertained that every possible explanation of the circumstances would be readily afforded by Sir Percival Glyde, having all been fully noticed, as I understand, in the narrative which precedes this.

On the Saturday Mr. Hartright had left before I got down to breakfast. Miss Fairlie kept her room all day; and Miss Halcombe appeared to me to be out of spirits. The house was not what it used to be in the time of Mr. and Mrs. Philip Fairlie. I took a walk by myself in the forenoon; and looked about at some of the places which I first saw when I was sauntering at Limmeridge to transact family business, more than thirty years since. They were not what they used to be either.

At two o'clock Mr. Fairlie sent to say he was well enough to see me. He had not altered, at any rate, since I first knew him. He was as fond of now that it is written and sealed up, allow me to ask one or two last questions about the unhappy woman to whom I refer. I have read the communication which Mr. Gilmore kindly addressed to my solicitor, describing the circumstances under which the writer of the anonymous letter was identified. But there are certain points to which that statement does not refer. Did Anne Catherick see Miss Fairlie?"

"Certainly not," replied Miss Halcombe.

"Did she see you?"

"No."

"She saw nobody from the house, then, except a certain Mr. Hartright, who accidentally met with her on the highway and here?"

"Nobody else."

"Mr. Hartright was employed at Limmeridge as a drawing-master, I believe? Is he a member of one of the Water-Color Societies?"

"I believe not," answered Miss Halcombe.

He paused for a moment, as if he was thinking over the last answer, and then added:

"Did you find out whether Anne Catherick was living when she was in this neighborhood?"

"Yes. At a farm on the moor, called Todd's Corner."

"It is a duty we all owe to the poor creature herself to trace her," continued Sir Percival. "She may have said something at Todd's Corner which may help us to find her. I will go there, and make inquiries on the chance. In the mean time, as I can not prevail on myself to discuss this painful subject with Miss Fairlie, may I beg, Miss Halcombe, that you will kindly undertake to give her the explanation I require, deferring it of course until you have received the reply to that note."

Miss Halcombe promised to comply with his request. He thanked her—nodded pleasantly—and left us, to go and establish himself in his own room. As the door closed, the coarse-grained greyhound pushed out her sharp muzzle from under the sofa, and barked and snapped at him.

"A good morning's work, Miss Halcombe," I said, as soon as we were alone. "Here is an anxious day well ended already."

"Yes," she answered; "no doubt. I am very glad your mind is satisfied."

"My mind! Surely, with that note in your hand, your mind is at ease too?"

"Oh yes—quite at ease, otherwise? I knew the thing could not be," she went on, speaking more to herself than to me: "but I almost wish Walter Hartright had stayed a little longer, enough to be present at the explanation, and to hear the proposal to me to write this note."

I was a little surprised—perhaps a little piqued, also, by these last words.

"Events, it is true, connected Mr. Hartright very remarkably with the affair of the letter," I said: "and I readily admit that he conducted himself, all things considered, with great delicacy and discretion. But—I am quite at a loss to understand what useful influence his presence could have exercised in relation to the effect of Sir Percival's statement on your mind or mine."

"It was only a fancy," she said, absently. "There is no need to discuss it, Mr. Gilmore. Your experience ought to be, and is, the best guide I can desire."

I did not altogether like her thrusting the whole responsibility, in this marked manner, on my shoulders. If Mr. Fairlie had done it, I should not have been surprised. But resolute, clear-minded Miss Halcombe, was the very last person in the world whom I should have expected to find shrinking from the expression of an opinion of her own.

"If any doubts still trouble you," I said, "of why not mention them to me at once? Tell me plainly, have you any reason to distrust Sir Percival still?"

"None whatever."

"Do you see any thing improbable or contradictory in the statement it contains?"

"How can I say I do, after the proof he has offered me of the truth of it? Can there be better testimony than that of Mr. Gilmore, than the testimony of the woman's mother?"

"None better. If the answer to your note of inquiry proves to be satisfactory, I, for one, can not see what more any friend of Sir Percival's can possibly expect from him."

"Then we will post the letter," she said, rising to leave the room, "and dismiss all further reference to the subject until the answer arrives. Pray leave every thing to my discretion. I can give no better reason for it than that I have been overanxious about Laura Jeffry: and anxiety, Mr. Gilmore, unsettles the strongest of us."

She left me abruptly; her naturally firm voice faltering as she spoke those last words. A sensitive, vehement, passionate nature—a woman of ten thousand—behind the conventional mask. I had known her from her earliest years; I had seen her tested, as she grew up, in more than one trying family crisis, and my long experience made me attach an importance to her hesitation under the circumstances here detailed which I should certainly not have felt in the case of another woman. I could see no cause for any uneasiness or any doubt; but she had made me a little uneasy and a little doubtful nevertheless. In my youth I should have chafed and fretted under the irritation of my own unreasonable state of mind. In my age I knew better, and went out philosophically to walk it off.

II.

We all met again at dinner-time.

Sir Percival was in such boisterous high spirits that I hardly recognized him as the same man whose quiet tact, refinement, and good sense had impressed me so strongly at the interview of the morning. The only trace of his former self that I could detect reappeared, every now and then, in his manner toward Miss Fairlie. A look or a word there suspended his loudest laugh, checked his gayest flow of talk, and rendered him all attention to her, and to no one else at table, in an instant. Although he never openly tried to draw her into the conversation, he never lost the slightest chance she gave him of letting her drift into it by accident, and of saying the words to her, under those favorable circumstances, which a man with less tact and delicacy would have pointedly addressed to her the moment they occurred to him. Rather to my surprise, Miss Fairlie appeared to be sensible of his attentions without being moved by them. She was a little confused sometimes at the time, when he looked at her or spoke to her; but she never warmed toward him. Rank, fortune, good-breeding, good looks, the power to win a woman's fancy, and devotion of a lover, were all humbly placed at her feet, and, so far as appearances went, were all offered in vain.

On the next day, the Tuesday, Sir Percival went in the morning (taking one of the servants with him as a guide) to Todd's Corner. His inquiries, as I afterward heard, led to no results. On his return he had an interview with Mr. Fairlie, and in the afternoon he and Miss Halcombe rode out together. Nothing else happened worthy of record.

Wednesday's post brought with it no event—the reply from Mrs. Catherick. I took a copy of the document, which I have preserved, and which I may as well present in this place. It ran as follows:

"MADAM,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, inquiring whether my daughter, Anne, was placed under medical superintendence with a view to her restoration, and whether the share taken in the matter by Sir Percival Glyde was such as to merit the expression of our gratitude toward the gentleman. Be pleased to accept my answer in the affirmative to both those questions, and believe me to remain, your obedient servant,

"JANE ANNE CATHERICK."

Short, sharp, and to the point: in form, rather a business-like letter for a woman to write, in substance, as plain a confirmation as could be desired of Sir Percival's story of his intentions. This was my opinion, and, with certain minor reservations, Miss Halcombe's opinion also. Sir Percival, when the letters were shown to him, did not appear to be struck by the sharp, short tone of it. He told us that Mrs. Catherick was a woman of few words, and those few, a blunt, forward, unimaginative person, who wrote briefly and plainly, just as she spoke.

The next day's post completed, now that the answer had been received, was to acquaint Miss Fairlie with Sir Percival's explanation. Miss Halcombe had undertaken to do it, and had left the room to go to her sister, when she suddenly returned to the breakfast-table in an easy-chair in which I was reading the newspaper. Sir Percival had gone out a minute before, to look at the stables, and no one was in the room but ourselves.

"I suppose we have really and truly done all we can?" she said, twisting and twisting Mrs. Catherick's letter in her hand.

"If we are friends of Sir Percival's, who know him and trust him, we have done all, and more than all, that is necessary," I answered, a little annoyed by this return of her hesitation.

"But if we are friends—and we are friends, and more than all, that is necessary," I answered, a little annoyed by this return of her hesitation.

"But if we are friends, we are satisfied, now that the answer has been received, was to acquaint Miss Fairlie with Sir Percival's explanation. Miss Halcombe had undertaken to do it, and had left the room to go to her sister, when she suddenly returned to the breakfast-table in an easy-chair in which I was reading the newspaper. Sir Percival had gone out a minute before, to look at the stables, and no one was in the room but ourselves.

"I suppose we have really and truly done all we can?" she said, twisting and twisting Mrs. Catherick's letter in her hand.

"If we are friends of Sir Percival's, who know him and trust him, we have done all, and more than all, that is necessary," I answered, a little annoyed by this return of her hesitation.

"But if we are friends—and we are friends," she repeated, with a look of surprise at me, "that is exactly what I was going to say. Why should we not be friends?"

"That alternative is not even to be thought of," she interposed. "We are Sir Percival's friends; and, if generosity can influence him, add to our regard for him, we ought to be Sir Percival's admirers as well. You know that he gave Mr. Fairlie yesterday, and that he afterward went out with me?"

"Yes. I saw you riding away together."

"We began talking about Anne Catherick, and about the singular manner in which Mr. Hartright met with her. But we soon dropped that subject, and Sir Percival spoke next, in the most unselfish terms, of his engagement with Laura. He said he had observed that she was out of spirits, and he was willing, if not informed to the contrary, to attribute that cause for depression in her manner toward him during his present visit. If, however, there was any other more serious reason for the change, that he should wish me to say, straight might be placed on her inclinations either by Mr. Fairlie or by me. All he asked, in that case, was that Laura herself should speak to him at last time, what the circumstances were under which the engagement between them was made, and what the reasons were which led to the beginning of the courtship to the present time. If, after due reflection on those two subjects, she seriously desired that he should withdraw his pretensions to the honor of becoming her husband—and if she would tell him so plainly, with her own lips—he would sacrifice his feelings to leaving her perfectly free to withdraw from the engagement."

"No man could say more than that, Miss Halcombe. As to my experience, few men in his situation would have said as much."

She paused after he had spoken those words and looked at me with a singular expression of perplexity and distress.

"If anyone but I had spoken those words and looked at me with a singular expression of perplexity and distress.

"I excuse nobody and I suspect nothing," she broke out, abruptly. "But I can not and will not accept the responsibility of persuading Laura to this marriage."

"That is exactly the course which Sir Percival Glyde has himself requested you to take," I replied, in astonishment. "He has begged you not to force her inclinations."

"And he indirectly obliges me to force them, if I give her his message."

"How can that possibly be?"

"Consult your own knowledge of Laura, Mr. Gilmore. If I tell her to reflect on the circumstances of her engagement, I at once appeal to two of the strongest feelings in her nature—to her love for her father's memory, and to her strict regard for truth. You know that she never broke a promise in her life; you know those favorable circumstances connected with the beginning of her father's fatal illness, and that he spoke hopefully and happily of her marriage to Sir Percival Glyde on his death-bed."

I own that I was a little shocked at this view of the case.

"Surely," I said, "you don't mean to infer that when Sir Percival spoke to you yesterday he speculated on such a result as you have just mentioned?"

Her frank, fearless face answered for her before she spoke.

"Do you think I would remain an instant in the company of any man whom I suspected of such baseness as that?" she asked, angrily.

I liked to see her hereby indignation flash out on me in that way. We see so much malice and so little indignation in my profession.

"In that case," I said, "excuse me if I tell you, in our legal phrase, that you are traveling out of the record. Whatever the consequences may be, Sir Percival has a right to expect that your sister should carefully consider her engagement from every reasonable point of view before she claims her release from it. If that unlucky letter has prejudiced her against him, go at once, and tell her so. Sir Percival himself is present, eyes and in mine. What objection can she urge against him after that? What excuse can she possibly have for changing her mind about a man whom she virtually accepted for her husband more than two years ago?"

"Mr. Gilmore," said Miss Halcombe, Mr. Gilmore, no excuse, I dare say. If she still hesitates, and if I still hesitate, you must attribute our strange conduct to a right motive in both cases, and we must bear the imputation as well as we can."

With those words she suddenly rose and left me. What could I say? I could not even question put to her, and evades it by a flippant answer, it is a sure sign, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, that she has something to conceal. I returned to the perusal of the newspaper, strongly suspecting that Miss Halcombe and Miss Fairlie had a secret between them which they were keeping from Sir Percival and keeping from me. I thought this had on both of us—especially on Sir Percival.

My doubts—or, to speak more correctly, my convictions—were confirmed by Miss Halcombe's lengthened absence from the room after her sister in the day. She was suspiciously brief and reserved in telling me the result of her interview with her sister. Miss Fairlie, it appeared, had listened quietly while the affair of the letter was placed before her in the right point of view; but when Miss Halcombe came to something to say that the object of Sir Percival's visit at Limmeridge was to propose for her, to let a day be fixed for the marriage, she checked all further reference to the subject by begging for time. If Sir Percival would consent to spare her for the present she would undertake to give him his final answer before the end of the year. She pleaded for this delay with much anxiety and agitation that Miss Halcombe had promised to use her influence, if necessary, to obtain it; and there, at Miss Fairlie's own entreaty, all further discussion of the marriage question had ended.

The purely temporary arrangement thus proposed might be the most convenient enough to the young lady; but it proved somewhat embarrassing to the writer of these lines. That morning's post had brought a letter from my partner which obliged me to return to town the next day by the afternoon train. It was extremely probable that I should find no second opportunity of presenting myself at Limmeridge House during the remainder of the year. In that case, supposing Miss Fairlie ultimately decided on holding her engagement, my necessary personal communication with her, before I drew her settlement, would become something like a downright impossibility; and we should be obliged to commit to writing questions which ought either to be discussed by word of mouth or kept out of mouth. I said nothing about this difficulty until Miss Halcombe and I were alone on the subject of the desired delay. He was too gallant a gentleman not to grant the request immediately—but he would probably expect me to ask, this, I told her that I must absolutely speak to her sister before I left Limmeridge; and it was, accordingly, arranged that I should see her and I thought Sir Percival looked, as well he might, a little annoyed when he heard of it.

The next morning, as soon as breakfast was over, I went up to Miss Fairlie's sitting-room. The poor girl looked so pale and sad, and came forward so prettily and so readily and prettily, that the resolution to lecture her on her caprice and indecision, which I had been forming all night, began to fade away on the spot. I led her back to the chair from which she had risen, and placed myself opposite to her. Her crossgrained pet greyhound was in the room, and I fully expected a barking and snapping reception. Strange to say, the whimsical little brute fabulised my expectations by jumping into my lap, and poking its sharp muzzle familiarly into my hand the moment I sat down.

"You used often to sit on my knee when you were a child, my dear," I said, "and now your little dog seems determined to succeed you in the vacant throne. Is that pretty drawing your doing?"

I pointed to a little album which lay on the table by her side, and which she had evidently been looking over when I came in. The page that lay open had a small water-color landscape very neatly mounted on it. This was the drawing which had suggested my question: an idle question enough; but how could I begin to talk of business to her the moment I opened my lips?

"No," she said, looking away from the drawing rather confusedly; "it is not my doing."

Her manner had a restless habit, which I remembered in her as a child, of playing with the first thing that came to hand, whenever any one was talking to her. On this occasion they wandered to the album, and toyed absently about the margin of the little water-color drawing. The expression of uneasiness deepened on her face. She did not look at the drawing, or look at me. Her eyes moved uneasily from object to object in the room; betraying plainly that she suspected what my purpose was in coming to speak to her. Seeing that, I thought it best to get to the purpose with as little delay as possible.

"One of the errands, my dear, which brings me here is to bid you good-by," I began. "I must get back to London to-day; and, before I leave, I want to have a word with you on the subject of your own affairs."

"I am very sorry you are going, Mr. Gilmore," she said, looking at me kindly. "It is like the happy times to have you here."

"I hope I may be able to come back, and recall those pleasant memories once more," I continued; "but as there is some uncertainty about the future, I must take my opportunity when I can get it, and speak to you now. I am your old lawyer and your old friend; and I may remind you, I am sure, without offense, of the possibility of your marrying Sir Percival Glyde."

She took her hand off the little album as suddenly as if it had turned hot and burned her. Her fingers twisted together nervously in her lap; her eyes looked down again at the floor; and an expression of constraint settled on her face which looked almost like an expression of pain.

"Is it absolutely necessary to speak of my marriage engagement?" she asked, in low tones.

"It is necessary to refer to it," I answered; "but not to dwell on it. Let us merely say that you may marry, or that you may not marry. In the first case, I must be prepared, beforehand, to draw your settlement; and I ought not to do that without, as a matter of politeness, first consulting you. This may be my only chance of hearing what your wishes are. Let me, therefore, suppose the case of your marrying, and let me inform you, in as few words as possible, what your position is now, and what you may make it, if you please, in the future."

I explained to her the object of a marriage settlement; and then told her exactly what her prospects were in the first place, from the coming of age, and, in the second place, on the decease of her uncle—marking the distinction between the property in which she had a life-interest only, and the property which was left at her own absolute disposal. Listened attentively, with the constrained expression still on her face, and her hands still nervously clasped together in her lap.

"And now," I said, in conclusion, "tell me if you can think of any condition which, in the case we have supposed, you would wish me to make for you—subject, of course, to your guardian's approval, as you are not yet of age."

She answered hastily, in short sentences, looked in my face, on a sudden, very earnestly.

"If it does happen," she began, faintly; "if I marry—"

"If you are married," I added, helping her out.

"Don't let him part me from Marian," she cried, with a sudden outbreak of energy. "Oh, Mr. Gilmore, pray make it law that Marian is to live with me!"

Under other circumstances I might perhaps have been amused at this essentially feminine interpretation of the question, and at the long explanation which had preceded it. But her looks and tones when she spoke were of a kind to make me receive the serious—the touching—one. Her words, few as they were, betrayed a desperate clinging to the past which boded ill for the future.

"You having Marian Halcombe to live with you can easily be settled by private arrangement," I said. "You hardly understood my question, I think. It referred to your own property—to the disposal of your money. Supposing you were to make a will, when you come of age, who would you like the money to go to?"

"Marian has been another and sister both to me," said the good, affectionate girl, her pretty blue eyes glistening while she spoke. "May I leave it to Marian, Mr. Gilmore?"

"Certainly, my love," I answered. "But remember what a large sum it is. Would you like it all to go to Miss Halcombe?"

She hesitated; her color came and went; and her hand stole back again to the little album.

"Not all of it," she said. "There is some one else besides Marian—"

She stopped; her color heightened; and the fingers of her hand that rested upon the album bent gently on the margin of the drawing, as if her memory had set them going unconsciously with the remembrance of a favorite tune.

"You mean some other member of the family to whom you are fondest?" I suggested, seeing her at a loss to proceed.

The heightening color spread to her forehead and her neck, and the nervous fingers suddenly clasped themselves fast round the edge of the book.

"There is some one else," she said, not noticing my last words, though she had evidently heard them; "there is some one else who might like a little keepsake if—if I might have it. There would be no harm if I should die first—"

She paused again. The color that had spread over her cheeks suddenly as suddenly left them. The hand on the album resigned its hold, trembled a little, and moved the book away from her. She looked at me for an instant—then turned her head aside in the chair. Her handkerchief fell to the floor as she changed her position, and she hurriedly hid her face from me in her hands.

Sad! To remember her, as I did, the liveliest, happiest child that ever laughed the day through; and to see her now, in the flower of her age and her beauty, so broken and so brought down as this!

In the distress that she caused me, I forgot the years that had passed, and the change they had made in our position toward one another. I moved my chair close to her, and picked up her handkerchief from the carpet, and took her hands from her face gently. "Don't cry, my love," I said, and dried the tears that were gathering in her eyes, with my own hand, as if she had been the little Laura Fairlie of ten long years ago.

It was the best way I could have taken to compose her. She hid her head on my shoulder, and smiled faintly through her tears.

"I am very sorry for forgetting myself," she said, archly. "I have not been well—I have felt sadly weak and nervous lately; and I cannot always control when I am alone. I am better now; I can answer you as I ought, Mr. Gilmore. I can indeed."

"No, no, my dear," I replied; "we will consider the subject as done with, for the present. You have said enough to ascertain my wishes to the best possible care of your interests; and we can settle details at another opportunity. Let us have done with business now, and talk of something else."

I led her at once into speaking on other topics. In ten minutes' time she was in better spirits, and I rose to take my leave.

"Come here again," she said earnestly. "I will try to be worthier of your kind feeling for me and for my interests if you will only come again."

Still clinging to the past—the past which I represented to her, in my way, as Miss Halcombe did in hers! It troubled me sorely to see her looking back to the beginning of her career just as I took back at the end of mine.

"If I do come again, I hope I shall find you better," I said. "I better and happier. God bless you, my dear."

She only answered by putting up her cheek to me to be kissed. Even lawyers have hearts; and mine ached a little as I took leave of her.

The whole interview between us had only lasted more than half an hour—she had not breathed a word, in my presence, to explain the mystery of her evident distress and dismay at the prospect of her marriage—and yet she had contrived to win me over to her side of the question, I never knew how or when. I had entered the room feeling that Sir Percival Glyde had fair reason to complain of the manner in which she was treating him. I left it, positively hoping that matters might end in her taking him at his word and claiming her release. A man of my age and experience ought to have known better than to vacillate in this unreasonable manner. I can make no excuse for myself; I can only tell the truth, and say—so it was.

The hour for my departure was now drawing near. I sent to Mr. Fairlie to say that I would wait on him to take leave if he liked, but that he must excuse my being rather in a hurry. He sent a message back, written in pencil on a slip of paper: "Kind love and best wishes.—Frederick Gilmore. Hurry of any kind is inexpressibly injurious to me. Pray take care of yourself. Good-by."

"Have you said all you wanted to Laura?" she asked.

"Yes," I replied. "She is very weak and nervous—I am glad she has you to take care of her."

Miss Halcombe's sharp eyes studied my face attentively.

"You are altering your opinion about Laura," she said. "You are readier to make allowances for her than you were yesterday."

No sensible man ever engages, unprepared, in a fencing match of words with a woman. I only answered:

"Let me know what happens. I will do nothing till I hear from you."

She still looked hard in my face. "I wish it was all over, and well over, Mr. Gilmore—and so do you." With those words she left me.

Sir Percival most politely insisted on seeing me to the carriage door.

"If you ever are in my neighborhood," he said, "pray don't forget that I am sincerely anxious to improve our acquaintance." The tried and trusted friend of this family will be always a welcome visitor in any house of mine."

A really irresistible man—courteous, complacent, delightfully free from pride—a gentleman every inch of him. As I drove away to the station I felt as if I could cheerfully do anything to promote the interests of Sir Percival Glyde—any thing in the world, except drawing the marriage settlement of his wife.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, January 3, in the Senate, a number of private bills were introduced and referred, as also were petitions of no general interest. Senator King had the resolutions of the Rochester Union meeting read, and then proceeded to speak of the evidences of attachment to the Union presented by the people of New York. Senator Brown explained the grounds of his difference from those of the views put forth by the President in his Message. Mr. Ducklin took the floor and spoke at length in favor of the Homestead bill. In the House, speeches on slavery were made by Messrs. Boyce and English. Mr. Anderson presented a memorial from mail contractors, asking for relief. He then urged a speedy organization of the House, and opposed a union of anti-Lecompton men, Americans, and Democrats. Mr. Stevens proposed a plurality vote and no more. Many Republicans opposed, these present asked the Republicans to put out the loan before the $500,000 to the Union men. The House adjourned without voting for Speaker.

On Wednesday, January 4, in the Senate, a bill was introduced by Senator Powell to abolish the franking privilege. Senator Iverson offered a resolution relating to the Hounas Land Grant, and moved its reference to the Committee on Public Lands, instead of to a Select Committee. Senators Mason, Harlan, and Foster then spoke on slavery, after which the Senate adjourned. In the House, the subject of the distress of mail contractors was discussed, and a bill for their relief, Burnett's original organization dwelt upon. Mr. Rogers, Mr. Cox, and Mr. Reynolds (anti-American) spoke on the subject of politics; after which a vote for Speaker was had. Mr. Sherman having received a plurality of votes, Mr. Clingman's name was next balloted, receiving 53 votes.

On Thursday, January 5, in the Senate, no business was transacted and no speeches made. In the House, Mr. Montgomery introduced a resolution for a temporary organization of the House, and urged the necessity of the most conservative action. Mr. Pettit moved that to adopt the plurality rule, when he replied that, if he was willing, others were not. Many Republicans on all sides were then made by Messrs. Keogan, Wells, and others. Two votes were had for Speaker, but no choice was had, until the three votes necessary to elect him, and Mr. Washington Hunter received 109 votes. Mr. Pettit's motion to second vote Mr. Boocock got the highest Democratic vote, which was 56. A debate followed relative to the inability of either party to consummate an election. An exciting afternoon session followed. Messrs. Hoge, Porter, and Dunn, of Indiana—the two latter charging the former, who is an anti-Lecompton Democrat, with having denounced the Dred Scott decision, which he denied on the, pronouncing the Kansas Constitution fair. An extract from his speech was read to confirm the charge, when Mr. Dunn withdrew the charge. Mr. Hoge's remarks follow. Without taking another vote for Speaker the House adjourned.

On Friday, Jan. 6, the Senate sat being in session, in the House. Mr. Miles moved a resolution to show how the three elements opposed to the Democracy could be harmonized for the purpose of effecting an organization. He argued that the responsibility for the non-organization rested with the Republican Abolitionists. Mr. Adrain followed in explanation of his position and cast-iron as did also Messrs. Montgomery, Pendleton taking this turn, was participated in by Messrs. Davis, De Jarnette, Barksdale, and Curry. The vote was bad, Mr. Sherman still lacks, three votes. Mr. McClernand was next highest, receiving 74 votes.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK.

The Message of Governor Morgan is mainly taken up with the recommendation of additional legislation relative to the affairs of the nation only to express the loyalty of New York to the Constitution and the Union, and the views of Governor Morgan to the Republican doctrine of Congressional non-interference with the domestic affairs of States of the Union. The next striking of the Governor's suggestions is the Legislature to memorialize Congress in favor of the protective policy in regard to our canals by imposing a moderate toll on the transit of goods in addition of freight upon all railways which compete with the canals; the enlargement of the canals to be finished be raised; and the recommendation of a law authorizing loans to that end, to be paid out of the tolls of the canals. The Governor is concerned about the defenses of New York City against pirates and privateers, and says he has moved in the case of colored voters; discourages special, in favor of general legislation; recommends a revision of prisons, banks, and agencies, and finds the condition of our State finances fairly credited, and concludes with a new year of New York begins, according to this Message, under the High Constitutional.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF OHIO.

Governor Chase, of Ohio, in his Message to the Legislature, states that the receipts into the Treasury from the State Treasury, during the last year, was $3,50,264, which, with the balance in the Treasury at that the close of the preceding year, made the sum subject to disbursement $3,752,304. The payments during the year were $3,252,304. The public works and educational institutions absorbed the largest portion of the sum, more than three-eighths the entire levy for State purposes is the interest on the State debt, amounting to $1,200,000. Chase recommends the re-enactment of the statutes which the last Legislature repealed, relative to kidnapping and kidnapping. He thinks that it would be useless to have laws giving the fugitive slave the right to trial by Courts, not the Legislature, are to determine this question. The militia of the State, he says, has been reorganized four years ago, has been reorganized to such an extent that it forms a respectable organization, and is chiefly competent to any ordinary emergency. In conclusion, Governor Chase thanks the Legislature for Governor's Executive, reaffirming the position which he took in his message to Governor Medill, that the Legislature of the South has done much to bring about the present unhappy state of feeling between the two sections of the country by repealing the Missouri Compromise, kidnapping from the soil of the Union the property really and of the crime of color, and by returning so frequently and needlessly her tireless of slavery.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF PENNSYLVANIA.

The Message of the Governor of Pennsylvania refers to the Harper's Ferry outbreak, and says that the duty pertaining to Pennsylvanians to believe that the citizens of the Commonwealth did not participate in the conspiracy in that unlawful proceeding, and to know that when some of the guilty parties were arrested in the Keystone State the country by repealing the Missouri Compromise, kidnapping from the soil of the Union the property really and of the crime of color, and by returning so frequently and needlessly her tireless of slavery.

SENATOR DOUGLAS NOMINATED FOR THE PRESIDENCY.

The Illinois Democratic State Convention last week selected Douglas and Johnson delegates to represent the State in the National Convention at Charleston. The Douglas delegates are pledged to support Douglas for the Presidency, and the Johnson delegates to support Johnson for the Vice-Presidency.

PERSONAL.

Senator Mason appeared in his seat on Wednesday clad in Virginia homespun, while a large number of the other House sported a suit of "direct importation."

The Tribune says: "When Governor Seward entered his gateway, and was standing within it, all the clergymen of the various denominations in Auburn waiting to welcome him home, he led the power of speech. He entered his house in silence. Among the very many pleasant words in his reception, the most pleasant were congratulations from thirty little girls.

Hon. Hon. John Wentworth, M. C. from Louisiana, has been defeated from his seat by illness since the opening of the present session. He is stated, however, to be out of danger, he is laboring under severe mental affliction in the loss of his wife and four children. It is feared that he may not get up again. He is at Brown's Hotel, Washington.

The New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Press writes:

"The following gossip is current respecting a vein of affin 'on that has just been struck by the Comet: Died in December, 1856, John C. Fremont, after being defeated in his ambition for the Presidency, leaving an estate of money, and sold to Benjamin and Fernando Wood one half of his Pacific Railroad claim to gold mines in California. The Woods advanced Fremont from $50,000 to $100,000 on the strength of their purchase. The Supreme Court cases arrived yesterday sustains Fremont's title. The Woods have now by law the status of the Bourbons and P. Wood, will not sell short of $1000 a day!"

The Rev. Dr. Cheever has returned from Italy, only seven weeks high. He is to be sent to Washington to the Senate, and to be sent from the U. S. Minister to United States Consul.

Senator Douglas was reported sick on Thursday. He may yet be obliged to go South.

The Washington Star says: "A gentleman, whose word is proof, informs us that Mr. John A. Washington has in his possession a check for $250 000 for the amount who binds a loan fide offer of $250 000 for the Mount Vernon Estate by him to the ladies of the Mount Vernon Association for $200,000.

The Abolitionists of Concord gives the first chapter in "a story of real life," by saying that Miss Harriet E. Wilson, daughter of Mrs. Harriet Wilson, of Spafford, Onondaga County, New York, will start soon for Washington Territory, to join her husband, who is now in the Rocky Mountains, to marry a man she has never seen—Mr. D. Spalding, a native of Lord Spalding, of Spafford. The friends of the parties, are intimate, and a correspondence has existed for some time between them, which has resulted in a marriage contract. The young gentleman, who is engaged in the mining business which he says conveniently leave, has resided to the lady, with which she will be able to join him.

The Tribune says: "Gerrit Smith is very much impressed with the belief that he is not fully restored to health, and the doctor has prohibited him from receiving visitors, or from writing letters, for the present correspondence. It is hoped that his numerous friends will not intrude upon him, and that letters will be sent to the editor under which his physician has placed him, and set in accordance.

We have noticed the suicide, by hanging, of a youth named Charles Ross, in Cincinnati. The Union of that city says: "No cause has yet been assigned for the committal. Mr. Ross, the father of the deceased, has been deeply interested in the trishand executions of the Harper's Ferry conspirators, and has exerted sacrificing and exhausting coming in his way bearing upon those events; his hands are in a measure tied, and he can do but little, besides to test the nature of strangulation by hanging led him to the fatal experiment recommended fatally. The deceased was a promising lad about seventeen years of age.

The Boston Atlas says it is now announced positively that the Rev. Theodore Parker's flag has accepted the position of the Unitarian Society of San Francisco, California, to succeed Starr King, deceased. The congregation to the Hollis Street Church and Society was submitted to the Parish Committee, and was unanimously called for that purpose.

The Managers of the Grand Trunk Railroad desired a large number of axes, but having no faith in Yankee patent inventions in general, they sent a pattern of one of the axes required, and sent to England to have the same made. In due time the axes arrived, and were forwarded sent to Canada, but not one of the whole number had a hole in the handle for the eye.

Squire Meriaker, in Cincinnati, last week, was called on to unite in marriage Mr. Horton and Miss Rossiter, who had fled from Fayette County, Kentucky. At the nuptial ceremony, Horton's former slave servant Jack was present, and the bride bet eighteen—were also anxious to salute the bride. Jack, however, was not very much pleased, and they were accommodated. The strangest part of the affair is that Horton purchased the Burnett House and his bridegroom at the Spencer were son and father. Each had married the other's daughter, and each was content; neither knew the purpose of the other, and both are now the best of friends. The young man knowing the facts, the Burnett House applied to the Spencer, and Lincoln was not disappointed.

A citizen at Harper's Ferry has just forwarded for presentation to Governor Wise the pocket-knife of Capt. Brown. The article in question is now in the Enquirer office, where it remains subject to Governor Wise's order. It is an old jack-knife, a bone handle and two blades, and is in a very dilapidated condition. A small piece out of the handle is engraved with the name "John Brown." On one side of the large blade is engraved, and the words, "Prairie Chief and Sabber of Kansas." Taken from his person at the time of Harper's Ferry Affair, 17th October, 1859." On the other side of the blade: "Put it down to me. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, by Arch'd M. Kitzmiller."

Mr. Hope Slidell, a brother-in-law of Mrs. Grant Connelly, Wisconsin, had a remarkable adventure in Washington, D. C., on Saturday night, in committing depredations in that vicinity, and, overtaking the culprit, engaged in single combat, and after being thus carried for some distance, Schultz valiantly struck his opponent across the face with a knife, the blunt climbed a tree, and Schultz still clinging to him. The bear, however, "subdued" him at by going through the fork of the tree, and Schultz was thereby left to his fate, and he did the bear, killing him. This is a hard story, but is vouched for by the editor of Dixieville, who exhibits the facts to the editor of the Galena Advertiser. Mr. Schultz is a young man of fine looking qualities him for a prominent place among our modern turbulent.

The Kansas Constitutional Convention has elected Hon. Robert Dale Owen to his seat house, in Percy County, Indiana.

A letter from Havana, in the New Orleans Picayune, dated January 4th, says that information had been given there of his loss a passenger has the son of the Chief, or King, of the Dahomey district of Africa, who took passenger to Cuba in 1857 upon a slavery, and fell into the hands of the authorities on ordinary Bozal. After two years of official examination and investigation, in Havana and was sent to Spain, where he has been identified as the royal personage, son of Congo's great king, long known as the Chief of Dahomey, Gezo Gezo, Gezo, at his own request. He talks Spanish, Portuguese, and French, and is said to be a man of intelligence. He and or taught the tenets of his new faith he will be sent to Spain, and there will be placed in the Jesuitical College, at request Colonel Felipe Arango, in charge of the Ecclesiastic Library, and Professor of Languages in the Seminary, which request he complied with in the presence of a crowd attracted by the royal novelty.

The gentleman who subscribed, some weeks since, the munificent sum of Fifteen Thousand ($15,000) toward building a chapel for Mr. Spurgeon, was Mr. Henry John Stephen, a retired barrister-at-law, residing at Clifton, in Gloucestershire, England. This wealthy individual expends annually a very large sum in the building of dissenting chapels throughout England, and dispenses a portion of his ample fortune through the medium of his private chaplain, the Rev. Edward Thomas Inskip, a gentleman well known in Bristol, England, for his evangelical principles.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

BRITISH OPINION ON JOHN BROWN.

The London Times has a leader on the execution of John Brown, and the circumstances it gave rise to. It says that it appears somewhat ludicrous to find that the North did everything in their power to conciliate, and after that this does not convey a very exalted notion of their courage and determination. It says that the sentiment is:

"The result will be to strengthen the South by the adhesion of the Northern portion of Pennsylvania, a country lies between two extremes. Whatever may be the future of the negro race, no one in his senses can believe its regeneration can be effected by inciting it to murder planters and ravish white women; and if any man chooses to head an outbreak of this kind, he must expect to meet a fate which right-thinking men will not glorify with a crown of martyrdom."

FRANCE.

THE EUROPEAN CONGRESS.

The Paris Pays publishes the following as the definite official list of the plenipotentiaries:

Austria—Count Rechberg, and Prince de Metternich.

Great Britain—Lord Cowley, and Lord Wodehouse.

Prussia—Baron Werther, and Count Bernstorff.

Russia—Prince Gortchakoff and Count Kisseleff.

Sardinia—Count Walewski and Prince Latour de Auvergne.

Spain—M. Martinez de la Rosa and M. Mon.

Portugal—Count Lavradio and Vicount de Faira.

The Paris Pays says that the names of the representatives of the Holy See, the two Sicilies, Sardinia, and Sweden, are not yet known, but that the Holy See will be represented by that Count Cavour has been definitely appointed first plenipotentiary of Sardinia, and the Chevalier Desambrois the second, and that France has been officially notified of the fact. It is also positively asserted that Count Antonelli will represent the Pope.

The Paris Journal announces that the opening of the Congress will definitely take place on the 20th of January.

THE EXPECTED NEW-YEAR'S DAY GIFT TO FRANCE.

The London Daily News correspondent in Paris says that it was currently reported that the expected amnesties in the tariff would apply principally to cotton, and that iron would not be benefited by it.

THE LEMOINE CASE.

"Malakoff" writes to the Times: "The condemnation of Miss Lemoine, a twenty years' band labor in the Penitentiary, and the acquittal of the daughter, is the judgment which, if correctly appraised, is certainly far from justice. The prosecution has not proved the guilt of the one, nor the innocence of the indictment—that is to say, the guiltiness. The daughter of the accused has given a very strong proof of her filial piety in the manner in which her religious education was conducted. Devote herself to the confessions of Maria Deloime, or those of Jean Jacques Rousseau. Miss Rossiter and Miss Lemoine were both brought to Paris by her relatives, and placed under the care of the Sisters of Charity.

"A daughter incident connected with the crime of Madame Lemoine shows how it is possible to mingle poetry with the most horrible crimes. She was found in an act of cruel barbarity. The magistrate charged with the examination of the case, and who had been employed in the ashes of the chimney, mingled with the remains of the unfortunate child, several flowers—Jasmine and a rose—placed there as upon a grave."

HOUSE OPERATION.

The Paris correspondent of the Courrier des Etats Unis gives an account of a horse operation by an American veterinary surgeon, which took place in the Carrousel of Paris. The subject of the story is, or rather was, called Jack Rossiter. He was no common horse, without pedigree, as appeared; for Horlan, the American who performed the feat, had purchased him in England. The boast was stated in London, in which Jack was the property of Mr. Rossiter, a banker, James Bevin, a rival and friend, up to that time, of Horlan. Jack was sold to the latter gentleman by Rossiter. Horlan, that Bevin gained over the groom of Jack Rossiter, and bribed him to poison his horse. Horlan's scoundrel, undertook to search for the horse, and, after a thousand vicissitudes, found him in the hands of the negro servant of Bevin. He followed, entered his compound, and bought the horse from the negro, pretending to buy for his master Tinton, living at the Louvre Hotel, who had ordered him to purchase a horse. Horlan, having his debtor, gave Jack Rossiter in payment. Horlan denies this, and refers to an inquiry, which the Tribunal has accorded to him.

AUSTRIA.

PROBABLE RISING IN HUNGARY.

Advices from Hungary represent the danger of a conflict between the Imperial authorities and the Hungarian Protestants, as daily increasing. The Austrian army is concentrated in Pesth, and 50,000 more are expected. A fortification had taken place in Pesth, and a fall of about 14 per cent had resulted in the Vienna Bourse.

SPAIN

THE WAR WITH MOROCCO.

The latest accounts from Morocco are to the 16th. The Moors had received reinforcements, their strength amounting with the same impetuous bravery, and each time with more determination.

Private letters from Cadiz state that the plan of the Spanish attack on the Moorish camp was discovered by treachery, or by lead from Ceuta and from the river. Tetuan is defended by a force of 40,000 men.

A Madrid letter of the 14th says that the Spanish army was encamped on the heights of Sierra, and continually asking for fresh reinforcements. His position was considered critical.

A Madrid dispatch says:

Yesterday the Moors attacked the left redoubt, but Count O'Donnell de Gloria surrounded them with his right wing and drove them back at the point of the bayonet. The enemy's loss in this encounter was 1500 men. Troops, as they invariably do, displayed great valor. Generals Echagüe and Ortega were severely wounded, but slightly. The enemy lost 1500 men. We had 80 killed and 150 wounded.

Heavy rains had inundated the Spanish camp and the surrounding country.

INDIA.

EXECUTION OF A RAJAH.

Rajah Jeydut had paid the extreme penalty of the law on Saturday morning last, the 1st October, at "the Nullah," Jhansie Fort. By six o'clock the preparations for the execution were complete. Before removing the prisoner from the jail, the Rajah was asked if he had anything to say. Jeydut Singh desired to the last his own guilt, avowed that he was about to die for the crimes of others, especially of his servants; that he was not conscious of the wrong actions committed, but was aware he knew the exact day, and that it was only on his return from the Nerbudda that they showed the head of what had been done the day before. He finally offered to pay a considerable sum for his life—for a reprieve—but on his sentence, and begged that the proposal might be communicated to the Governor-General. Before he was hanged. The death warrant was then read to him; after which the executioner, with a sword-a single jerk left the body swinging in the air. He died very hard. It was a good minute before the body was cut down, and he was still hanging for about an hour, after which it was taken down and buried in the jail. Thus ended the days of Rajah Jeydut Singh.

THE SLEIGHING SEASON—THE UPSET.

A SNOW SLIDE IN THE CITY.

ANNE AND I.

I AM an old maid.

There is a period in life when such a confession is very difficult to make. From thirty to forty, which is a sort of chrysalis state, when one clings a little to past hopes, and feels quite confident their like will come no more, there is a decided sensitiveness in regard to autobiographical dates, shrinking from prolonged interviews with genealogists and inquisitive old ladies, and even a latent dread of the contemporaries of youth, who are happily married, and generously teach their offspring to call you "aunt."

This transition period has passed for me long ago; in fact, I am a score of years beyond it; and now, sitting here by the fire in my cap and spectacles, and deep wrinkles, I will tell you my little story.

I was very pretty when I was seventeen years old. I could not help knowing it, and the knowledge was accompanied by a little fluttering thrill of pleasure which mother and Anne called vanity; but as I always in this day have the same feeling at sight of any thing lovely and fair, be it human face or delicate field flower, I think they were mistaken.

My mother was one of the best of women—to me far the best woman I ever knew. Every reflective picture of Faith that hangs at the foot of my bed. I have it there, where my glance may fall upon it last at night and first in the morning, because the serious mouth, and saintly eyes, and bands of shining hair are so very like hers, who is now, I trust, in heaven. By this you will know that my mother was beautiful as well as good.

Sister Anne was ten years older than I. She was a genius, and better than ever I thought of being, for she could do all sorts of household work; and then she had a way of helping the poor, and nursing the sick, and comforting the afflicted, and making garments for dirty children, like the good Dorcas of whom we read in the Acts of the Apostles; so every one in the village looked up to her, and paid her as much respect as they did the minister's wife.

As for me, I am sadly afraid I never did any thing to make people look up to me with respect. At home I was so careless that if dear mother had not been so good, and Anne a feminine edition of Job, I should never have known where to find a single article of my wardrobe. And as for pickling, and baking, and such coarse, common, but homelier offices of sweeping, dusting, and the like, I could not bring myself to them with any degree of patience, or win the good mother often said to me, "My dear Rose, these actions that seem so slight to you may be done in such a spirit as to please God, as good George Herbert says:

"A servant with this clause
Makes drudgery divine:
Who sweeps a room, as for Thy laws,
Makes that and the action fine."

I liked the poetry; it was simple and sweet; but it failed to beautify brooms and dusters in my estimation.

Anne had a lover over seas, who was to come home some day when he had made a large fortune and marry her. They parted, with this hope in prospect, when she was eighteen and I a little girl of eight; and as years passed I should have forgotten the existence of Ralph Haven, had it not been for the monthly advent of a foreign letter, which Anne, with heightened color and shining eyes, always took to her own chamber to feast upon in solitude.

When I was just turned of nineteen I had the first great sorrow of my life.

We had been spending one of our quietly happy evenings—mother, Anne, and I—in our cozy winter parlor. They had been sewing while I read aloud, and after that we had a little concert. Anne played very well upon an old harpsichord that had been a wedding present to mother, and we all sang to that accompaniment. I think I was as sweet music as I ever heard. At ten o'clock, our usual hour for evening prayers, Martha came to lay the kitchen, and I brought the great family Bible for mother to read. She turned over the leaves slowly, pausing at the record of her marriage, and at last selecting the Seventeenth Psalm, which she read through, repeating the last verse three times with great emphasis: "Thou will show me the path of life: in thy presence is fulness of joy; at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore." And then she knelt down, my gray—my dear, dear mother! There was a full minute of intense silence, and then Anne and Martha lifted her to her chair, and bore her, a senseless weight, to her bedroom close by.

It was paralysis!

This happened in February, and for three months we watched and prayed and hoped that she might in some degree recover the use of her limbs and her speech. But Anne lost all her blithe mood in constant care and anxiety. Her cheeks grew thin and white, her gray eyes sunken; here and there a shade of silver mingled with her dark hair, and two deep lines marred the smoothness of her low forehead. But she was never weary, never impatient, and mother could not bear her out of her sight a single moment; so there she staid by the invalid's couch, smoothing her pillows, holding her poor hand, and smiling cheerily in her face, until it seemed to me that our Anne was little less than an angel. Early in May mother died; and forgetting the few months of suffering, our memory gave her to us as she used to be—gentle, tender, loving—and we mourned for her with deep sorrow. We buried her in the garden, under the shadow of her favorite tree—for we wanted to feel that she was near us still—and we planted shrubs and fair flowers over her grave.

And now that all was over, Anne began to think of herself. She kept it from me as long as it was possible, but at length I learned the truth. Long watching, and care, and grief had done their work, and Anne was going blind!

The first I knew of it was one evening about a fortnight after the funeral. We were standing together at the open window, before the lamp was lit, I drew Anne's attention, and for a minute or more she strained her poor eyes to catch its tremulous silver light; then shaking her head, she laid her soft hand in mine, and whispered, sadly:

"I can not see it, Rose."

I looked down in her face—for I was a head taller than she—and I have never forgotten the expression of divine resignation that softened every feature.

"Can not see it, sister!" I echoed.

"No, dear; nor the stars. It is a long while that I have not seen the stars, and I miss them more than I can tell. What will you remember me so! Rose, my child, your poor sister's sight is fading!"

I would not believe it. The thought of Anne blind—good, thoughtful, careful Anne, who was now looking forward to one great joy, the speedy return of her lover—she to have her eyes darkened! Oh, no! God, who was good and kind, would not suffer it. Thus reasoned the foolish girl at eighteen. Since then I have learned to trust His love, although I often fail to understand the way by which He leads me.

Neither Anne nor I closed our eyes to sleep that night. We thought and planned until daybreak, for, if the world were true, many projects must be done, and that speedily. Surely there was room for hope when there were such great oculists in the New York and Philadelphia hospitals, why must help Anne! As if in anticipation of our wishes, there came within the week a letter from one of a brother's old friends in the New York Tribune. It was full of gentle sympathy and kindness, and she begged one of us to come to her for a few weeks of rest. Here was the very help we needed, and of course Anne must go. And yet, so careful was she for me that she would scarcely consent to the journey. She feared to leave the house would be with mother and her both gone; and then I knew so little about housekeeping. I verily believe she would have died on the journey, and been content to settle down to her darkened life, for the sake of saving me the trouble and pain of a separation, had it not been for Ralph Haven her lover. As it was, she spent a week in arranging for my comfort, mapping out Martha's work with the utmost precision, and writing page after page on a slip of paper the things I must try to do and care for while she was gone.

I knew I should miss our Anne, but I had not anticipated such utter loneliness. When I went back into the house after watching the stage until it was out of sight, I wandered from room to room unable to set myself at work. Every article of furniture was in order, and my sewing and work had been in set buck a chair and pick a thread from the table-cloth. I think it was a great misery to me to know all nothing to do but to sit down and cry.

Anne wrote immediately on her arrival at New York, but later than I believe she had her. She had got herself under the care of an eminent oculist, who gave her strong hopes of a permanent cure, only the strictest care was to be observed for several weeks.

It was hard to think of Anne lying in a darkened room, when the days were long and full and full of bloom; but she sent me such cheerful messages that at last I began to think she was less afflicted than I. I might have known her better —I who had witnessed her beautiful life of unselfishness and love.

One day—I think it was the 2d of June—I gathered from Anne's garden and mine a bunch of roses, the first of the season, and carried them to fill a flower vase on mother's grave. It was almost sunset, and I lingered a long time thinking of the dear one whose body lay there, and pleasing myself with the idea that her spirit might be with me, though unseen, and also thinking of Anne, and wishing she were again at home.

This state of mind, induced by the unusual sound of approaching footsteps, too heavy and measured for Martha's, caused me to look up through my tears, a man of medium height, stout figure and swarthy complexion, whose deep-set gray eyes were shaded upon his white marble brow which marked my mother's grave. It was too nearly dusk for him to read the simple inscription, and, turning to me, he asked, in a sharp, abrupt voice,

"Who lies buried there?"

"My mother, Mrs. Wesley," I replied, brushing away my tears, and rising from the green turf.

"And where is Anne? Are you the little Rose grown so tall as this? You were a mere baby then; but it is nearly twelve years—twelve long years!"

So this was Ralph Haven! Anne had come home at last. We walked slowly toward the house, and he did not repeat his inquiry for her, but all the way I could feel that my head to plan the gentlest manner in which to communicate the intelligence of her misfortune; for I knew he expected to meet her at the gate. When we came upon the terrace, under the parlor-window, I stopped short, and, looking up into his face, said, bravely:

"Sister Anne is not at home; she is in New York."

"And yet she knew I was coming!"

The tone in which these words were uttered was a reflection upon sister Anne's faithfulness I cried,

"Yes, Sir, she knew, but Anne is almost blind. She is there for advice; I hope for cure."

"Anne blind! Anne Wesley blind! Child, are you telling me the truth?"

He was greatly moved, else I should have resented his ungentle words and manner. As it was, I sat down near him, upon the piazza, and talked of her and mother until quite late, without lighting the lamps or going into the parlor.

"Of course he will go to New York at once," I said to myself, after he left me, as I locked the hall-door and closed the windows for the night—"of course; and how happy Anne will be!"

But I was mistaken. The next morning, while I was busy tying up a drooping heliotrope, Mr. Haven came again, and stood leaning over the gate talking about the flowers until I was ready to go in; then he pushed it open, and followed me up the path gathering a few buds from Anne's rose-bush, which naturally led the conversation to her. I was only too glad to speak her praises to some one besides myself, and to Mr. Haven I had a most eager listener. I remember, as I watched his kindling face, I wished I had some such friend, one who would be as true and faithful. Soon after this I had a few lines from Anne written by her own hand. "I am better," she wrote; "please God, I shall see. Trust and be well, and with you again, little sister. Do all you can to make Ralph happy: I give him into your care. The Doctor refused to let me write more at present. How I long to see you both."

Then I finished giving over this note I heard Mr. Haven's step on the graveled walk, and ran to meet him, with it open in my hand. It was such a relief to know that I was going to carry from Anne, voluntarily, that I was quite ready to obey her injunction.

He, too, had received a line, and I had never seen him wear so bright a look as when I ran down the steps and slipped my hand through his arm, half to give him my two bits of letters which had come like songs of hope.

We sat in the parlor all that evening singing together, and talking many times that Anne was there with her sweet contralto voice to make our concert complete. When Mr. Haven said good night, I knew that he and I were going to obey her commands, and do my very best to amuse him until she should come; in pledge of which he begged me to call him by her loved name Ralph. I gave it to him, and stood in the door watching him as he went away, with my long, unloosed curls falling about my face.

Days passed so swiftly they seemed like the days of a delicious dream. It never paused to question any thing, which blended with the new and strange emotions. It was enough that I was happy; yes, so happy I had not a single tear even for our dear mother. But at last I felt that there came a letter from Anne announcing her speedy return. Mr. Haven brought it from the office, and I, half forgetful, standing by the west window in the parlor.

"She is a good girl," he mused, after a prolonged silence, stroking and smoothing my hair with his white fingers. "She is so grateful; and so she is coming—when?" He glanced at the date, which was a week old; the letter had been delayed, and ever now she might be on her way. I felt his dark magnetic eyes searching my drooping face, and I trembled under their power. Are you glad, Rose?" he whispered, bending to my ear.

"Glad! glad! I am very glad," I stammered, and burst into tears.

"Rose, you love me," said he, slowly. "I can read your heart-throbs like a page of sweet poetry. You love me, Rose!"

My pride took fire at this.

"And if I do?" I cried. "If I did, without thinking or knowing it, I have not forgotten that you are Anne's promised husband!"

"It is true," he said, slowly, gloomily, "that before I went to China I had a youthful liking for Anne, but—" and here his tone changed to one of deep tenderness—"little Rose, you are the only one I ever loved; the only woman I will marry."

"And so," said I, scornfully, for I was beginning to realize the wrong I was doing which I was thinking; "and so, because in your long absence Anne has grown older, and you fear she is less fair and gay, you are going to cast her off? Ah, Sir, I shall soon learn to despise you!"

"Rose, your anger would bring me to myself" I said he, more gently. "Forgive me, child, and tell me how I shall expiate my offense."

"Marry Anne, and never let her know of this."

"Marry Anne! Rose, I will, I will. But pity me, Rose. You did love me, little sister?"

Talk love to me! Remembering how small my poor heart withstand it? For the moment I forgot Anne, honor, and duty, and flung my arms around his neck, crying:

"Rose," he whispered, "dear child, let us tell her all. She is generous; she will forgive; she—"

"Never!" I interrupted. I wrenched myself from him as I spoke, and turned to fly, when he in the centre of the room, rigid and white as a marble statue, like Lucifer, cursed me.

I threw myself into her arms, and she held me there in a brief but kind embrace; then leading me out into the hall, she bade me cry lips to be mine, and went back to the parlor, closing the door softly after her.

What passed between her and Ralph in that long interview I never knew; but he left the village at night, and I saw him no more for years.

Anne passed through this hour of affliction like the holy children, "upon whose bodies the fire had no power." Whatever she suffered was known to God and herself alone. Outwardly, there was not the shadow of change.

Twenty years after all this trouble, as I sat musing over the fire one winter evening, a note was handed me, which read as follows:

"DEAR ROSE.—Come to me.

"SARAH HAVEN."

The lad who brought it was waiting to guide me. I snatched a cloak and hood, and without a question followed him down the street to the village inn; and here I found Ralph Haven—dying—dying! He knew me, notwithstanding my gray hair (for at eight-and-thirty I was as gray as I am to-day), and he held out his hands to welcome me. I took them both, cold and shrunken as they were, and kissed them.

"Sit down, Rose," he said. "You will stay by me until I die?"

I took the chair proffered by the good landlady, and sat all that night with his dear hands clasped in mine, praying that God would spare him to me yet a little while. But this was not to be. At early dawn he died in my arms, with our dear Lord's name on his quivering lips.

It has been the comfort of my life that I was permitted to be with him when he went down into the valley of the shadow; that my ear caught his last whisper; that no one but I closed his eyes, and smoothed the thin gray locks over his forehead. That was the woman's story to her lover.

I am neither lonely nor miserable. The world looks as bright and fair on this calm October morning as it did twenty years ago; and I love the world which is brighter and fairer, whither my feet are hastening.

Anne and her children and grandchildren come to see me often (for Anne married a good minister, and has reared up a family of girls to imitate her sweet and unselfish virtues, and to shower adore their mother). They also love Aunt Rose.

Here, in the old brown house where I was born, where I have lived and loved and suffered, will I die. You will see that I am decently buried, very near my mother and Ralph; and you will not forget to plant a few flowers over me. I have loved them so well I shall like to think they will bloom near me, even when I can no longer see their gentle beauty. And should your tender hearts regret a mere enduring monument, let it be a broken shaft (for my life has been incomplete), bearing only my name.

ROSE WESLEY.

SPEECH WITHOUT WORDS.

I'LL tell you a story of how I once saved my life, entirely through having learned the deaf and dumb alphabet.

"There were two little boys who used to come and stay with Frank and me, when we were first married, and they could neither hear nor speak.

"They were deaf and dumb; they could not talk except with their fingers—so—only ever so much quicker.

"Frank and I learned this foreign alphabet on purpose, that we might understand what these two little fellows had to say. They were very clever; they could read and write, ay, and draw and sew, and do many other things which most boys would make but a very bad hand at.

"They could play at draughts, and backgammon, and chess, and at fox and geese, as well as any boys. They could almost run as well as we did, though they could not hear, with such quick eager eyes did they watch every movement of our lips. They were very quick, too, to talk as easily with our fingers as our tongues; and sometimes, when the lads were not with us, Frank and I used to converse with our fingers when we were in play, for practice.

"It happened upon one occasion that he had to go to London on important business; he was to have gone by an afternoon train, but something delayed him, so that he was not able to leave before the night-express. I was not in very good health, and retired to my bedroom about two hours after dinner, intending to be promptly down to come up and wish me good-by before he started, which would be between twelve and one o'clock in the morning. My bedroom was a fine one, and was connected with the bank here, which had just been burned down; and my husband, it seems, thought I did not know it. He was a clever and a secret had he endeavored to keep it—had many thousand pounds belonging to the concern in his possession, and locked up in his safe in the wall in our bedroom, where the plate was kept. He was bank-manager, and responsible for the whole of it. Now, my bedroom, as I said, was a fine in the room, so bright and comfortable that I was in no hurry to leave it and get into bed, but sat up, looking over the fire, and thinking about all sorts of things; upon the long journey Frank had to take that night, and of how dreary the day would seem until he returned. I was not in particular spirits; I should feel in that great room all by myself, when he would be gone, for I was a timid woman then. It was a little after eleven o'clock when I got into bed, but I did not feel the least inclined for sleep when I had left Frank working away with me good-by presently; and besides, there seemed to be all sorts of noises about the room, which my fields are always used to hear whenever I was alone at night-time.

"If a little soot fell down the chimney, it was, I thought, a burglar; a click-cock over head would soon be flying about the room, and settling on my pillow; if a mouse squeaked in the wainscot, it was the creaking of some cabinet by myself; then, coming up stairs to kill me with a carving-knife; and if the wind blew at the casement, it was something else. I got on a little better, though I think it was two stories high. You may imagine, then, my horror when I heard a tremendous noise in the bank just over my head, and then just behind the headboard of the bed, and between that and the wall, where there was a considerable space. I heard distinctly the latter precaution, before I put the candle out, of looking every where in the room where it was quite impossible any person could be hid; in the little alcove into which the bed was pushed I had never so much as thought of looking, although that was a capital hiding-place if any one had."

Ever since I had slept in that room, in short, I had been like the ostrich, who puts his head in the sand, and then imagines himself in perfect security. I had piqued myself upon precautionary measures that, after all, might just as well have been omitted. The only thing, as I believe, which saved my reason from departing altogether, when I first heard that terrible sound, was that my mind clung to the hope that it might be, after all, only the sneeze of a cat. Fifty cats together could not have made half such a disturbance. But in true, it was the sneeze of a man who endeavored in spite of himself, and almost shook the house; but the idea sustained me over the first shock. The next instant the wretch had sneezed again, and pushing aside the bed, which rolled on casters, I felt was standing beside my pillow looking at me. If he had only given one sneeze, he might perhaps have believed me, as I lay quite still, breathing as regularly as I could, and pretending to be asleep; but he reasoned, very justly, that, unless I was dead or dead, I must have been awakened by the noise.

"You're awake, marm,' said he, in a gruff voice, 'and I'm so use ahanuing! If you don't want a leg with this life-preserver, just look alive.'

"I opened my eyes exceedingly wide at this, and beheld a gentleman of character his face, standing by the bed; he held a sort of club with two knobs upon it in his right hand, and with his left he pointed to the iron safe. "Is the money there?' said he.

"The plate is,' said I, in a trembling voice; 'pray, take it. Sir; I am sure you are very welcome;' for he might have had every thing of value out of the house with all my heart, so long as he left me my life.

"'The money—the gold—the notes—are they there?' cried he again, in a terrible sort of whisper.

"'It's all there,' replied I, although I knew nothing about it; 'all except fifteen-and-sixpence in my purse, on the dressing-table yonder. There is a silver tankard also besides in the pantry, and a couple of candlesticks in the study, only they are plated, for I would not deceive you, Sir, upon any account.'

"'You had better not,' observed the burglar, grimly, 'or I will pull the cover for you.' He produced a key like that my husband used, and approached the iron safe; but as he did so, his guilty eye caught a footstep upon the staircase. 'Who's that?' cried he.

"'My husband, Sir,' returned I; 'but, pray, don't hurt him.'

"'Is he not gone to town, then?' cried the ruffian, with an oath of disappointment.

"'He is going at twelve o'clock,' replied I; 'it is indeed.'

"If you tell him,' said the burglar, hoarsely, 'if you mention one word of my presence here, it will be the death-doom of you both;' he had slipped into the alcove, and drawn back the bed again to its place in an instant. My husband entered immediately afterward, and even while he was in the room I heard the awful threat repeated once again through the thick curtain behind me. 'If you do but whisper it, woman, I will kill you where you lie. Will you swear not to tell him?'

"'I will,' said I, trembling; 'I promise not to open my lips about the matter.'

"Frank leaned over the pillow to kiss me, and observed how terrified I looked.

"'You have been frightening yourself about robbers again, I suppose, you silly child.'

"'No, I, Frank,' returned I, as cheerfully as I could; 'I have only a little headache;' but I said with my fingers, as he could plainly read it in the fire-light: 'For God's sake, hush! but there's a man behind the bed-head!'

"Frank saw, I did at a lion, and had nerves like iron, although he was so tender-hearted and kind. He only answered, 'Where is your sal-volatile, dearest?' and went to the mantle-piece to get it. I thought he never could have understood me, he spoke with such coolness and unconcern, until I saw his fingers reply as he took up the bottle, 'All right; don't be afraid!' And then I was not afraid, or at least not much; for I knew that I should not be left one minute in the room alone; and I felt that my Frank was a match for any two men in such a cause. Only he had no weapon. 'He has a life-preserver,' said I with my fingers.

"'Your fire is getting rather low, Georgey,' observed he, as he took up the poker. (Ah, he had a weapon then!) 'I must have you a good blaze to comfort you before I go.' He poked the fire, and left the poker in, but without ever taking his eye off me or the bed-head. 'I will just ring the bell, and see whether Thomas has got the portmanteau ready.' Georgey,' continued he to the maid that answered the bell,' send Thomas up.' Then when she had gone upon that errand, 'By Jove! I never gave him the key. Where is it, Georgey? I have not a minute to lose. If it is in your dressing-case with the rest there, I shall be an age in looking for it. I ask you to get out of bed for an instant, and show me which it is?' He said with his fingers, 'Jump!' and I jumped, you may be sure, quickly enough, and was inside the dressing-room, and with the door locked, in half a second.

"'Come in, Thomas,' said Frank; 'come in.' For Thomas was modestly hesitating at the chamber-door. 'There's some blackguard got into the house and behind my bed there. If he makes the least resistance I'll kill him with this hot poker.'

"At these words the bed was pushed slowly outward, and the burglar, without his crape mask, and with a face as pale as ashes, emerged from his hiding-place. I knew him at once as having been a bank-messenger, who had been turned out of his situation since the fire upon suspicion of dishonesty.

"'Oh, Sir, have pity upon me!' cried he; 'I'm an unhappy man. If I had had money for a sea-voyage should have had ten thousand pounds in my pocket by this time!'

"'Oh, come after that, did you?' said my husband, coolly. 'Well, please to give up that life-preserver which you have in your pocket before we have any more conversation.'

"'And did your lady tell you that, too?' cried the villain, in accents of astonishment, as he delivered up the weapon to the man-servant; 'and yet I stood by her yonder, and never heard her utter a syllable.'

"'I never spoke a word,' cried I, through the dressing-room key-hole, for I did not wish the man to think that I had spoken my oath, nor, to say truth, was I anxious to make a deadly enemy of him, in case he should be ever at large again.

"'Then it's a judgment on me,' exclaimed the miserable wretch; 'and it's no good for me to fight against it.'

"'It's not the least good,' replied Frank, decisively; 'and we will go to the police-office at once.'

"So off the burglar went in their custody, leaving me safe and sound after all. And now, don't you think there may be some use in learning every thing, even so small a thing as the deaf and dumb alphabet?"

BESSIE MUNRO.

THE scene is Hobarton, Australia. It had been a sultry day, and now was a damp, cheerless night; for, though the rain had abated, the clouds still looked sulky, and the sky gave no promise of more stars to be seen now than through the bush. So, to be independent of both, I took a lantern and set out. My way lay through the uncomfortable bit of unlicensed land, to the left of Newtown. Every now and then I had to draw up before a charred trunk or a tree, and each time, being accustomed to the interruption, the same suspicion presented itself—namely, that a Ranger was advancing to meet me. Nor did my lantern assist me to a full belief in the figure, for in bringing its light to bear upon the trunk the long black arms only seemed to stretch more determinately to me, and the shadow of myself to be considered of the ghost-tribe; here, where fears are too much preoccupied to think of supernatural appearances, a charred stump is not only a charred stump, but very often something more, especially if it is large and hollow. One to which I was coming was the most awkward of the lot—a thorough specimen of diablerie—on the top of a hideous-looking trunk was perched a large round knot, bearing a resemblance to a human head. All this I knew, and was prepared for; but, in spite of being prepared, my heart and I could still together cheer it. The black head wore a feather—a bright red feather—which blew furiously about in the night air. As I approached, it dropped from the hollow and drew it in. Then came a voice from within.

"'You can pass on.'

I hesitated, when the permission was repeated.

"'What are you?' I demanded, recovering my self-possession.

"'Never mind, pass on; I'm harmless as yourself.'

I glanced at the muzzle of a gun which peered through an aperture in the trunk, and doubted its accordance with peaceable intentions.

"'Who are you?' I again demanded.

An answer in person was given; a man jumped out from the hollow and stood beside me.

"'Don't be afraid!' I said, trembling; "don't put it in my power to witness against you."

"'Look at me, I am no absconder,' he replied. I looked and saw a tall, gentlemanly man. He clothed his opossum fur cap, and towed respectfully when his eyes met mine. I could not help laughing, so ridiculous did the whole appear. He resumed hurt; for, bending on his gun, he said—

"'Ah, it's no laughing matter that brings me here! Bessie is very ill indeed to-night—poor, fond, young creature, to leave her father's house, all for a cross word, which he has the right of nature to speak to her!'

He reminded me of King Lear; his long white hair blew about with the wind, and his head and hand done from the top of the trunk, and for some moments he was too absorbed in grief to speak, and leave me free to pass. I was extremely curious, as though all the world should know his Bessie. I gathered that she had left him a few days ago, and that his suspicions led him to watch for her from this spot.

"That bit of a kerchief,' said he, 'I stuck out from the hole, for Bessie would know it was mine, and meant for peace, and there was a word tied up in it begging her to come back.'

He drew the kerchief from the trunk, and in it I acknowledged the former feather. Then, wrapping it around his throat, as if preparing to settle in the night air, he said, 'I ask you to get out of it,' objected to do, and told him he was tempting Providence by exposing himself to the damp of the bush.

"Rheumatics take the damp!' he said. Then, fixing a searching eye on me, he added, 'Are you a married man, or a child?'

Then I have, and by worse than death. Leave me, and the only favor I beg is, don't notice me when you meet me in town.'

"But how about poor Bessie? I must hear if you find her."

"'I will,'" he nodded, and coiled himself back into his tree ere I could offer further opposition.

A few days after I met him in Pitt Street, but forbore to remark him. With my face set steadily in front, I was about to pass by, when he made a full stop before me, took off his fur cap, and waited bareheaded till I should speak.

"'Is she found?'

He seemed delighted that I pounced on the subject without preface. It convinced him that Bessie was the all in all engrossing occupation of other human beings.

"'She's heard of, and I know her whereabout. I'd rather have seen her dragged dead out of the river!' he added, with a shudder, which for the time one gone astray. A dead child can't come back if she'd fain, therefore a living one that won't is worse!'

A sentiment to which I could not say nay, for the testimony of ages is in its favor.

"'Ah! I'm not so much a stranger in the colony,' he went on to lament, "as not to know where these things end: and of none the government knows get worse only! Jess, she'll be none the better for it, and there's these as will gladly make her worse, out of spite that she's free to what they are. I tell you, Sir, there ain't been no blot on our family for six generations back, and at home, for all that I'm poor to the back-bone, my word's as good as a bond. If my hands are seared, it's with work, and not with dirty actions! And my children was all counted fortunes in themselves; now I'm come out here with the last just to break my heart over her!'

His breast heaved, and what more he would say was lost in inarticulate sobs. To turn him to a more cheerful view of the case, I said:

"'Well, but we must look to the brighter side, it may not be so bad after all.'

"'Not so bad! Let the worst come to the worst, or the best to the best, ain't she forgotten her Catechism and her Bible? When I was young, I was taught to honor my father and mother. But, I tell you what it is, Sir"—he lowered his voice and spoke confidentially—"since what my, I don't blame the girl too much, for the sin lies at our door. We'd no business, my missus and me, to have England and Australia all ages—twas quite from beginning to end. First, I could not trust the God that made me to provide for me when I got out here; then I married my Bessie a Jady. They told me that, out here, her bonny face would get her a rich husband, and now it's more like—" He broke short, and then said, "Perhaps you'll step in and see missus, she's in a world of trouble, and it tells hard upon her, poor soul!"

We had all this time been walking, and when we had gone a little farther we came to one of those hut-looking buildings still to be seen here and there in Hobarton. It was one in which we looked, and Munro had the key in his pocket. Seeing my surprise, he remarked:

"I've a key to every where. The neighbors come twitting of her with their pity, so says missus to me, 'Look to me in, John, and then I can't open to none of 'em.'"

We entered a wretched little room, exhibiting every sign of poverty and dejection. It looked like a bereaved house, for there was neither sign of a recent fire nor of a mid-day meal, though it was afternoon. In the corner we apprehended at a glance, while my attention riveted itself on an old woman who sat with her head buried in her arms, which rested on an open Bible lying before her on a small table.

"'Missus,' said her husband. But she answered not; she was in deep sleep, sleeping the heavy sleep of sorrow. "'Poor soul,' whispered Munro, "I left her fretting over that text—'The way of transgressors is hard.' Oh, John!' says she to me, 'will Bessie's case ever come to that?' "'God knows!' says I, and then she laid down her head, and very likely she's had a worse since."

He motioned me to sit on a bench, and then, at my invitation, he also sat down, when the silence that ensued gave me an opportunity to make many observations, each of which strengthened my opinion of the poverty of the Munro family.

"Don't let me keep you from your dinner," I said, in order to discover whether he had any in prospect.

He appeared uneasy for an instant; then, with rather a grim smile, he replied, "Sorrow an't an appetitesale sauce."

I strongly suspected that other causes than sorrow kept him from eating, and longed to offer him some money to procure a meal; but there was a certain dignity in the honest old Englishman that held back my purse, and made me feel that a case of distress can not always be relieved by money. He seemed to read my thoughts, for said he:

"I don't deny it's hard times; and if you were pleased to lend me a loan 'twould be more than a kindness, for I'm sadly gone back along; since Bessie went missus and I have been spent in seeking for her, instead of in bringing down pigeons."

He resolutely refused the title I proffered, but finally agreed to accept it as a loan, to be paid in weekly instalments of game.

"Well, I'm glad your shooting service will help you to wear your clothes out, exercise will help you to forget your trouble," I unfortunately said, in taking leave of him.

He gave me a look that might have been quizzical but for the tone that accompanied it:

"Then that's got gray hair in their head can't help the old man's trouble in that way."

The following week I found a pair of bronzewing pigeons and three common parrots lying on the hall table. "Munro marked" said I to myself. Beside them lay a little three-cornered note, which ran thus:

HONORED SIR.—Bessie is laying at the Elk Bear in Goldern Street. She won't see me, but verry like she will speak with a stranger, when you cold tell her that all the old man's trouble is that cold to ever her poor old father and mother she will come hoame again to them. Missus and me is hoping for nothing of him that's now God in heaven. So no more from Mr. and Mrs. Munro, "Your loving humble servants, JOHN MUNRO.

Interpreting this into a request that I would go to Bessie, I set out for the Black Bear, and asked if one Bessie Munro lodged there. After some solicitation I was informed that she did, but was too ill to see any one. I perceived this to be a falsehood, and was turning in my mind how to accomplish an interview with a portly, forbidding-looking woman came from behind a large folding screen that divided the tap-room from their private apartment. Perceiving the answer I had already received, she inquired my business; and, on being told, she deliberately stated that Bessie had only that moment "run out on an errand." A foolish smile passed from face to face, and taking advantage of the confusion, I said, in a voice of authority, "Will any person have the goodness to call Bessie Munro? I shall begin to think she is detained against her will, unless I hear to the contrary from her own lips."

"And that you shan't!" cried the portly woman, as she bustled off in search of her lost lamb, and she shan't be defied in my own house. I took pity on her when they that bore her drove her to doors—"

"Hush! no more of such falsehoods. You know Bessie's history as well as I do," I said: on which the woman dashed like a tempest behind the screen, and, led by an irresistible impulse, I followed her into the private room. There, standing on tip-toe, and listening with every eager feature, was one of the most beautiful young women I have ever seen. Possession was in my favor; so having obtained a footing I kept it, in spite of the landlady's abuse. I advanced to the young woman, and said:

"You must tell me you are Bessie Munro; your likeness to your father has already told me that. I am come to beg you to return to your home; both your parents are willing to forgive you: it is in your power to make them very happy again."

"Oh, Sir! I could never face them again; another might forgive me, but father says he'll break his gun across my shoulders if ever I darken his path again."

"It's a lie!" I had cried before I could refrain; and then, to vindicate the assertion, I read Bessie her father's note. She wept bitterly.

"Oh, Sir, the madness of the first wrong step!" she choked out between her tears.

"It is a madness more curable than the second step: take it in hand at once, Bessie; I am willing to help you."

"Thank you, Sir; but, I assure you, till this moment I've refused to see my father because I heard he only wanted to see me to disgrace me, and of course I've too much pride for that."

"There!" injected the living tempest blowing at us from the corner. "There!" "Hot tone seemed to mean, "Are you satisfied now you've heard for yourself?" But unheeding its fury, I went on to implore the unhappy girl to go home to me.

She then said: "At any rate, Sir, it's quite true that he hid out in the bush to shoot me if I went home."

"Yes, that's as true as Gospel. My maister saw him lying out by Newtown, and, says he, 'Why, Munro, what's doing here this time o' day? there's no game flying now.' 'Old Nick take the game,' says he, 'I lo out after that girl.'"

I recounted the story of my first interview with Munro, and Bessie again melted to tears. She seemed truly miserable, between a sense of duty and affection on the one side, and resentment and fear on the other. At last she exclaimed: "Do beg her to let me go!"

"Beg her! She can't detain you: what claim has she on you?"

"Ay, tell him what! But I don't want you: go and see how clever it is to get back a lost character!"

"Who dares to say I've lost my character?" cried Bessie, indignantly.

"We shall see! One doesn't go into government to learn nothin', I suppose?" sneered the landlady.

"Come, come, I'm not here to listen to quarrels. Bessie, bethink yourself; will you go with me?"

"It requires resolution," she said, shrinkingly.

"And for the want of that will you be guilty of a crime?"

Give me time, Sir—give me time; my head nearly reels with it all with that tantalizing reason I was obliged to depart. Poor foolish young creature! she perceived not the toils thickening about her: and the awful break of temper was likely to incur a fearful penalty.

I called several times at the Black Bear, that without success: she was never to be seen. At last I had almost given up all hope of a second interview, when one day, in returning through my former route, I thought should I espy the same sitting on the very trunk where I had first met her father.

"You, Bessie! It looks bad to see you out this time of night."

"I am waiting for you, Sir: I've never been able to find out your name, nor where you live, and as I was to keep up along, I knew to run after you, but as I couldn't overtake you, I rested here till you came back."

"And what do you want of me, Bessie?" I spoke curtly and somewhat austerely, in order to set a due value on my services and due censure on her obstinacy.

"I want you to tell them, Sir, not to be uneasy after me: for there's no manner of call for it, I'm sure to get a place when I left the last."

"Bessie, you are both willful and rebellious; do you call that respectable? If you are saved from destruction it will be in spite of yourself. What does a young woman expect if she stays out to such an hour? Here, it is eight o'clock, I am not far England, but not for out here." I shoved her my watch by the lamp-light, she glanced at it, and then burst into tears.

"Sir, I will tell you all, and you'll see I'm not so bad. I don't wish to go back to father and mother till I can bring them a present for the trouble I've been to them, and that I hope to do soon, for I'm engaged to Joe Sadlers, a successful digger; I've kept honest company with him all the time, and my mother a bit; he's gone up the country now this very evening to see about settling near Longford, and when he comes back you'll be glad enough, and I shall go straight to father."

I knew enough of diggers to make me tremble for her; but to shake her faith in her betrothed was impossible. Joe Sadlers was not a digger of the common sort—drives whisky-cart here, there, and every. We walked and talked till we reached the main road; there Bessie discovered that she had left her bundle behind at the tree. She said it was not worth returning for, but she confessed that she had also left her lover's last letter there—and that she could not think of losing.

I could neither dissuade her from returning nor accompany her back, as urgent business lade me go forward; but she seemed to have no fear of being left, and cheerily wished me good-night.

Two days afterward, I was passing the court of justice, with a little spare time at command, and being somewhat of a hanger-on at these places, I entered to hear what might be on. I had no sooner set foot in the court, than a female voice screeched out:

"There he is! there he is! He'll tell where I was at eight o'clock on Tuesday evening;" then stretching her arms toward me, she cried, "Save me! save me, Sir!"

When the commotion consequent on this outcry had ceased, it was explained to me that Bessie was apprehended on suspicion of having stolen the cash-box of the Black Bear till, which was safe at eight o'clock, and missing ten minutes after. The suspicion was the greater from the fact of the empty box having been secreted in the trunk of a tree from the direction of which she had been traced. Being duly sworn, I gave evidence, and the result was an alibi too clearly proved for disputation. I led her from the court; and when we got free of the crowd I asked where she meant to go. She turned a lengthy, tearful look on me, as much as to say, can you ask; so I shook her hand, and departed; for there are scenes where a stranger should not intermeddle, and such a one I knew would take place in the hut. But in an hour my curiosity overcame my judgment, and I found myself tapping for admittance at Munro's. He opened the door, stared at me, and then turned his head, while I entered; but we neither of us spoke. Bessie knelt by her mother, bathing her withered hand in contrite tears, and Munro commenced a desperate whetting of knives and forks, while his wife looked up with a face of grateful gladness. I could form no words barring as tender a scene, as took up the Bible and read the parable of the prodigal son. They bore it with firmness until I reached the verse: "Bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat, and be merry: for this my son was dead and is alive," etc.; when the father burst out,

"Us hadn't got no fatted calf; but mother's boiled her last bit of pork, and with HER here to eat it, it's a feast fit for angels."

Bessie needed not another warning that her father's roof was her safest shelter, nor did she again leave it until a fine young husband took her home to a snug little farm in the interior. But this husband was not Joe Sadlers; of him my suspicion proved correct; he was a villain, and at the time of Bessie's marriage he was fulfilling a sentence on the roads for the robbery at the Black Bear.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW.

'Tis the dead of the night, and the city
Lies silent and dark as the tomb;
While the murmuring waters of Seine
Rush on through the mist and the gloom.

All is still, not a sound to be heard,
Not a light overhead or below;
The town seems deserted by all
Save the sentries who pace to and fro.

Save that of their long-measured tread
No sound do the echoes repeat,
And they grasp their sword-hilts and converse
In the midst of the desolate street.

"Good-even, my comrade! Hast heard
The tocsin? news that is come?
Of the feast that our king hath prepared,
Of the dance to the beat of the drum

"To which we are soon to lead forth
The Calvinist daughters of France?
They will not refuse us?" he laughed,
As he eyed the sharp point of his lance.

"Sleep, husbands! sleep on while ye may,
Secure by the side of your wives;
Such a waking ere long you will see
As but once in a lifetime arrives.

"Oh mothers of heretic babes!
Go fold them once more in your arms;
And, lovers, caress while ye may
The beauties that yield you their charms.

"For e'en now," as he spoke, a wild sound
Smote dread on the ear of the night,
'Twas no like the last trumpet of doom,
That the sepulchres gaped with affright,

And the souls of the damned found their way
For a season to earth, and became
The leaders of sport for the night,
And cheer'd on the hounds to the game.

The call of Religion is heard,
And the soldiers of Jesus arise,
And rush to the slaughter with hate
In their hearts, and with lust in their eyes.

Who babbles of mercy? Behold,
This night 'tis forbidden to spare;
For the hour is come, long appointed,
The sword of Jehovah is bare.

The angels shall weep as they see
How our Catholic chivalry greet
The women that kneel in their anguish,
And helpless for mercy entreat.

And the scent of the blood and the burning
Like incense shall climb to the stars
That ride in the vault of the heaven,
Remote from this earth and its wars.

For to-night is the Lord's, and his vengeance
Shall redden the waters of Seine;
Let the reapers go forth to the harvest,
And gather this fragrancut grain.

CHAPTER XCVI.

GETTING READY.

HOPE WAYNE read of Abel Newt's success. In the constant employment of her life she had long ago ceased to think of him, except with profound pity. Sometimes, indeed, he seemed to her like a stately ship "built in the eclipse and rigged with curses dark," which she dimly saw driving through lurid light upon sudden reefs. But her life was so busy with the thousand nameless duties of her position as a rich, unmarried woman, that she was too deeply engaged with what she had to do to speculate about what she might have done.

The threat which Abel had vaguely thrown out she had not forgotten; but she supposed it was only an expression of disappointment and indignation. Could she have seen him a few evenings after the ball and his conversation with Mrs. Delilah Jones, she might have thought differently.

He sat with the same woman in the same room.

"To-morrow, then?" she said, looking at him, hesitatingly.

"To-morrow," he answered, grimly.

"I hope all will go well."

"All what?" he said, roughly.

"All our plans."

"Abel Newt was not born to fail," he replied; "or at least General Belch said so."

His companion had no knowledge of what Abel really meant to do. She only knew that he was capable of every thing, and she feared every thing but the very worst.

They sat together silently for a long time. He poured freely and drank deeply, and whiffed cigar after cigar nervously away. The few bells of the city tolled the hours. Ele had come during the evening and knocked at the door, but Abel did not let him in. He and his companion sat silently, and heard the few bells strike.

"Well, Kitty," he said at last, thickly, and with glazing eye. "Well, my Princess of the Mediterranean. We shall be happy, hey? You're not afraid even now, hey?"

"Oh, we shall be very happy," she replied, in a low, still tone, as if it were the night wind that moaned, and not a woman's voice.

He looked at her for a few moments. He saw how entirely she was enthralled by him.

"I wonder if I care any thing about you?" he said, at length, leering at her through the cigar-smoke.

"I don't think you do," she answered, meekly.

"By—my——dear Mrs. Jones—the su-sperb Mrs. Delilah Jo-Jones, ought to be sure that I do. Here, bring me a light: that dam—dam—cigar's gone out."

She rose quietly and carried the candle to Abel. There was an inexpressible weariness and pathos in all her movements: a kind of womanly tranquility that was touchingly at variance with the impression of her half-coarse appearance. As Abel watched her he remembered the women whom he had tried to marry. His memory scoured through his whole career. He thought of them all curiously happy.

"I swear! to think I should come to you!" he said at length, looking at his companion, with an indescribable bitterness of sneering.

Kitty Dunham sat at a little distance from him on the end of a sofa. She was bowed as if deeply thinking; and when she heard these words her head sank a little more, as if a palpable weight had been laid upon her. She understood perfectly what he meant.

"Perhaps I can help you in some way," she said, in the same low voice. "If you are ill, some day, I can nurse you. I shall be poor company on the long journey, but I will try."

"What long journey?" asked Abel, suddenly and angrily.

"Where we are going," she replied, gently.

"D— it, then, don't use such am-am-big-'us phrases. A man would think we were going to die."

She said no more, but sat, half-crouching, upon the sofa, looking into the fire. Abel glanced at her, from time to time, with maudlin grins and sneers.

"Go to bed," he said, at length; "I've something to do. Sleep all you can; you'll need it. I shall stay 'till I'm ready to go: and come for you in the morning."

"Thank you," she answered, and rose quietly. "Good-night!" she said.

"Oh! good-night, Mrs. De-de-lilah — superb Jo-Jones."

He laughed as she went—sat ogling the fire for a little while, and then unsteadily, but not unconsciously, drew a pocket-book from his pocket and took out a small package. It contained several notes, amounting to not less than a hundred thousand dollars signed by himself, and indorsed by Lawrence Newt & Co.—at least the name was there, and it was a shrewd eye that could detect the difference between the signature and that which was every day seen and honored in the street.

Abel looked at them carefully, and leered and glared upon them as if they had been windows through which he saw something—sunny lakes, and unbroken ease, and a handsome slave who loved him to minister to every whim.

"'Tis a pretty game," he said, half aloud; "a droll turn-about is life. Uncle Lawrence plays against other people, and wins. I play against Uncle Lawrence, and win. But what's un-dred—sousand—to—him?"

He said it drowsily, and his hands unconsciously fell. He was asleep in his chair.

He sat there sleeping until the gray of morning. Kitty Dunham, coming into the room ready dressed for a journey, found him there. She was frightened; for he looked as if he were dead. Going up to him she shook him, and he awoke heavily.

"What the h—'s the matter?" said he, as he opened his sleepy eyes.

"Why, it's time to go."

"To go where?"

"To be happy," she said, standing passively and looking in his face.

He rousted himself, and said:

"Well, I'm all ready. I've only to stop at my room for my trunk."

His hair was tangled, his eyes were bloodshot, his clothes tumbled and soiled.

"Couldn't you like to dress yourself?" she asked.

"Why, no; ain't I dressed enough for you? No gentleman dresses when he's going to travel."

She said no more. The carriage came as Abel had ordered, a private conveyance to take them quite through to New York. All the time before it came Kitty Dunham moved solemnly about the room, seeing that nothing was left. The solemnity fretted Abel.

"What are you so sober about?" he asked, impatiently.

"Because I am getting ready for a long journey," she answered, tranquilly.

"Perhaps not so long," he said, sharply—"not if I choose to leave you behind."

"But you won't."

"How do you know?"

"Because you will want somebody, and I'm the only person in the world left to you."

She spoke in the same sober way. Abel knew perfectly well that she spoke the truth, but he had never thought of it before. Was he then going so long a journey without a friend, unless she went with him? Was she the only one left of all the world?

As his mind pondered the question his eye fell upon a newspaper of the day before, in which he saw his name. He read it mechanically, and read a paragraph praising him and his speech; foretelling "honor and troops of friends" for a young man who began his public career so brilliantly.

"There; hear this!" said he, as he read it aloud, and looked at his companion. "Troops of friends,' do you see? and yet you talk of being my only dependence in the world! Fie! fie! Mrs. Delilah Jones."

It was melancholy merriment. He did not smile, and the woman's face was quietly sober.

"For the present, then, Mr. Speaker and fellow-citizens," said Abel Newt, waving his hand as he saw that every thing was ready, and that he carried with him only the society of his companion, "I bid these scenes adieu! For the present I terminate my brief engagement. And you, my fellow-servants, patterns of purity and pillars of truth, farewell! Disinterested patriots, I leave you my blessing. Pardon me that I prefer the climate of the Mediterranean to that of the District, and the smiles of my Kitty to the lutelligent praises of my country. Friends of my soul, farewell! I kiss my fingertips! Boo—hoo!"

He made a mock bow, and smiled upon an imaginary audience. Then offering his arm with grave ceremony to his companion as if a crowd had been looking on, he went down stairs.

"THIS NIGHT 'TIS FORBIDDEN TO SPARE."—[BY MILLAIS.]

CHAPTER XCVII.

IN THE CITY.

It was a long journey. They stopped at Baltimore, at Philadelphia, and pushed on toward New York. While they were still upon the way Hope Wayne saw what she had been long expecting to see—and saw it without a solitary regret. Amy Waring was Amy Waring to no longer; and Hope Wayne was the first who kissed Mrs. Lawrence Newt. Even Mrs. Simcoe looked benignantly upon the bride; and Aunt Martha wept over her as over her own child.

The very day of the wedding Abel Newt and his companion arrived at Jersey City. Leaving Kitty in a hotel, he crossed the river, and ascertained that the vessel on which he had taken two berths under a false name was full and ready, and would sail upon her day. He showed himself in Wall Street, carefully dressed, carefully sober—mindful, evidently, people said, of his new position; and they thought his coming home showed that he was on good terms with his family, and that he was really resolved to behave himself.

For a day or two he showed himself in the business streets and offices, and talked gravely of public measures. General Belch was confounded by the cool sobriety and superiority and ceremony of the Honorable Mr. Newt. When he made a joke, Abel laughed with such politeness that the General was frightened, and felt dismal, and tried no more. When he treated Abel familiarly, and told him what a jolly lift his speech had given to their common cause —the Great—the Honorable Mr. Newt replied, with a cold bow, that he was glad if he had done his duty and satisfied his constituents; bowing so coldly that the General was confounded. He spat into his fire, and said, "The Devil!"

When Abel had gone General Belch was profoundly conscious that King Log was better than King Stork, and thought regretfully of the Honorable Watkins Bodley.

After a day or two the Honorable Mr. Newt went to his Uncle Lawrence's office. Abel had not often been there. He had never felt himself to be very welcome there; and as he came into the inner room where Lawrence and Gabriel sat, they were quite as curious as he. Abel bowed politely, and said he could not help congratulating his uncle upon the news he had heard, but would not conceal his surprise. What his surprise was he did not explain; but Lawrence very well knew. Abel had the good sense not to mention the name of Hope Weyse, and not to dwell upon any subject that involved feeling. He said that he hoped he should be by-gones would be by-gones; that he had been a wild boy, but that a career now opened upon him of which he hoped to prove worthy.

"There was a time, Uncle Lawrence," he said, "when I despised your warning; now I thank you for it."

A man who has been but three days married to the woman he loves is then kindly, if he ever is. But Lawrence Newt was never otherwise. He held out his hand to Abel.

"Honesty is the best policy, at least, if nothing more," he said, smiling. "You have a chance; I hope with all my heart you will use it well."

There was little more to say, and of that little Gabriel Bennet said nothing. Abel spoke of public affairs; and after a short time he took leave.

"Can the leopard change his spots?" said Gabriel, looking at the senior partner.

"A bad man may become better," was all the answer; and the two merchants were busy again.

Returning to Wall Street, the Honorable Abel Newt met Mr. President Van Boozenberg. They shook hands, and the old gentleman said, warmly,

"I see yo goin' into your Uncle Lawrence's, a while ago, as I was comin' along South Street, Mr. Abel, Sir; I congratilate ee, Sir. I've read your speech, and I see to ma, see I, I'd no idee of it; none at all. Ma, see she, Law, pa! I nilers knowed Mr. Abel Newt would turn up trumps. You nilers did have the women, Mr. Newt; and so I told ma."

"I am very glad, Sir, that I have at last done something to deserve your approbation. I trust I shall not forfeit it. I have led rather a gay life, and careless; and my poor father and I have met with misfortunes. But they open a man's eyes, Sir; they are angels in disguise, as the poet says. I don't doubt they have been good for me. At least I'm resolved now to be steady and industrious; and I certainly should be a great fool if I were not."

"Sartin, Sir, with your chances and prospects, yes, and your talents, coz, I allers said so ma, coz I, he's got talent if he hain't nothin' else. I suppose your Uncle Lawrence won't be so shy of you now, hey? No, of course not. A man who has a smart nevy in Congress has a tap in a good barrel."

And Mr. Van Boozenberg laughed loudly at his own humor.

"Why, yes, Sir. I think I may say that the pleasantest part of my new life—if you will allow me to use the expression—is my return to the friends best worth having. I think I have learned, Sir, that steady-going business, with no nonsense about it, is the permanent thing. It isn't flopdoddle, Sir, but it's solid food."

"Tongue," tho't old Jacob Van Boozenberg, "but vastly improved. Has come to terms with Uncle Lawrence. Sensible fellow!"

"I think he takes it," said Abel to himself, with the feeling of an angler, as he watched the other.

Just before they parted Abel took out his pocket-book and said Mr. Van Boozenberg that he should like to negotiate a little piece of paper which was not altogether worthless, he believed.

Smiling as he spoke, he handed a note for twenty-five thousand dollars, with his uncle's indorsement, to the President. The old gentleman looked at it carefully, and asked Abel to walk with him to the bank. They chatted as they passed along, nodded to those they knew, while some bowed politely to the young member whom they saw in such good company.

"Well, well," said Mr. Zephyr Wetherley as he skimmed up Wall Street from the bank, where he had been paying dividends, "I didn't think to see the day when Abel Newt would be a solid, sensible man."

And Mr. Wetherley wondered, in a sighing way, what was the secret of Abel's success.

The honorable member came out of the bank with the money in his pocket. When the clock struck three he had the amount of all the notes in the form of several bills of foreign exchange.

He went hastily to the river side and crossed to Jersey City.

"They have sent to say that the ship sails at nine in the morning, and the mate must be on board early," said Kitty Dunham, as he entered the room.

"I am all ready," he replied, in a clear, cold, alert voice. "Now sit down."

His tone was not to be resisted. The woman seated herself quietly and looked at him.

"My affectionate Uncle Lawrence has given me a large sum of money, and recommends traveling for my health. I shall return to this on London and Paris. To-morrow morning we sail. We post to London—get the money; some day to Paris—get the money; straight on to Marseilles, and sail in a felucca for Sicily. There we can take breath."

He spoke rapidly, but calmly. She heard and understood every word.

"I wish we could sail to-night," she said.

"Plenty of time—plenty of time," answered Abel. "And why be so anxious for so long a journey?"

"It seems long to you, too?"

"Why, yes; it will be long. Yes, I am going on a long journey."

He smiled with the hard black eyes a hard black smile. Kitty did not smile; but she took his hand gently.

"Do you remember the old Grand Street days, Abel? It was different then, wasn't it? But I love you now."

She paused a moment, then continued:

"I am not happy, but I love you."

Abel shook his head, incredulously.

"My dear, superb Mrs. Delilah Jones, you overcome me with your sentimental speeches. I don't believe in love. That's what I believe in," said he, as he opened his pocket-book and showed her the bills.

The woman looked at them unmoved.

"Those are the delicate little keys of the Future and Happiness," chuckled Abel, as he gloated over the paper.

The woman raised her eyes and looked into his. They were hard as the bills. Then with the same low tone, as if the wind were wailing, she asked,

"Abel, tell me, before we go upon this long journey, don't you love me in the least?"

Her voice sank into an almost inaudible whisper.

Abel turned and looked at her, gayly.

"Love you? Why, woman, what is love? No, I don't love you. I do love my body. But that's no matter. You shall go with me as if I did. You know, as well as I do, that I can't winter and wing silly. I'll be your friend, and you'll be mine, and this shall be the friend of both," said he, as he raised the bills in his hands.

She sat beside him silent, and her eyes were hot and dry, not wet with tears. There was a look of woe in her face so touching and appealing that, when Abel happened to see it, he said, involuntarily,

"Come, come, don't be silly."

The evening came, and the Honorable Mr. Newt rose and walked about the room.

"How slowly the time passes!" he said, petulantly. "I can't stand it."

It was nine o'clock. Suddenly he sprang up from beside Kitty Dunham, who was silently working.

"No," said he, "I really can not stand it. I'll run over to town, and be back by midnight. I do want to see the old place once more before that long journey," he added, with emphasis, as he put on his coat and hat. He ran out of the room, and was just going out of the house when he heard a muffled voice calling to him from up stairs.

"Why, Kitty, what is it?" he asked, as he stopped.

There was no answer. Alarmed for a moment, he leaped up the stairs. She stood waiting for him at the door of the room.

"Well!" exclaimed he, hastily.

"You forgot to kiss me, Abel," she said.

He took her by the shoulders, and looked at her before him. In her eyes there were pity and gentleness and love.

"Fool!" he said, half-pleased, half-vexed—kissed her, and rushed out into the street.

CHAPTER XCVIII.

A LONG JOURNEY.

ABEL NEWT went to the ferry and crossed. Then he gained Broadway, and sauntered into one of the hells that were in Park Row. It was bright and full, and he saw many an old friend. They nodded to him, and said, "Ah! back again!" and he smiled, and said a man must not be too virtuous all at once.

So he ventured a little, and won; ventured a little more, and lost. Ventured a little more, and won again; and lost again.

Then came supper, not profuse and splendid, but sufficient; and plenty of wine flowed freely. Old friends met glass to bumpers.

To work again, and the bells striking midnight. Win, lose; lose, win; win, win, lose, lose, lose, lose, lose.

Abel Newt smiled: his face was red, his eyes glaring.

"I've played enough," he said; "the luck's against me!"

He passed his hands rapidly through his hair.

"Cash. I can not pay," he said; "but here is my I O U, and a check of my Uncle Lawrence's for the morning. For I have no account, you know."

His voice was rough. It was two o'clock in the morning in the lonely woman he had left sat waiting and wondering; stealing to the front door and straining her eyes into the night; stealing softly back again to press her forehead against the window; and the quiet hopelessness of her face began to be pricked with terror.

"All right, gentlemen," said Abel, huskily and savagely.

There was a laugh around the table at which he had been playing.

"Takes it hardly, now that he's got money," said one of his old cronies. "He's made up with Uncle Lawrence, I hear. Hope he'll come often, hey?" he said to the bank.

The bank smiled vaguely, but did not reply.

It was two hours and Abel burst into the street. He had been drinking brandy, and the fires were lighted within him. Pulling his hat heavily upon his head, he moved unsteadily along the street toward the ferry. The night was starry and still. There were few passers in the street, save an light but that which shone at some of the corners, the bad, red eye that lures to death. The night air struck cool upon his face and temples. His head was hard light. He reeled.

"Mas ha' some drink," he said, thickly.

He stumbled, and pitched into the nearest shop. There was a counter, with large yellow barrels and bottles. And a big, bald, bobbed which two or three rough-looking men were drinking. In the window there was a sign, "Liquors, pure as imported."

Abel tried to stand erect, to look dignified, to smooth himself into apparent sobriety. He vaguely hoped to give the impression that he was a gentleman belated upon his way home, and taking a simple glass for comfort. The place was dingy and cold. The guests were huddled about a stove; and their hard, cadaverous faces and sullen eyes turned on welcomes upon Abel when he entered, but they looked at him quickly, as if they suspected him to be a policeman or magistrate, and as if they had reason not to look too sure at him. But in a moment they saw it was not a sober man, whoever he was.

"Why, Dick, don't yer know him?" said one, in a low voice, to his neighbor.

"No, d—— him! and don't want to."

"I do, though," replied the first man, still watching the newcomer curiously.

"Why, Jim, who in h— is it?" asked Dick.

"That air man's our representative. That ain't nobody else but Abel Newt."

"Well," muttered Jim, sullenly, as he surveyed the general appearance of Abel as he stood drinking a glass of brandy—"pure as imported"—at the counter, "well, we've done lots for him; what's he going to do for us? We've put that man up tremendious high; d'ye think he's going to kick away the ladder?"

He half grumbled to himself, half asked his neighbor Dick. They were both a little drunk, and very surly.

"I dunno. But he's vastly high and mighty—that I know; and, by——, I'll tell him so!" said Dick, energetically clasping his hands, bringing one of them down upon the bench on which he sat, and clenching every word with an oath.

"Hallo, Jim! let's make him give us something to drink!"

The two constituents approached the representative whose election they had so ardently supported.

"Well, Newt, how air ye?"

Abel Newt was confounded at being accosted in such a place at such an hour. He raised his heavy eyes, as he leaned unsteadily against the counter, and saw two beetle-browed, square-faced, disagreeable-looking men looking at him with half-drunken, sullen insolence.

"Hello, Newt! how air ye?" repeated Jim, as he confronted the representative.

Abel looked at him with shaking head, indignant and scornful.

"Who the devil are you?" he asked, at length, blurring the words as he spoke, and endeavoring to express supreme contempt.

"Why the man that made yer!" retorted Dick, in a shrill, tipsy voice.

The liquor-seller, who was leaning upon his counter, was instantly alarmed. He saw the signs of impending danger. He hurried round, and said,

"Come, come; I'm going to shut up! Time to go home; time to go home!"

The three men at the counter did not move. As they stood facing each other the animal fury kindled more and more fiercely in each one of them.

"We've Jim and Dick, and Ned's asleep yonder on the bench; and we've come to drink a glass with yer, Honorable Abel Newt!" said Dick, in a sneering tone. "It's we what did your business for ye. What'yer going to do for us?"

There was a menacing air in his eye as he glanced at Abel, who felt himself quiver with impotent, blind rage.

"I don——dare—to—me?" he said, with maudlin dignity.

The men pressed nearer.

"Time to go home! Time to go home!" quavered the liquor-seller; and Ned opened his eyes, and slowly raised his huge frame from the bench.

"What's the row?" asked he of his comrades.

"The Honorable Abel Newt's the row," said Jim, pointing at him.

There was something peculiarly irritating to Abel in the pointing finger. Holding by the counter, he raised his hand and struck at it.

Ned rolled his body off the bench in a moment.

"For God's sake!" gasped the little liquor-seller.

Jim and Dick stood hesitatingly, glaring at Abel. Jim struck his teeth together. Ned joined them, and they surrounded Abel.

"What is——will you mean by striking me, you drunken pig?" growled Jim, but not yet striking. Conscious of his strength, he had the instinctive forbearance of superiority, but it was fast mastered by the maddening liquor.

"Time to go home! Time to go home!" cried the thin, pipy voice of the liquor-seller.

"What the —— do you mean by insulting

WAITING.

CHIPS'S GHOST STORY.

"In the year twenty-six," said Chips, "just when I was out of my time, I took it into my head to go whaling, not as carpenter, but before the mast. I shipped on board the old ——, one of Gale's of Deptford. We took in some Shetlanders at Lerwick, as whalers mostly do, as hardy chaps as any afloat; but one of them died before we'd left Ronas Head a month. He was a strange, silent fellow, that was always looking over his shoulder in the forecastle at night, as if he expected to see something. We thought no more about it at first, but he wasn't a safe man to plague. His mates told us all kinds of queer yarns about him: that he'd been away from the Islands for more or so long, and that nobody knew where he'd been to. All that he'd say was that he'd been in the 'Spanish service,' and some such like, and that he meant a shiver, some a pirate, some one thing, some another; but more of them say good. The Shetlanders don't mind seeing ghosts, for they are superpious people in the main, and they didn't relish the way in which this man courted them. Some of 'em was for ever sneering at the kirk. He struck a minister one day when he'd got the horrors, and the parson had gone to bless him like a parson.

"That he didn't want any spies about his bed." His eyes were staring at the wall on one side of him, as if some one was there, and he cried, They said that he had got the horrors; but, as I've told you, he had always that frightened look in the dark, even when he was sober enough. Something bad was on his mind, that's very certain.

"The day he died he was quarter than ever, keeping out of the way of every body as much as he could, rolling his eyes about like a madman, talking to himself, and as pale as a sheet. 'You'll better turn in, Gale,' the doctor said to him; and down he went without a word, and presently the doctor sent him some stuff, thinking he was in a fever. By lunch-time he was easy, and when I turned in at eight bells I could hear him hissing through his clenched teeth, just as if he was trying to keep in a whistle. He was much easy a night as this, only there was a deal more ice ranging about than what we'd seen before. I soon fell asleep, for we had been making-off blubber all day, and I had got quite tired over the casks. I might have been asleep about a couple of hours, when I was woke by a horrid scream, as if a soul was just dropping into the lower regions. I tumbled out in next to no time, and so did the other chaps, and we all came crowding round Galt's berth. He had squeezed up against the side (we could see, when we lifted up the curtain, that he'd managed to stave his back into the wood, and was striking out with his right hand clutched as if he'd got a knife in it, and his left with all the fingers spread out. His face was a horrid sight. It was as white and as wet as the side of a chalk-pit, and his eyes were regularly alight with rage and fear. I don't know which there was most of in them.

"'Take her off! take her off!' he yelled, when he saw us. 'You can't, you fool,' says Chalmers! Then, confound you, go to blazes with me! I'll haunt you, and sink the ship?'

"And then he gave a twitch like a devil trying to laugh, and he fell over on it dead, with his arms still stiff. We could hardly get them down by his sides when we came to lay him. The next day but one we buried him, and—you may believe me or not, as you like—but I can tell you that his body rolled in the hammock as if it was dragged down the moment he touched the water.

"The first thick day afterward the skipper had his chest brought up from below to sell his gear, but none of us would bid; so the skipper and the doctor, like good fellows, hid against each other, to get a good round sum for his old shipmate, whom he'd never cared about, his mates told us. He didn't bid, because we didn't think it would be lucky to put on any thing that such a man as he had worn; but we made out a list of what each of us would give to bid, and the mate gave it to the skipper to be stopped out of our pay.

"Nevertheless, after that we had nothing but misfortune. Scarce a day but we lost a whale. Scarce one of those that did come could we get near; and when we happened to strike one, the line was sure to break. Then, as for ice, too, we went down all of a sudden, just as if it had been swallowed. Galt was haunting us, sure enough. We didn't see any thing except the ice, until the sun set for good. We were lying then, frozen up, in a great floe, some sixty miles northwest of the Devil's Thumb, and we were there for a year, when the sun dipped—not to come up again for weeks to come. There we were, fairly shut in for the whole winter. Then, as the sun began to put a dock for the ship by moonlight, when suddenly—the bears had done growling, and the wolves howling, for a bit, and every thing except the ice-grating saws was still as death, for there wasn't a breath of wind blowing—there was a shiver, there, about two miles off, we could see the water, as we had lost rushing through the mist, as big as planets, and Galt and them, even bigger, striking out just as he did when he died.

"Another time, we made out some water a mile off, with a white bear swimming in it, as if she was puzzled how to get out. We launched the boats over the ice, gave chase, and killed her, and took her alongside of the ship. We were glad enough of the crang ourselves, for we had been on short allowance for a long time. The bears and the whales and the fish we'd secured it, and came down for their share. We drew off a bit to let them come near, and then let fly and killed a lot of them, too, for food. We had made quite a jolly pile of provisions, and were just about to spear an odd shark—first shark doesn't taste unlike fried sole, when you're hungry—that was bumping the whole with its ugly snout, to find a tid-bit, when crack went the ice, like a monstrous big pane of glass, with a running rumble like the roar of a thousand cannon let off one after another. We could hear it growling away for miles into the darkness. The moon was just going down. The shark soon left the whale, for the bit of ice on which our prog was tilted over like a dust-cart, and shot its loud into the sea. We were too busy getting down our lives to have any time to look after that. Two of our boats were cracked like walnut-shells by the big lumps of ice that were jolting down on every side. It was as much as ever we could do to get off our lumber safely—the four crews into two boats; it danced up and down, this side and that, right upon the swell. And then we had only starlight to guide us as we pulled back to the ship, with broken ice on every side threatening each moment to stave us in. I didn't see him that night, but three of our fellows did. They say he chased us back, jumping from block to block as if he were merely stepping-stones across a brook.

"He was seen once more big like that. The ship was frozen in hard and fast again. You could see nothing but a hummocky plain of ice, with here and there a berg sticking up like a sharp horn, for miles all round, except in one place astern, where there was a little water-hole that glimmered in the moonlight like a great watching eye. We had covered in the quarter-deck with a sloping canvas roof, but a hole was left just where the tafferel was cut out. Well, one night, when the Northern Lights were flashing about the sky like huge flapping flags of red, and yellow, and green, and the air was looking out through this opening, and by the water-hole he saw Galt standing as tall as a fir-tree. He had the fingers and the thumb of his left hand spread out as he had when he died, and with his right forefinger he counted them off one by one. Then down he went into the water-hole, and the yellow-eyed drop through the stage, and the next morning it was frozen up.

"On the night of the fourth day after he had been thus seen, the moon was in the same line as he was when alive, walking round and round the ship, laughing and pointing. One, two, three, four, he counted as he left hand, then shut it all up except the little finger, and kept lunging through the gloom with that. We knew what he meant as well as any.

"A berg twice as high as the one we saw at noon came with a jar against the floe, and shivered it into bits. Then, after about the ship, of course, broke up and began a devil's dance; but as this weren't very big, and she was regularly eased with rope-fenders, she might have got over that if the berg hadn't borne down upon her as straight as if it had been steered. On it came, never once faltering off a point. You may fancy what a funk we were in. We bundled clothes and blankets, pork and biscuit into the boats, and were about to side in a twinkling, pulling for dear life, and fending off the little lumps that came walloping up against us as well as we could with the boat-hooks. Two poor frost-bitten fellows couldn't leave their berths, and the skipper swore, come what might, he'd stick by them. So I and the rest run forward and hoist the jib all by himself, to get some way on her, and then the berg came between, and we never saw more of it, or the ship, or our two. And may I never taste grog again if I didn't see on the berg, alongside of Galt and a foreign-looking woman, Jack Frost!"

When he saw, and how Chips and his comrades got home, we did not hear; for just then a shrill voice from the forecastle echoed shrilly along the deck—sang out, in tremulous haste, "Ice on the weather-bow!" and the chief officer, in his rushing rush forward, put a like marvel-mouthed visage at the cabin-door, and bellowed to his colleague, "Jackson, turn out!" The cabin was soon cleared, and we and our fellow-passengers glide past it, so near that we could plainly make out the form of the black billows breaking ere its dully glimmering sides.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A BEAUTIFUL blue-eyed Lulu of my acquaintance who has been in correspondence for a year with a friend of her mother's, a young and promising lawyer. He is frequently absent from the city, and the other night Lulu came to see my adjoining his own. Lulu, knowing this, one day said, "Mother, Mr. L. is in the city, coming to court; why don't he bring his wife home with him?"

When Bishop Leighton was one day lost in meditation in his own apartment, Dr. Dunbrain, a fair young widow came up to him, and told him it was ordered that the sheaf must be offered to the Lord before the first sheaf she was married to him. "Very well," replied the bishop, "I shall not be in a hurry, madam; but I am married to you, I will let you know, and we will be married immediately."

HOW TO GET RID OF CONVERSATION.—Tight Fist, who set next us in church not long since, showed us his plan to get rid of conversation. When the boy came round he commenced fumbling with desperate energy in his pantaloons-pocket, and when he said "Tight Fist fumbled and dug into the depths of his trowsers as if after his very bowels, and when he boy got tired of delay and passed to the next. Tight Fist leisurely folded his fingers, twirled his thumbs, looked over and asked us if we got the idea. Get it perfectly.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Bronchitis.

BRONCHITIS.—A Chronic Inflammation of the small Mucous Glands connected with the Membranes which line the Throat and Windpipe; the approach of which is often so insidious as scarcely to attract notice—an increase of Mucous, and a sense of weariness and loss of power in the Throat, Hoarseness, Coughing and Sneezing. It arises from cold or any unusual exertion of the voice. These insignificant symptoms are allayed by using Brown's Bronchial Troches, which if neglected, an entire loss of voice is often experienced.

STILL ANOTHER PROOF.

Phalon's Cocin,

To Dress your Hair and

REMOVE DANDRUFF.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Nov. 7, 1859.

MESSRS. PHALON & SON,

Gentlemen: For some time I have been using your Cocin as a Hair Dressing, and in removing the Dandruff from my head.

I must candidly say that I have never used any article that had so much effect upon the hair as your Cocin, and at the same time stopping a constant irritation of the skin.

As a preparation for Hair Dressing, I have never found any article that could keep my hair in its place for so long a time, and give it such a smooth and brilliant appearance.

As your Cocin has been so beneficial to me, you are at liberty to use this letter if it is of any service to you.

Respectfully yours,

SARAH H. HUGHES.

The above letter will satisfy all that it is the best preparation for removing Dandruff and dress the Hair. For sale by all Druggists and Dealers, at 25 and 50 cents a bottle, and by the manufacturers,

SELF-HELP,

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS OF CHARACTER AND CONDUCT.

By Samuel Smiles,

Author of "The Life of George Stephenson."

With a Complete and Elaborate Index.

12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

[From the London Saturday Review.]

Mr. Smiles, the author of "The Life of George Stephenson, has written a book called Self-Help, in which he has collected a wonderful number of stories showing how men get on in the world. The literary merit of the work is very great, and few authors have so successfully surmounted the difficulty of rearing the dry materials and pleasant narrative a long string of anecdotes. Both readers of biography and readers in search of aim—are aptly illustrated by Mr. Smiles, whose profusion of biographical anecdotes seems inexhaustible.

(From Halsted's late Treatise on Motorpathy.)

"MISS W——, aged 19, had a compound lateral curvature of the spine. For four years she had been ill. Shoulder was enlarged, and the opposite hip thrown out, making one limb seem actually shorter than the other. There was also a partial luxation of the hip joint, which rendered it impossible for her to walk without a crutch. When she had been five weeks under treatment, she discarded the crutch, and walked with ease and grace. Her hip rapidly regained its natural position and strength, and she can now walk for hours with ease. Her health is not perceptible.

"Here are two hundreds of children suffered to grow up unhealthy, deformed or without the use of their limbs, for want of knowledge, and when they come with such scrofula, exhibiting itself in various forms, who might be made perfectly healthy by proper treatment."

This Treatise can be had on return of mail by enclosing 25 cents to H. HALSTED, M.D., Round Hill Water Cure, Northampton, Mass.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

JANUARY.

The Number for December commenced the Twentieth Volume of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. In the Introductory Address it was stated to be HARPER'S Number, that the Publishers announced their intention to present a periodical "which no one but the slightest critic could find material to censure reading, or the slightest wish to keep himself informed of the current events and results of the literary genius of his own age, would willingly be without. And they intend to publish it at so low a rate, and to give it a value so much beyond its price, that it shall make its way into the home of the family of every intelligent citizen of the United States."

How far they have succeeded in carrying out their design the 115 Numbers of the Magazine already published will show. Each Number contains as much matter as an ordinary octavo of 400 pages, costing, if illustrated in the style of the Magazine, at least twice as much. Three handsome Volumes of the Magazine are thus equivalent to a library of seven Octavo Volumes, comprising the best productions of the foremost Novelists, Historians, Essayists, and Scientific Men.

With the unvarying purpose to render the Magazine, in every section, and in almost every Number, the best of the times, the Publishers have effectually prevented the Magazine from assuming a sectional character, or becoming the organ of any "mutual admiration" clique or party.

As an Illustrated Magazine, HARPER'S is wholly without a rival. Its Pictorial Illustrations already published have contained more than Six Thousand Engravings, most of which were executed in the highest style of Art, by Original Drawings by DARLEY, PERKINS, HUGHES, CROME, RENDER, WILLIS, WARREN, HOPPIN, CHAPIN, LOSSING, VOGDT, BELLOWS, MCLENAN, STEPHENS, HOOPER, BALLOU, and others. For these the Publishers have not paid not less than One Hundred and Twenty Thousand Dollars. This amount of contributions has considerably exceeded this amount. HARPER'S MAGAZINE has therefore, from its high style of Art, procured Original Drawings by DARLEY, PERKINS, HUGHES, CROME, RENDER, WILLIS, WARREN, HOPPIN, CHAPIN, LOSSING, VOGDT, BELLOWS, MCLENAN, STEPHENS, HOOPER, BALLOU, and others. For these the Publishers have not paid not less than One Hundred and Twenty Thousand Dollars. This amount of contributions has considerably exceeded this amount. HARPER'S MAGAZINE has therefore, from its high style of Art, procured a Quarter of a Million of Dollars' in American Authors and Artists.

The Publishers gratefully acknowledge that this large outlay finds a remunerative beyond their most sanguine expectations. They hoped from the first that the Magazine would make its way into the hands or the family circle of every intelligent citizen of the United States, but the number of those readers has proved far greater than they anticipated. They believe that the circulation of the Magazine will continue to increase with the growth and population of the country. For the spirit, it may honestly be said, in which it has been conducted, they can offer no better guarantee than the contents of the Volumes already issued.

While the Magazine will continue to be sustained by the writers whose papers have gained for it its distinctive character, a hearty welcome will be given to new Authors. Almost every Number has introduced fresh names to the reading public; and the Editors trust that their list of Contributors will be yet more enlarged.

The Home Journal,

A PAPER FOR THE HOMES OF GOOD TASTE.

MORRIS & WILLIS, EDITORS.

A NEW YEAR OF THIS POPULAR FAMILY NEWSPAPER will commenced on the first day of January—printed on fine paper and clear type.

With the January number for 1860, began the publication of a new and highly original NOVEL, MORE OF FACT AND FICTION, written expressly for the HOME JOURNAL, entitled

Jenty Proudfoot,

A ROMANCE OF AMERICAN HISTORY.

BY A DISTINGUISHED AUTHOR.

The romantic events on which this beautiful story is founded occurred in the troubled times of 1763, immediately before the close of the Revolutionary War, and the recognition of American Independence—a time when strong and contrasted and strong characters, and highly trials s corresponding heroism. The most romantic incidents, and the most exciting fiction may be founded on the historical passages of these times—strange to say, until now unappreciated by the novelist! Lately heroism and womanly devotion are wrought to the highest degree, through a chain of events not less exciting than strange—not less strange than true.

This charming story will be succeeded by

A Brilliant Venetian Tale.

BY COUTAZ FEUILLET.

The celebrated author of "The Romance of a Poor Young Man," the success and character of which, both in the New and Old World, have been unprecedented, and given him a place amongst the first of living novelists. The tale is one of surpassing interest, replete with incidents, and highly descriptive of Italian life, manners, and manners. Its translation from the French by MRS. MARIAN M. PEABODY (Editress for the HOME JOURNAL) herself a talented and gifted authoress, eminently qualified for the task by education, and by long residence in the country of the author, will sufficiently guarantee the purity of the style in which the work is rendered, and that nothing of the force and merit of the original will be lost in its translation.

Specialities.

All the former peculiar features of the paper, which have given it its present reputation, are continued, while several new ones give an infinite variety to its ever diversified pages.

GEORGE P. MORRIS, besides his usual constant labors upon the several departments of the paper, will make it the wont on which to broider first many etc., suggested by the history and events of the passing time. N. P. WILLIS will give a continuous series of embodied in his Journal, of the prominent persons and leading productions in the FASHIONABLE, ÆSTHETIC, and INTELLECTUAL WORLD. He will also give more of his sketchings of home and rural fancy sympathies and interests, out-doors-and-in, and a few more of his inimitable PARDS INVISIBLE, which last experience, continued since with invisible, and practised observation on the subject enable him to write. BARRY GRAY will supply a new series of amusing sketches, drawn from real life, under the title of

MY FRIENDS AND I,

in which sundry well-known literary men and artists will figure.

As heretofore, no labor nor expense are spared to maintain the high reputation of the HOME JOURNAL which is everywhere, both at home and abroad, acknowledged to be the most original, and the most imperfect of Literature and the Arts on this side of the sea, and the BEST AND CHEAPEST FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

Those who desire to begin with the commencement of the year will please to forward their subscriptions at once.

TERMS—For one copy, $2; for three, copies, $5—or one copy for three years, $5—for a club of seven copies, $10; and for a club of twenty copies, $20; and there rate for a larger club—always in advance. Address,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,

Have just Published;

MISREPRESENTATION.

A NOVEL.

By Anna H. Drury.

Author of "Friends and Fortune," "Sanbury," &c.

8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

(From the London Spectator.)

There is no living writer of fiction who might not be proud to have produced a work like Misrepresentation, but there is not one among them all who could have written it except Mrs. DRURY herself. Mrs. DRURY is an able and conscientious artist, and therefore her novel is racy of that originality which belongs to every work that is the genuine result of an individual mind. The story is singularly well constructed—it is not a short one, and yet we do not find in it a page could be separated. The characters are numerous and distinctly marked, and they talk like men and women, not like puppets, or like a book. The diction throughout is worthy of the matter, never careless or labored, always suited to the subject, and giving on the reader's mind the impression that the author has conveyed her meaning in the best form of words she could have chosen for the purpose.

(From the London Athenæum.)

This is a novel with a good plot, which is well and carefully worked out. The characters are every one of them human beings, and act and move like such. The authoress studies and draws her characters, does not love the thread of her story, nor allow the action to stand still while she indulges her own about her own opinions. What observations there are spring up naturally, and are indigenous to the occasion, and are all of them very good and sensible. "Misrepresentation" will be read with interest, especially by those who find themselves farther up in the scale of society than ourselves and other blessings brought by November and its fogs.

(From the London Leader.)

We hope our readers will get the work. The characters are admirably drawn, and the whole subject of "Misrepresentation" is treated with great skill by the talented writer.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States on receipt of Fifty Cents.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $2 50 A YEAR.

The First Number of the Fourth Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY appeared on the 4th January, 1860. Last year HARPER'S WEEKLY was commenced as a First-class weekly, nearly half of which have been bound for reference. In commencement the Fourth Volume, the Publishers desire to state that it has been their aim to render HARPER'S WEEKLY, as the title page declared before and during a first-class newspaper—a pictorial history of current events, equal to the daily press, and a complete family paper, and superior to the daily press as combining illustrations with news. How far, during the past year, this has been done the volumes now published will show. The Illustrations in the Third Volume will bear comparison for fidelity with which every important event of the past year has been recited and illustrated in the pages of HARPER'S WEEKLY. They would refer especially, in this connection, to The Italian War, the Great Industrial Exhibition, the Harper's Ferry Outbreak, the Utah Expedition, the Paraguay Expedition, China, and the Arctic Seas. If the paper can be best realized by supposing that it did not exist, and by trying to conceive how little people would really know of passing events if they had to rely on written descriptions alone, in that respect, its arrangements for the coming year are more complete than they have been heretofore. HARPER'S WEEKLY has regular and efficient correspondents in almost every quarter of the globe, and commands the special use of the Associated Press. It will moreover, in order to present its readers with a complete illustrated History of the war age, continue to devote to the pages the best and most generally interesting pictures from foreign illustrated papers. Abroad, the subscriber to HARPER'S WEEKLY may rely on finding in its pages news given with the utmost promptness, accuracy, and well-printed pictures of every memorable event which occurs, and a great deal of every man and woman of the general attention of the people of this country.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue, as heretofore, to publish the best tales that are written by native and foreign authors. A new story by CHARLES READE, of Two Cities, by CHARLES DICKENS (with original illustrations drawn for HARPER'S WEEKLY), and a story by the author of BY SIR E. LYTTON DULWER: The Dead Secret, by WILKIE COLLINS; Sweet Anne Page, by MARK LEMON; A Good Fight, by CHARLES READE; and Trumps, by GEO. WILLIAM CURTIS, are among the stories which will appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY are purchased from their authors for the proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY. In many instances, give for a mere right of priority what amounts to the entire copyright of the work.

In addition to serials, each number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will contain a complete tale by the most popular of foreign authors. In respect to these tales, as with the serials, the proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY will not be obtain, without regarding their origin.

The other departments of HARPER'S WEEKLY will continues to receive careful attention at the hands of the publishers.

RUINS OF THE PEMBERTON MILLS, AT LAWRENCE, MASSACHUSETTS, THE MORNING AFTER THE FALL.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY WHIPPLE, OF BOSTON.]

THE DISASTER AT LAWRENCE.

On the preceding page we give an effective picture of the ruin of the Pemberton Mill at Lawrence, Massachusetts, from a photograph by Waple, of Boston.

The catastrophe which destroyed this mill is almost unparalleled in our history. On the afternoon of 10th inst., at about ten minutes before five o'clock, the Pemberton Mill, of Lawrence, fell in ruins to the ground. The mill was in full operation at the time, and the time of lighting up had just arrived. Nine hundred and sixty operatives were employed in the mill, but probably the whole number in the building at the time of the disaster was something less than nine hundred. Every one in Lawrence at once fell to work to endeavor to rescue the unfortunate beings who were crushed to death under the falling mass, and up to a late hour last night the work proceeded encouragingly. At that hour, however, the ruins took fire, and further attempts at rescue became universally, At 12 o'clock, all hopes of saving the lives of those in the building was given up in despair. Engines were still throwing water upon the fire in the morning, and an immense throng of people waited, spell bound, viewing the scene.

We make some extracts from the daily papers of New York and Boston, describing the incidents.

HOW THE MILL FELL.

John Ward, one of the operatives in the carding-room, in the second story, was miraculously saved, with his wife, who worked near him in the same room. He describes his escape as follows:

I was in the carding-room with the second overseer, lighting up. It is five or ten minutes before five o'clock, and we had got but few burners lighted, when, suddenly, I heard a noise. It sounded like a loud, rumbling crash of thunder, and, looking up, I saw the shafting coming down upon us all over the room. I could not account for it, but was therefore terribly frightened mulled to the spot, and did not seem to have power to move, although where the building was going to come me. Then I heard the overseer shout, and I tried to jump out of the rubbish; but something struck me, and I was thrown prostrate. I did not remain so long: but when I came to I found myself buried in the rubbish, and did not expect to get out alive. I was all covered over with blood from wounds in my face. I finally crawled up and got to the top, and found a lot of ruins hanging over me, which came near ending my life; but I succeeded in getting out. I passed by a deal of the dead and wounded, who were mangled bodies before I got out. When I was first knocked down I felt beneath a huge grinding-stone, which was strong enough to hold the weight above, and thus saved my life. When I fell under the stone the walls over me all falling, and the floor giving way all around me.

Mr. Ward found his wife at the City Hall, where she had been carried after being extricated. Neither were much injured.

HAIR-BREADTH ESCAPES.

One young woman, twenty years of age, who was at work in the second story, heard the crash of a portion of the building, and the sensation of it tumbling down. She immediately started in an opposite direction, but before she reached this point the walls were crumbling, and threatened instant death. Almost panic-stricken, she rushed to a side-door, and was just emerging to the entry, when a portion of the walls came falling, and the door giving way all around me.

THE LOUNGER.

NUDITY IN ART.

THE drollest of all art-criticisms was lately made apropos of Palmer's White Captive. It was to the effect that, as the Greeks were sensuous in their religion, they properly carved nude statues, but that the spirituality of the Christian idea was expressed by drapery.

Translated into other words, this is merely to say that the nude is more adequately manifested in the handiwork of tailors than in the divine drapery of flesh and blood. From the point of view of decency, it is like the improvement of trousers and swaddling-clothes which the Pope ordered to be put upon the figures in Michael Angelo's Last Judgment.

This whole question is periodically agitated, but it is really very simple. If the human figure be properly the subject of sculpture, it must be the human figure as God made it, and not as fashion clothes it. But as men habitually wear clothes, historic personages are properly represented in the garments they wore; and, for the same reason, when the motive of the sculpture is not individual but representative or symbolical, as in the Greek, or individual, but not personal, as in the White Captive, then it is the human form itself which is the subject of the artist, and the means by which his intention is expressed. A portrait is the representation of a man as he was known to others. Hence we must have Julius Cæsar in a toga, and Washington in Continental regimentals. But the Venus is not a portrait—the Gladiator is not a portrait; neither is the Greek Slave, nor the White Captive. And the nude, as in the latter case, the supposed circumstances require nudity, the question is finally settled.

That modesty is a spiritual and not a material grace is so true that Catherine of Russia clad in pelisses a mile thick is not decent; and, on the other hand Cleopatra had been a "perfect Young Ton," would the deed of the lady Godiva have been less glorious? A work is justly charged with indecency only when the evident intention and the inevitable influence are prurient. But this in the case neither in Page's Venus nor in Palmer's White Captive.

THACKERAY'S NEW MAGAZINE.

PERIODICAL literature in England has just been the subject of a remarkable revolution. John Bull means to try cheap papers and magazines. He has seen with astonishment the success of popular weekly and monthly issues in America and of the cheapest literary papers at home, and he has made up his mind to try the experiment whether the most famous English authors can not command an audience so large that their periodical labors may be sold as cheaply as any.

Dickens's Household Words had demonstrated this, but publishers and authors still held aloof, and the old English Magazines were as dull and untimely as the fertile English mind could produce; until within a few months the quarrel between Mr. Bentley and his old publishers seems to have stirred the long stagnant waters. With the disappearance of Household Words all the old craft went down, and with the birth of All the Year Round a new era in English literature appears.

Once a Week ends its first volume of twenty-six numbers with the issue of the 24th of December. Mr. Thackeray was announced as one of its contributors, but he does not seem to have written any thing for it. The proprietors state that its commercial success is fairly established, and promise constant improvements; among others, a new novel by Lemman Isherd, which is now in the hands of the designers. The Cornhill Magazine, with Frith-Marshal Thackeray in command, takes the field with the beginning of the year; and the General has evidently put on all his armor, burnished for the occasion. He begins a new story in the most fascinating vein, "Lovel the Widower"—a tale of contemporary English life and society. It opens with a disquisition on "Muffs," in which the sharp, incisive touch of the historian of "Snobs" is perfectly evident; and he has also a first editorial article, "The Cornhill Paper," in which he treats of novel-reading with all his bantering, satiric zest. In these papers he will have ample scope for the display of his special, kindly sympathy with men and things which appears so pleasantly in the prospectus, and which is the humane undertone and key note of his genius. Of course he has a desperate battle for public favor to fight with his illustrious contemporary Dickens; but Thackeray is a powerful Magazinish talent, and he is clearly fully aroused.

For the readers of Harper's Weekly and Magazine it is a good thing to know that the proprietors have made such arrangements that they can place the choicer parts of all the new English periodicals at the earliest moment, and, in particular magazines like the novels, from advance sheets, before their readers. This was in the next number of the Magazine the new tale of "Lovel the Widower" will be commenced, with the illustrations. Mr. Anthony Trollope also contributes a story; Mr. Wilkie Collins is already deep in his "Woman in White;" Mr. Tom Hughes, in Macmillan's Magazine, is writing a serial sequel to "Tom Brown's School-days;" and the supply of novels is not likely to fall short. Meanwhile Tennyson is to be paid $50 a line for his new poem, and all Bohemia is waiting for it, while the sun shines. Eighty thousand copies are to be printed of the new Cornhill. That is not like the hundred and fifty of Harper, but it is a good beginning. Never before were readers and writers so active and so fortunate.

NAPOLEON'S LAST MOVE.

THE Emperor has taken another step in the solution of the Italian question, and a very important one. Mrs. Browning will have more faith than ever. For certainly he has touched the gravest difficulty in the peninsula, the temporal position of the Pope. In fact, so far as Louis Napoleon is concerned, no mission seems to consist in unsettling the settlement of Europe so carefully made after Waterloo, which to every thoughtful mind has always seemed an arrangement of the most temporary kind.

The little pamphlet which our daily papers have reproduced is written in the grandiloquent, epigrammatic French style, but it embraces the substance of the whole matter. The Pope must be temporally independent. But he can not be so if three of the great powers are to be his states together. France will not do it, Austria shall not, and Naples can not. The only practicable thing, therefore, is to have a subscription among all the great Catholic States, pay the Holy Father a liberal allowance, and let him live at Rome with the Roman inhabitants. Then he obviously owns nobody, and, in case of trouble, the allied powers will enforce quiet.

This is simple, and certainly very pertinent to the present juncture; but the question, of course, presents itself, Who will want to live in the city of Rome under an exclusively priestly Government, when they can get rid of it by moving a few miles away? Only those will stay who can get off; and they will be almost the most pitiable of civilized populations.

Yet, with the state of things hinted in this plan, the Pope might still be "Honorary President" of the Italian League. The stork is not so bad a king after all, if you only cut off his head. He can't pick up the frogs with his legs; and though his throat is as capacious as ever, he has nothing to swallow. It is a pretty wet year, difficult now to see the connection between M. Guerronière's pamphlet and M. About's book. The latter treated the question jocularly, to make popular opinion. The former appeals soberly to the grave political wisdom of Europe, which will be governed by the pressure of that opinion. The striking of the political progress more marked than in the fact that the most powerful king in Europe always assures himself of public sentiment before he acts.

This proposition is certainly a large entry to the credit of Louis Napoleon in the ledger of History. That it is all to his own advantage is very true; but if an emperor does a good thing, why should he not be the prime gift of God as well as another man? Certainly it is beginning to appear that he is adjusting the condition of Europe with as little disturbance as we could hope to see it done. He does not, indeed, inspire confidence in advance; but he earns a great deal of just commendation as he proceeds.

AFTER THE FAIR.

AND yet good looks seem now too late. Even when they are meant for the holidays they suit other days also. The times of the mere 'Annual' having gone by, and taste, taking counsel with art and mechanical skill having now combined, the results are such as are good from year to year, and at all times pleasant.

While the Lounger has been sauntering about staring in at many windows in many towns and cities, going to and fro, and looking down upon many counters, overcome and powerless with the sense of multitudinous preparation—as powerless in the mere prospect of holding himself to a good healthy boy in the mere reminiscence of the pudding of which he consumed so much too much—during all this time his own treasures have been increasing by the thoughtfulness of friends, and as he turns his eye to his own table, lo! it is piled beyond hope of enumeration.

Chiefly with good books and beautiful books, of sets so many inventively invented as to the matter, and of so many tasteful hands as to the manner. The wonderful book of Tyl Owiglass, a sort of Rabelaisian Münchausen, with Rabelaisian and of Gil Blas in humorous adventure—the wild romance of Bettine's correspondence with Goethe—the Life and the Dr. Hanna of Bagby, with Bagby's own loved and honored—a fresh volume of Kingsley's Miscellanies, various, picturesque, clever, and of a manful Christianity—Verplanck's Bacon, in one large, legible volume—the neat conceit of Mother Goose, for the older children, called men and women—the inexhaustible Arabian Nights, Australian scenery and legend, of which the Lounger will steal another moment to say something—and the ever fresh, exquisite, and delightful Lays of Ancient and American Poets of the Nineteenth Century—with a cloud of charming volumes, large and small, for children—a book of which a specialty for a word of recognition?—messengers and missionaries of enjoyment and instruction—so many happy friends and friendsh all over the land.

Even in New England, where the old Puritan way is whispered to disappear, it is a tradition and partially in fact—in the land of pies and Thanksgiving—the Lounger has actually heard the waning Christmas festivities spoken of as a long season. They are creeping and decorating Christmas trees in the New England churches, passage open in all those generous chimneys of the old time, and at the fireside stockings as open as the chimneys. There was even one brave man who said: "It seems to me Christmas is slowly displeasing Thanksgiving! At least, it is as much a holiday!"

So let it be every where—not upon the ruins of the old New England festival, but by its side. As the winter days come in, and poverty pinches, multiply the festivals which, by opening his heart, open also the pocket and the mind, to give relief to present necessity, and to devise systematic and permanent relief to suffering. Perhaps we should be better men and women if we had more holidays —certainly we should be so if they were in good faith holy-days. The spring is our dry season of festivals. But there is hope that Easter may gradually grow into a universally honored day: and that the bells which ring at "the merry, merry time of Yule" may bleed their music with the earlier chimes of spring, the symbolical new birth of the year.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

CONUNDRUMS.

Why is the front like a hotel boote?—Because it changes one's shoes into slippers.

Why is a sot like a fish?—Because he's like the great Fall of Niagara?—Because it is a cat-ract.

What's the difference between Handel and the grinder of a barrel-organ?—The one was a composer, the other is a decomposer.

Why are non-haters like mice in the West Indies?—Because they are not Cubans.

If a petty postmaster marries a pill-monger, why may he be said to make a Dispensation of it?—Because he lets him have a "duck," and gets nothing but a quack in return.

MORAL MAXIMS.

Never put off till to-morrow the man whom you can do to-day.

Business first and pleasure afterward. Get your loan from the source before you trust yourself with kicking him.

Pay no debts while they remain unpleasantly with mirth.

Patience is a virtue. When your wife wants a new shawl or bier to wait for it.

Feeds your women to bills, and wise men make a living by them.

Exchange is no robbery. If you go out to a party put your coats back on.

A LAY OF A LAWYER.

"THE man who gives a joke should be prepared to take one; and as it is with testimonials, which have become a favorite joke nowadays that we should advise the reader, if he is sensible, to have nothing to do with them. For a moment of weakness, gives any thing toward a testimonial, exposes himself to the danger of a compliment some day to take one himself. Such mutual homage only ends in general contempt."

PRACTICAL WISDOM.—Whenever you see exposed for sale any article that strikes your fancy, buy it if you can afford it, whether you want it or not. If you wait till you actually want a certain thing, you will find that the exact thing you want is not to be found. You will search in vain at a hundred clothes-shops for the particular kind of trowsers that you see in a shop-window.

PROFESSIONAL NURSERY RHYMES.

SHERIFF'S OFFICER.

Catches Captain Walker,
Burns up Sandy Hook,
Tap him on the shoulder,
Take him off to jail.

LAWYER.

Little fingers peeper,
Pile his little bill,
Take his little 'duck,'
Make his little will.

PARSON.

Preaches, preaches, preaches,
Not too long, beseech 'ee;
Wear a white tie,
And make 'em all cry,
Preacher, preacher, preacher.

BUTCHER.

Little boy blue, come take your steer,
Sharpen your knife to cut up your veal;
Jacky's a man, and so don't cry,
Any thing else but "Buy, buy, buy!"

COSTERMONGER.

Bless his little heart!
Draw his little cart;
Here's his carrots, turnips, peas, and beans,
Sparrow-grass and kail,
Artichokes and pears,
Cauliflowers, cabbages, and greens.

RAILWAY DIRECTOR.

Husbandry, baby, asleep in the train,
When we spare wages, so much we gain,
When we're ill served, collisions befall,
And smash go carriages, baby, and all.

UNDER.

Cock-a-doo-dandy!
Daddy bill frowns;
The nation we're so leat
At sixty per cent.
Isn't going a cheer!

TAX-COLLECTOR.

Great A, schedulledums A, B, C,
And some odds and ends his wife schedilledy D,
"What a hole in my income you've made!" says he.

MEMBER OF CONGRESS.

Baby wants nothing,
Don't 'ee scratch and beatums!
The Man in the Moon
Will come down soon,
And bribe, corrupt, and treatums.

TAILOR.

Goosey, goosey, goosey,
Where's little baby?
Dead lying,
Grim sirius,
Then he's in the moon.

MEDICAL MAN.

Count up his pulse, pulse, pulse,
Roll up his pill, pill, pill,
Mix up his dose, dose, dose,
Make up his bill, bill, bill.

IMPORTANT TO NEXT OF KIN.—When a man intends to marry a widow, his friends, if they can not prove him a lunatic, should, if possible, take care that he settles very little of his property on the lady of his choice; for the obvious reason, that a second-hand wife ought to be cheap, since her new husband can hardly expect to be dear.

MONOTONY.—The Austrians are so tired of a paper currency that they are anxious for any thing by way of change.

EXTREME POLITENESS.—Pickpocket to Policeman: "I say, your handkerchief is hanging out. You'll have your pocket picked if you don't take care!"

REASONS WHY I WEAR CRINOLINE.

Extorted from MISS HUSSELTON, by one who owns himself a Bruce.

1. Because it's quite the thing to wear it.
2. Because I know every body has got to wear it now.
3. Because it sets one off so.
4. Because gentlemen admire it so. (Oh, yes, they may say they don't like it; but I know quite well they do.)
5. Because—well, you know one doesn't always want to have one's waist confined.
6. Because—well, now I'm sure it's very tiresome in you to keep so confining me so, and I've really a good mind not to say another word to you.
7. Because, upon my word, I don't know why you reason, do you? Well, then, I won't. Because, I won't, indeed I don't, that's all.

Does an impudent noble remember behind bullock's heart?—No! Because the longer he is kept waiting, the better he gets.

GOLDEN ADVICE.—Persons about to marry should look to their finances before they take their fatal leap. With future of uncertainty and increasingly large families, it is generally easier to find appetites than dinners. A bridal often tends to make a man with inches: and one less he makes a bolt of it, he may find himself ere long without a bit in his mouth.

ECONOMY IN DRESS.—Never buy embroidered braces that are dearer than plain ones. 'Tis blind vanity to sport invisible braces.

LACONIC LOVE LETTERS.

DEAREST,—If that word is a mistake, throw this note in the fire. Eternal folly, result of last night's dance. Cab waiting 11.30; train starts at 12; back to-night. No answer sufficient reply to your rejected.—JOHN SMOKY.

MISS SMOKY is at a loss to express the embarrassment which she experienced on reading Mr. Short's note.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS

CHAPTER C.

DUST TO DUST.

THE evening papers of the next day were full of the dreadful news. They said they were deeply shocked to announce that a dreadful fate had befallen the whole city in the crime which had mysteriously deprived his constituency and his country of the services of the young, talented, promising representative, whose opening career had seemed to be in every way so auspicious. By what foul play he had been made way with was a matter for the strictest legal investigation, and the honor of the country demanded that the perpetrators of such an atrocious tragedy should be brought to condign punishment.

The morning papers followed next day with fuller details of the awful event. Some of the more enterprising had diagrams of the shop, the blind, the large yellow barrels that held the liquor pare as imported, the bench, the counter, and the spot (marked O) where the officer had found the body. In parlors, in banks, in groceries, and liquor-shops, in lawyers' rooms and insurance offices, the murder was the chief topic of conversation for a day. Then came the report of the inquest. The little liquor-seller was the only material witness. Some men he did not know (he swore to it) had been drinking in his shop. Another person whom he had never seen, respectably dressed, but evidently excited with liquor (he swore to it), came in, and after a little while there was a quarrel. He tried to stop it. He remembered his very words. He said, "Time to go home. Time to go home." But they would not stop. They began to fight. He was frightened and ran to the door. Then came the testimony of the watchmen—the finding the body—the calling the doctor.

Doctor James Greenwich was called. He testified that he was summoned about three o'clock in the morning, hurried out, and saw the body on the bench. Examined it carefully; but life was extinct. Nobody knew what to do, but he suggested looking at the handkerchief.

At this point the young Doctor's voice suddened. "I looked at it and saw a name which I knew. Then looking steadfastly at the face, I recognized a man whom I had once known as a school-boy. It was the body of Abel Newt."

There was no clew to the murderers. The eager, thirsty-eyed crowd of men and women and children, crushing and hanging about the shop, gradually loosened their gaze. The jury returned that the deceased Abel Newt came to his death by the hands of some person or persons unknown. The shop was closed, officers were left in charge, and the body was borne away.

General Belch was in his office reading the morning paper when Mr. William Condor entered. They shook hands. Upon the General's fat face there was an expression of horror and perplexity, but Mr. Condor was perfectly calm.

"What an awful thing!" said Belch, as the other sat down before the fire.

"Frightful," said Mr. Condor, placidly, as he lighted a cigar, "but not surprising."

"Who do you suppose did it?" asked the General.

"Impossible to tell. A drunken brawl, with its natural consequences; that's all."

"Yes, I know; but it's awful."

"Providential."

"What do you mean?"

"Abel Newt would have made mince-meat of you and me and the rest of us if he had lived. That's what I mean," replied Mr. Condor, unruffled and lightly whiffing the smoke. "But it's necessary to draw some resolutions to offer in the committee, and I've brought them with me. You know there's a special meeting called to take notice of this deplorable event, and you must present them. Shall I read them?"

"Yes, do."

Mr. Condor drew a piece of paper from his pocket, and, unfolding his cigar in one hand and whiffing at intervals, read:

"Whereas our late associate and valued friend, Abel Newt, has been suddenly removed from this world, in the prime of his life and the height of his usefulness, by the hand of an inscrutable but all-wise Providence, to whose behests we desire always to bow in humble resignation; and

"Whereas, it is eminently proper that those to whom great public trusts have been confided should by their example evince their sense of the solemn responsibilities which these fellow-citizens should not pass away without some signal expression of the profound sense of bereavement which those fellow-citizens entertain; and

"Whereas we represent that portion of the community with whom the lamented deceased peculiarly sympathized; therefore be it resolved by the General Committee,

"First, That this melancholy event impressively teaches the solemn truth that in the midst of life we are in death;

"Second, That in the brilliant talents, the rare accomplishments, the deep sagacity, the unswerving allegiance to party which so eminently characterized our dear departed brother and associate, we recognize the qualities which would have rendered the progress of his career as triumphant as its opening was auspicious;

"Third, That while we humble ourselves before the mysterious will of a merciful Providence as man works, we tender our most respectful and profound sympathy to the afflicted relatives and friends of the deceased, and will most fervently pray that his memory may be as a lamp to the feet;

"Fourth, That we will attend his funeral in a body; that we will wear crape upon the left arm for thirty days; and that a copy of these resolutions, signed by the officers of the Committee, shall be presented to his family."

"I think that'll do," said Mr. Condor, resuming his cigar, and laying the paper upon the table.

"Just the thing," said General Belch. "Just the thing. You know the Grant has passed and been approved?"

"Yes: so Ele wrote me," returned Mr. Condor.

"Condor," continued the General, "I've had enough of it. I'm going to back out. I'd rather sweep the streets."

General Belch spoke emphatically, and his friend turned toward him with a pleasant smile.

"Can you make so much in any other way?"

"Perhaps not. But I'd rather make less, and more comfortably."

"I find it perfectly comfortable," replied William Condor. "You take it too hard. You ought to manage it with less friction. The point is, to avoid friction. If you undertake to deal with men, you ought to understand just what they are."

Mr. Condor smoked serenely, and General Belch looked at his slim, clean figure, and his calm face, with curious admiration.

"By-the-by," said Condor, "when you introduce the resolutions, I shall second them with a few remarks."

And he did so. At the meeting of the Committee he was endorsed with a perfect impressive and pertinent words.

"Gratitude," he said, "is instinctive in the human breast. Men are base, well, or promises well, it is natural to regard him with interest and affection. The fidelity of our deceased brother is worthy of our most affectionate admiration and imitation. If you ask me whether he had faults, I answer that he was a man, and who is without sin, let him cast the first stone."

On the same day the Honorable B. J. Ele rose in his place in Congress to announce the calamity in which the whole country shared, and to move an adjournment in respect for the memory of his late colleague; "a man endeared to us all by the urbanity of his deportment and his social graces; but to me especially, by the kindness of his heart and the readiness of his sympathy."

Abel Newt was buried from his father's house. There were not many gathered at the service in the small, plain rooms. Fanny Dinks was there, subdued and saddened—the friend now of Hope Wayne, and of Amy, her Uncle Lawrence's wife. Alfred was there, solemnized and frightened. The office of Lawrence Newt & Co. was closed, and the partners and the clerks all stood together around the coffin. Abel's mother, shrouded in black, sat in a corner of the room, nervously sobbing. Abel's father, sitting in his chair, his white hair hanging upon his shoulders, looked curiously at all the people, while his bony fingers played upon his knees, and he said nothing.

During all the solemn course of the service, from the gracious words, "I am the resurrection and the life," to the final Amen which was breathed out of the depth of many a soul there, the old man's eyes did not turn from the clergyman. But when, after a few moments of perfect silence, two or three men entered quietly and rapidly, and, lifting the coffin, began to bear it softly out of the room, the old man looked troubled and surprised, and glanced vaguely and inquiringly from one person to another, until, as it was passing out of the door, his face was covered with a piteous look of appeal; he half-rose from his chair, and reached out toward the door, with the thin white fingers clutching in the air; but Hope Wayne took the wasted hands in hers, placed her arm behind him gently, and tenderly pressed him back into the chair. The old man raised his eyes to her as she stood by him, and holding one of her hands in one of his, the spectral calmness returned into his face; while, beating his thin knee with the other hand, he said, in the old way, as the body of his son was borne out of his house, "Riches have wings! riches have wings!" But still he held Hope Wayne's hand, and from time to time raised his eyes to her face.

CHAPTER CI.

UNDER THE MISLETOE.

THE hand which held that of old Boniface Newt was never placed in that of any younger man, except for the moment; but the heart that warmed the hand henceforward held all the world.

We have come to the last page, patient and gentle reader, and the girl we saw sitting, long ago, upon the lawn and walking in the garden of Pinewood is our friend indeed! Yes, and we shall close the book, and still she will be Hope Wayne!

How could we help it? How could a faithful chronicler but tell his story as it is? It is not at his will that heroes marry and heroines are given in marriage. He merely watches events and records results; but the inevitable laws of human life are hidden in God's grace beyond his ken.

There is Arthur Merlin painting pictures to this day, and every year with greater beauty and wider recognition. He wears the same velvet coat of many buttons—or its successor in the form, and cons it carefully through the tube of his closed hand; still lays down the pallet and, lighting a cigar, throws himself into the same easy chair, hanging one leg over the chair arm and gazing, as he swings his foot, at something which does not seem to be in the room. Cheerful and kind as her gossip declares that Arthur "has had some affair."

What Mrs. Toxer suspects perhaps other people suspect, but nobody knows, and she is so old that she may be confounding some experiences of her own youth with her speculations upon his. Nor is the painter conscious of any gaping, unhealed wound that perpetually bleeds. There are nights in midsummer when, coming from his window, he thinks of many things, and among others, of a picture he once painted of the legend of Lancelot. He smiles to think that, at the time, he half persuaded himself that he might be Endymion, yet the feeling with which he smiles is of pity and wonder rather than of regret.

At Thanksgiving dinners, at Christmas parties, at New Year and Twelfth Night festivals, no guest is gay and useful, so inventive and delightful, as Arthur Merlin the painter. Just as Aunt Winnifred has abandoned her theory it has become true, and all the girls do seem to love the man who respects them as much as the younger men do with whom they nightly dance in winter. He romps with the children, has a perfectly regulated and triumphant sliding-scale of gifts and attentions; and only this Christmas, although he is now—well, Aunt Winnifred has locked up the family Bible and begins to talk of Arthur as a young man—yet only this Christmas, at Lawrence Newt's family party, at which, so nimbly did they run round, it was almost impossible to compute the actual number of Newt, and Wynne, and Bennet children—Arthur Merlin brought in, during the evening, with an air of profound secrecy, something covered with a large handkerchief. Of course there could be no pence, and no blindman's-buff, no stagecoach, no twirling the platter, and no snap-dragon, until the mystery was revealed. The whole crowd of short frocks and trowsers, and bright ribbons and curls and curls, swarmed around the painter until he displayed a green branch.

A pair of tiny feet, carrying a pair of great blue eyes and a head of golden curls, scampered across the floor to Lawrence Newt.

"Oh, papa, what is that green thing with little berries on it?"

"That's a misletoe bough, little Hope."

"But, papa, what's it for?"

The painter was already telling the children what it was for; and when he had hung it up over the folding doors such a bubbling chorus of laughter and merry shrieks followed, there was such a dragging of little girls in white muslin by little boys in blue velvet, and such smacking and kissing and happy confusion, that the little Hope's curiosity was immediately relieved. Of all the ingenious inventions of their friend the painter, this of the misletoe was certainly the most transcendent.

But when Arthur Merlin himself joined the romp, and, chasing Hope Wayne through the lovely crowd of shouting girls and boys, finally caught her and led her to the middle of the room and dropped on one knee and kissed her hand under the misletoe, then the delight burst all bounds; and as Hope Wayne's bright, beautiful face glanced merrily around the room—bright and beautiful, although she is young no longer—she saw that the elders were sharing with the children, and that Lawrence Newt and his wife and his niece Fanny, and papa and mamma Wynne, and Bennet, were all clapping their hands and laughing.

She laughed too, and Arthur Merlin laughed; and when Ellen Bennet's oldest daughter (of whom there are certain sly reports, in which her name is coupled with that of her cousin Edward, May Newt's oldest son) sat down to the piano and played a Virginia reel, it was Arthur Merlin who handed out Hope Wayne with great gravity, and stepped about and bowed around so solemnly, that little Hope Newt, sitting upon her papa's knee and resting her golden curls among his gray hair, laughed all the time, and wished that Christmas came every day in the year, and that she might always see Mr. Arthur Merlin dancing with dear Aunt Hope.

When the dance was over and the panting children were resting, Colonel Newt, Lawrence's youngest boy, said to Arthur,

"Mr. Merlin, what game shall we play now? What game do you like best?"

"The game of life, my boy," replied Arthur, looking at him kindly.

"Is life a game, father?" said Gabriel, turning to Lawrence Newt, with a look of surprise.

"My son," replied Lawrence, tenderly, "you must wait for your own experience to answer that question."

Patient and gentle reader, if life be a game, it is for you to say who among all the players we have been watching held Trumps.

GILMORE'S NARRATIVE—Concluded.

III.

A WEEK passed, after my return to London, without the receipt of any communication from Miss Halcombe.

On the eighth day, a letter in her handwriting was placed among the other letters on my desk.

It announced that Sir Percival Glyde had been definitely accepted, and that the marriage was to take place, as he had originally desired, before the end of the year. In all probability the ceremony would be performed during the last fortnight in December. Miss Fairlie's twenty-first birthday was late in March. She would, therefore, by this arrangement, become Sir Percival's wife about three months before she was of age.

I ought not to have been surprised, I ought not to have been sorry; but I was surprised and sorry, nevertheless. Some little disappointment, caused by the unsatisfactory shortness of Miss Halcombe's letter, mingled itself with these feelings, and contributed its share toward upsetting my serenity for the day. In six lines my correspondent announced the proposed marriage; in three more she told me that Sir Percival had left Cumberland to return to his home in Hampshire; and in two concluding sentences she informed me, first, that Laura was sadly in want of change and cheerful society; secondly, that she had resolved to try the effect of some such change forthwith, by taking her sister away with her on a visit to certain old friends in Yorkshire. There the letter ended, without a word to explain what the circumstances were which had decided Miss Fairlie to accept Sir Percival Glyde in one short week from the time when I had last seen her.

At a later period the cause of this sudden determination was fully explained to me. It is not my business to relate it imperfectly on hearsay evidence. The circumstances came within the personal experience of Miss Halcombe; and when her narrative succeeds mine, she will describe them in every particular, exactly as they happened. In the mean time, the plain duty for me to perform—before I, in my turn, lay down my pen and withdraw from the story—is to relate the one remaining event connected with Miss Fairlie's proposed marriage at which I was concerned, namely, the drawing of the settlement.

It is impossible to refer intelligibly to this document, without first entering into certain particulars in relation to the bride's pecuniary affairs. I will try to make my explanation briefly and plainly, and to keep it free from professional obscurities and technicalities. The matter is of the utmost importance. I warn all readers of these lines that Miss Fairlie's inheritance is a very serious part of Miss Fairlie's story; and that Mr. Gilmore's experience, in this particular, must be their experience also, if they wish to understand the narratives which are yet to come.

Miss Fairlie's expectations, then, were of a two-fold kind: comprising her possible inheritance of real property, or land, when her uncle died, and her absolute inheritance of personal property, or money, when she came of age.

Let us take the land first.

In the time of Miss Fairlie's paternal grandfather (whom we will call Mr. Fairlie the elder) the entailed succession to the Limmeridge estate stood thus:

Mr. Fairlie the elder died and left three sons—Philip, Frederick, and Arthur. As eldest son, Philip succeeded to the estate. He died without leaving a son, the property went to the second brother, Frederick. And if Frederick died also without leaving a son, the property went to the third brother, Arthur.

As events turned out, Mr. Philip Fairlie died, leaving an only daughter, the Laura of this story; and the estate, in consequence, went, in the course of law, to the second brother, Frederick, a single man. The third brother, Arthur, had died many years before the decease of Philip, leaving a son and a daughter. The son, at the age of eighteen, was drowned at Oxford. His death left Laura, the daughter of Mr. Philip Fairlie, presumptive heiress to the estate, subject to every chance of succeeding to it, in the ordinary course of nature, on her uncle Frederick's death, if the said Frederick died without leaving male issue.

Except in the event, then, of Mr. Frederick Fairlie's marrying and having an heir (the two very last things in the world that he was likely to do), his niece, Laura, would have the property on his death; provided it must be remembered, nothing more than a life-interest in it. If she died single, or died childless, the estate would revert to her cousin Magdalen, the daughter of Mr. Arthur Fairlie. If she married, with a proper settlement—or, in other words, with the settlement I meant to make for her—the income from the estate (a good three thousand a year) would, during her lifetime, be at her own disposal. If she died before her husband, he would naturally expect to be left in the enjoyment of the income, for his lifetime. If she had a son, that son would be the heir, to the exclusion of her cousin Magdalen. Thus Sir Percival's prospects in marrying Miss Fairlie (so far as his wife's expectations from real property were concerned) promised him these two advantages, on Mr. Frederick Fairlie's death: First, the use of three thousand a year (by his wife's permission, while she lived, and, if his son ruled, on her death, if he survived her); and, secondly, the inheritance of Limmeridge for his son, if he had one.

So much for the landed property, and for the disposal of the income from it, on the occasion of Miss Fairlie's marriage. Thus far no difficulty or difference of opinion on the lady's settlement was at all likely to arise between Sir Percival's lawyer and myself.

The personal estate, or, in other words, the money to which Miss Fairlie would become entitled on reaching the age of twenty-one years, is the next point to consider.

This part of her inheritance was, in itself, a comfortable little fortune. It was derived under her father's will, and it amounted to the sum of twenty thousand pounds. Besides this, she had a life-interest in ten thousand pounds more; which never amount we were to pay for decency to her aunt Eleanor, her father's only sister. It was necessary to assist the family arrangements before the reader in the clearest possible light, if I stop here for a moment to explain why the lady was supposed to be waiting for her legacy until the death of the niece.

Mr. Philip Fairlie had lived on excellent terms with his sister Eleanor, and had remained such a single woman. But when her marriage took place, somewhat late in life, and when that marriage united her to a certain Baronet Fosco—or, rather, to an Italian nobleman, seeing that he rejoiced in the title of Count—Mr. Fairlie disapproved of the connection so strongly that he ceased to hold any communication with her, and even went the length of striking her name out of his will. This violent conduct on the family all thought this serious manifestation of resentment at his sister's marriage more or less unreasonable. The Count, though not a rich man, was not a penniless adventurer either. He had a small, but sufficient income of his own; he had lived much in England; and he held an excellent position in society. These considerations, however, availed nothing with Mr. Fairlie. In many of his opinions he was an Englishman of the old school; and he hated a foreigner, root and soul, because he was a foreigner. The utmost that he could be prevailed on to do, in after years, mainly at Miss Fairlie's intercession, was to restore his sister's name to its former place in his will, but to keep her waiting for her legacy by giving the income of the money to his daughter, and not the money itself, if her aunt died before her, to her cousin Magdalen. Considering the relative ages of the two ladies, and the necessity, in the ordinary course of nature, of receiving the ten thousand pounds, was thus rendered doubtful in the extreme; and Miss Halcombe resented her brother's treatment of her, as unjustly as usual in such cases, by refusing to see her niece, and declining to believe that Miss Fairlie's intercessions had ever been exerted to restore her name to Mr. Fairlie's will.

Such was the history of the ten thousand pounds. Here again no difficulty could arise with Sir Percival's legal adviser. The income would be the wife's disposal, and the principal would go to her aunt or her cousin on her death.

All preliminary explanations being now cleared out of the way, I come, at last, to the real knot of the case—the twenty thousand pounds.

This sum was absolutely Miss Fairlie's own, on her completing her twenty-first year; and the whole future disposition of it depended, in the first instance, on the conditions I could obtain for her in her marriage settlement. The other clauses contained in that document were of a formal kind, and need not be recited here. But the clause relating to the money is too important to be passed over. A few lines will be sufficient to give the necessary abstract of it.

My stipulation in regard to the twenty thousand pounds was simply this: The whole amount was to be settled so as to give the income to the lady for her life; power to her, if Sir Percival for his life; and the principal to the children of the marriage. In default of issue, the principal was to be disposed of as the lady might by her will direct, for which purpose I reserved to her the right of making a will. The effect of these conditions may be thus summed up: If Lady Glyde died without leaving children, her half-sister, Miss Halcombe, and any other relatives or friends whom she might be anxious to benefit, would, on her husband's death, divide among them such shares of her money as she desired them to have. If, on the other hand, she died leaving children, then their interest, naturally and necessarily, superseded all other interests whatsoever. This was the clause; and no one who reads it can fail, I think, to agree with me that it meted out equal justice to all parties.

We shall see how my proposals were met on the husband's side.

At the time when Miss Halcombe's letter reached me I was even more busily occupied than usual. But I contrived to make leisure for the settlement. I had drawn it, and had sent it for approval to Sir Percival's solicitor, in less than a week from the time when Miss Halcombe had informed me of the proposed marriage.

After a lapse of two days the document was returned to me, with the notes and remarks of the baronet's lawyer. His objections, in general, proved to be of the most trifling and technical kind, relating to the clause relating to the twenty thousand pounds. Against this there were double lines drawn in red ink, and the following words were pencilled to them:

"Not admisible. The principal to go to Sir Percival Glyde, in the event of his surviving Lady Glyde, and there being no issue."

That is to say, the sum forming the twenty thousand pounds was to go to Miss Halcombe, or to any other relative or friend of Lady Glyde's. The whole money, if she left no children, was to slip into the pockets of her husband.

The answer I wrote to this audacious proposal was as short and sharp as I could make it:

"MY DEAR SIR,—I maintain clause number so-and-so exactly as it stands. Yours truly."

The rejoinder came back in a quarter of an hour:

"MY DEAR SIR,—I maintain the note in red ink exactly as it stands. Yours truly."

In the detestable slang of the day we were now both "at a dead lock," and nothing was left for it but to refer to our clients on either side.

As matters stood, my client—Miss Fairlie had having completed her twenty-first year—was her guardian, Mr. Frederick Fairlie. I wrote by that day's post, and put the case before him exactly as it stood; not only urging every argument I could think of to induce him to maintain the clause as I had drawn it, but stating to him plainly the necessary motive which was at the bottom of the opposition to his proposal—the necessity of Sir Percival's life. The knowledge of Sir Percival's affairs which I necessarily gained when the provisions of the deed on the same hand submitted in due course to my examination had but too plainly informed me that the debts on his estate were enormous, and that his income, though nominally a large one, was, virtually, for a man in his position, next to nothing. The want of ready money was the pressing necessity of Sir Percival's existence; and his lawyer's note on the clause in the settlement was nothing but the frankly selfish expression of it.

Mr. Fairlie's answer reached me by return of post, and proved to be wandering and irrelevant in the extreme. Turned into plain English, it practically expressed itself to this effect: "Would dear Gilmore be so very obliging as not to worry his friend and client about such a trifle as a remote contingency? Was it likely that a young lady of twenty-one would die before a man of forty-five, and not without children? On the other hand, in such a humiliating world as this, was it possible to overestimate the value of peace and quietness? If those two heavenly blessings were offered in exchange for such an earthly trifle as a remote chance of twenty thousand pounds, was it not a fair bargain? Surely, yes. Then why not make it?"

I threw the letter away from me in disgust. Just as I had fluttered to the ground there was a knock at my door, and Sir Percival's solicitor, Mr. Merriman, was shown in. There are many varieties of sharp practitioners in this world, but I think the hardest of all to deal with are the men who overreach you under the disguise of smoothness and bonhomie. A fat, well-fed, smiling, friendly man of business is of all parties to a bargain the most hopeless to deal with. Mr. Merriman was one of this class.

"And how is good Mr. Gilmore?" he began, all in a glow with the warmth of his own amiability. "Glad to see you, Sir, in such excellent health. I was passing your door, and I thought I would look in, in case you might have something to say to me. Do—now pray do let us settle this little difference of ours by word of mouth, if we can! Have you heard from your client yet?"

"Yes. Have you heard from yours?"

"My dear, good Sir, I wish I had heard from him to any purpose—I wish, with all my heart, the responsibility were off my shoulders; but he won't take it off. 'Merriman, I leave details to you. Do what you think right for my interests, and consider me as having personally withdrawn from the business until it is all over.' Those were Sir Percival's words a fortnight ago; and all I ever got from him to do now is to repeat them. I am not a hard man, Mr. Gilmore, as you know. Personally and privately, I do assure you, I should like to see the spouse out that mate of mine at this very moment. But if Sir Percival won't go into the matter, if Sir Percival will blindly leave all his interests in my sole care, what course can I possibly take except the course of asserting them? My hands are bound —don't you see, my dear Sir?—my hands are bound."

"You maintain your note on the clause, then, to the letter?" I said.

"Yes—decue take it! I have no other alternative." He walked to the fire-place and warmed himself, humming the fag-end of a tune in a rich, convivial bass voice. "What does your side say?" he went on; "now pray tell me —what does your side say?"

I was ashamed to tell him. I attempted to gain time—nay, I did worse. My legal instincts got the better of me, and I even tried to bargain.

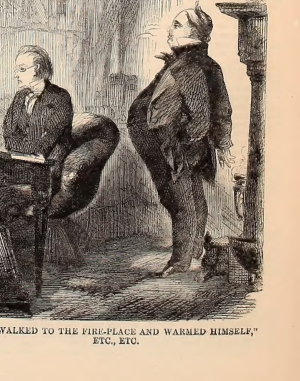
"Twenty thousand pounds is rather a large sum to be given up by the lady's friends at two days' notice," I said.

"Very true," replied Mr. Merriman, looking down thoughtfully at his boots. "Properly put, Sir—most properly put!"

"A compromise, recognizing the interests of the lady's family as well as the interests of the husband might not, perhaps, have frightened my client quite so much," I went on. "Come! come! this contingency resolves itself into a matter of bargaining after all. What is the least you will take?"

"The least we will take," said Mr. Merriman, "is nineteen thousand pounds—nineteen thousand—nineteen thousand pounds—nineteen hundred—ninety-nine pounds—nineteen shillings—and-eleven-pence-three-farthings. Ha! ha! ha! Excuse me, Mr. Gilmore. I must have my little joke."

"Little enough!" I remarked. "The joke is just worth the odd farthing in point of value."



Mr. Merriman was delighted. He laughed over my retort till the room rang again. I was not half so good-humored over it. I came back to business, and closed the interview.

"This is Friday," I said. "Give us till Tuesday next for our final answer."

"By all means," replied Mr. Merriman. "Longer, my dear Sir, if you like." He took up his hat to go, and then addressed me again. "By-the-way," he said, "your clients in Cumberland have not heard any thing more of the woman who wrote the anonymous letter, have they?"

"Nothing more," I answered. "Have you found no trace of her?"

"Not yet," said my legal friend. "But we don't despair. Sir Percival has his suspicions that Somebody is keeping her in hiding, and we are having that Somebody watched."

"HE WALKED TO THE FIRE-PLACE AND WARMED HIMSELF," ETC., ETC.

"You mean the old woman who was with her in Cumberland?" I said.

"Quite another party, Sir," answered Mr. Herriman. "We don't happen to have laid hands on the old woman yet. Our Somebody is a man. We have got him close under our eyes here in London; and we strongly suspect he had something to do with helping her in the first instance to escape from the Asylum. Sir Percival wrote to question him at once; but I said, 'No. Questioning him will only put him on his guard with him, and wait.' We shall see what happens. A dangerous woman to be at large, Mr. Gilmore; nobody knows what she may do or who she may wish good-morning, Sir. On Tuesday next I shall hope for the pleasure of hearing from you." He smiled amiably, and went out.

My mind had been rather absent during the latter part of the conversation with my legal friend. I was so anxious about the matter of the settlement that I had little attention to give to any other subject; and the moment I was left alone again I began to think over what my next proceeding ought to be.

In the case of any other client I should have acted on my instincts, however personally distasteful to me, and have given up the point, about the twenty thousand pounds on the spot. But I could not act with this business-like indifference toward Miss Fairlie. I had an honest feeling of affection and admiration for her. I considered gratefully that her father had been the kindest patron and friend to me that ever man had; I had felt revered her, while I was drawing the settlement, as I might have felt, if I had not been a old bachelor, toward a daughter of my own; and I was determined to spare no personal sacrifice in her service and where her interests were concerned. Writing a second letter to Mr. Fairlie was not to be thought of; it would only be giving him a second opportunity of slipping through my fingers. Seeing him was personally remonstrating with him might possibly be of more use. The next day was Saturday. I determined to take a return ticket, and pay all old loves and leave Cumberland, on the chance of persuading him to adopt the just, the independent, and the honorable course. It was a poor chance enough, no doubt; but when I had tried it my conscience would be at ease. I should then have done all that a man in my position could do to serve the interests of my old friend's only child.

The weather on Saturday was beautiful—a west wind and bright sun. Having felt latterly a return of that fullness and oppression of the head against which my doctor warned me so seriously more than two years since, I resolved to take the opportunity of getting a little extra exercise, by walking my box before me, and walking to the terminus in Euston Square. As I came out into Holborn a gentleman, walking by rapidly, crossed and spoke to me. It was Mr. Walter Hartright.

If he had not been the first to greet me I should certainly have passed him. He was so changed that I hardly knew him again. His face looked pale and haggard—his manner was hurried and uncertain—and his dress, which I remembered as neat and gentlemanlike when I saw him at Limmeridge, was so slovenly now that I should really have been ashamed of the appearance of it on one of my own clerks.

"Have you been long back from Cumberland?" he asked. "I heard from Miss Halcombe lately. I am aware that Sir Percival Glyde's explanation has been considered satisfactory. Will the marriage take place soon? Do you happen to know, Mr. Gilmore?"

He spoke so fast, and crowded his questions together so abruptly and confusedly, that I could hardly follow him. However accidentally intimate he might have been with the family at Limmeridge, I could not see that he had any right to expect information on their private affairs; and I resolved to drop him as easily as might be, on the subject of Miss Fairlie's marriage.

"Time will show, Mr. Hartright," I said—"time will show. I dare say if we look out for the marriage in the papers we shall not be far wrong." And, by noticing it—by at once trying to see you not looking so well as you were when we last met.

A momentary nervous contraction quivered about his lips and eyes, and made me half reproach myself for having answered him in such a significantly guarded manner.

"I had no right to ask about her marriage," he said, bitterly. "I must wait to see it in the newspapers, like other people. Yes," he went on, before I could make any apologies, "I have not been well lately. I want a change of scene and occupation. You have a large circle of acquaintance, Mr. Gilmore. If you should hear of any expedition on which which may be to want of draughtsman, and if you have no friend of your own who can take advantage of the opportunity, I should feel greatly obliged by your letting me know of it. I can answer for my testimonials being satisfactory; and I don't care where I go, what the climate is, or how long I am away." He looked about him while he said this at the throng of strangers passing us by on the street, with a strange, suspicious manner, as if he thought that some of them might be watching us.

If I hear of any thing of the kind I will not fail to mention it," I said; and then added, so as not to keep him altogether at arm's-length on the subject of the Fairlies, "I am going down to Limmeridge to-day, on business. Miss Halcombe and Miss Fairlie are away, just now, on a visit to some friends in Yorkshire."

His eyes brightened, and he seemed about to say something in answer; but the same momentary nervous spasm crossed his face again. He took my hand, pressed it hard, and disappeared among the crowd, without saying another word. Though he was little more than a stranger to me I waited for a moment, looking after him almost with a feeling of regret. I had gained, in my profession, sufficient experience of young men to know what the outward signs and tokens were of their beginning to go wrong; and, when I resumed my walk to the railway, I am sorry to say I felt more than doubtful about Mr. Hartright's future.

IV.

Leaving by an early train I got to Limmeridge in time for dinner. The house was oppressively empty and dull. I had expected that good Mrs. Vesey would have been company for me in the absence of the young ladies; but she was confined to her room by a cold. The servants were so surprised at seeing me that they hurried and bustled absurdly, and made all sorts of annoying mistakes. Even the butler, who was old enough to have known better, brought me a bottle of port that was corked. The dull faces of Mr. Fairlie's health were just as usual; and when I sent up a message to announce my arrival, I was told that he was asleep. All this left me the next morning, but that the sudden news of my appearance had prostrated him with palpitations for the rest of the evening. The wind howled dismally all night, and strange cracking and groaning noises sounded here, there, and everywhere. I myself, having slept as wretchedly as possible; and got up, in a mighty bad humor, to breakfast by myself the next morning.

At ten o'clock I was conducted to Mr. Fairlie's apartments. He was in his usual room, his usual chair, and his usual dressing-gown, and of mind and body. When I went in his valet was standing before him, holding up for inspection a heavy fur cloak, as long and as broad as my office writing-desk. The miserable foreigner grinned in the most abject manner, and shivered visibly with fatigue, while his master composedly turned over the etchings and brought their hideous beauties to light with the help of a magnifying glass.

"You very best of good old friends," said Mr. Fairlie, leaning back in his chair, when I had shut at my—"you are quite well? How nice of you to come here and see me in my solitude. Dear Gilmore!"

I had expected that the valet would be dismissed when I appeared; but nothing of the sort happened. He was left in the room at his master's chair, trembling under the weight of the etchings; and there Mr. Fairlie sat severely twirling the shivering glass between his white fingers and thumbs.

"I have come to speak to you on a very important matter, Sir," I said, "or I should never force excuse me if I suggest that we had better be alone."

The unfortunate valet looked at me gratefully. Mr. Fairlie faintly repeated my last three words, "better be alone," with every appearance of the utmost possible astonishment.

I was in no humor for trifling, and I resolved to make him understand what I meant.

"If you please," I said, "I will ask your permission to withdraw," I said, pointing to the valet.

Mr. Fairlie arched his eyebrows, and passed up his lips, without speaking.

"Man?" he repeated. "You provoking old Gilmore, what can you possibly mean by calling him a man? He is nothing of the sort. He might have been a man half an hour ago before I wanted my clothes brushed; but he is not a man half an hour hence, when I don't want them any longer. At present he is simply a port-folio stand. Why object, Gilmore, to a port-folio stand?"

"I do object. For the third time, Mr. Fairlie, I beg that we may be alone."

My tone and manner left him no alternative but to comply with my request. He looked at the servant and pointed peevishly to a chair at his side.

"Put down the etchings and go away," he said. "Take the fur cloak with you, Louis. Have you, or have you not, lost my place? Are you sure you have not? And have you put my hand-kerchief within my reach? Yes? Then why the devil don't you go?"

The valet went out. Mr. Fairlie carefully selected a pinch of his chief, passed the magnifying glass with his delicate cambric handkerchief, and indulged himself in a sidelong inspection of the open volume of etchings. I was not easy to keep my temper under these circumstances, but I did keep it.

"I have come here at great personal inconvenience," I said, "to serve the interests of your niece, and of your family. And I have established some slight claim to be favored with your attention in return."

Mr. Fairlie closed the etchings, and, laying back helplessly in the chair, closed his eyes. "Please don't bully me. I'm not strong enough."

I was determined not to let him provoke me for Laura Fairlie's sake.

"Only a quarter," I went on, "is to entreat you to reconsider your letter, and not to force me to abandon the just rights of your niece, and of the gentleman who is to be her husband, in the case to you once more, and for the last time."

Mr. Fairlie shook his head, and sighed pitcously.

"This is heartless of you, Gilmore—very heartless," he said. "Never mind; go on."

I put all the points to him carefully; I set the matter before him in every conceivable light. He lay back in the chair, the whole time I was speaking, with his eyes closed. When I had done he opened them indolently, took his silver writing-book from the table, and sniffed at it with an air of gentle relish.

"Good Gilmore!" he said, between the sniffs, "how very nice this is of you! How you reconcile one to human nature!"

Give me a plain answer or a plain question, Mr. Fairlie. I tell you again, Sir Percival Glyde has no shadow of a claim to expect more than the income of the money. The money itself, if your niece has no children, ought to be under her control, and to return to her family. If you stand firm Sir Percival must give way—he must give way, I tell you, or he exposes himself to the base imputation of marrying Miss Fairlie on entirely unworthy pretenses."

Mr. Fairlie shook the silver smelling-bottle at me playfully.

"You dear old Gilmore; how you do hate rank and family, don't you? How you detest Sir Percival, because he happens to be a baronet. What a Radical you are—oh, dear me, what a Radical you are!"

A Radical! I could put up with a great deal of provocation, but, after holding the soundest Conservative principles all my life, I could not put up with being called a Radical. My blood boiled at it—I started out of my chair—I was speechless with indignation.

"I should like to know," cried Mr. Fairlie—"for Heaven's sake, don't shake the room! Worthies of all possible Gilmores, I meant no harm. I only said you were extremely liberal that I think I am a Radical myself. Yes. We are a pair of Radicals. Please don't be angry. Sit down again. I haven't a stimulus enough. Shall we drop the subject? Yes. Come and look at these sweet etchings. You are teach you to understand the heavenly cearliness of these lines. Do, now; there's a good Gilmore!"

While he was maundering on in this way, I was, fortunately for my own self-respect, returning to my seat. When I spoke again I was composed enough to treat his impertinence with the silent contempt that it deserved.

"You are wasting time, Sir," I said, "in supposing that I speak from any prejudice against Sir Percival Glyde. I may regret that he has no unexceptionable claim to distinction by reason of his lawyer's direction, as to make any appeal to himself impossible; but I am not prejudiced against him. Any one who said would equally apply to any other man in his situation, high or low. The principle I maintain is a recognized principle in all courts. If you were to apply, at the nearest town here, to the first respectable practitioner you could find, he would tell you, as I tell you, that I will not act as friend. He would inform you that it is against all rule to abandon the lady's money entirely to the man she marries, in the event of decline, on grounds of common legal caution, to give the husband, under any circumstances whatever, an interest of twenty thousand pounds in the event of the wife's death."

"Would he really, Gilmore?" said Mr. Fairlie. "If I am the very thing half so horrid, I do assure you I should tinkle my bell for Louis, and have him sent out of the house immediately."

"You shall not irritate me, Mr. Fairlie—for your niece's sake, and for your father's sake, you shall not irritate me. You shall take the whole responsibility of this disreputable settlement on your own shoulders, or you shall not have mine."

"Don't—now please don't!" said Mr. Fairlie. "Think how precious your time is, Gilmore, and don't throw it away. I really cannot put with you if I could, but I can't—I haven't stamina enough. You want to upset me, to upset yourself, to upset Louis, and to upset Laura—and—oh, dear me!—all for the sake of the very last thing in the world that is likely to happen. Now, dear Gilmore, for the sake of peace and quietness, positively No!"

"I am to understand, then, that you hold by the determination expressed in your letter?"

"Yes, please. So glad we understand each other at last. Sit down again—do!"

I waited a little longer; and Mr. Fairlie resignedly "tinkled" his hand-bell. Before I left the room I turned round and addressed him for the last time.

"Whatever happens in the future, Sir," I said, "remember that my plain duty of warning you has been performed. As the faithful friend and servant of your family, I tell you, at parting, that you have taken a step which the wisest man any man alive under such a settlement as you are forcing me to make for Miss Fairlie."

The door opened as I spoke, and the valet stood waiting on the threshold.

"Louis," said Mr. Fairlie, "show Mr. Gilmore out, and bring me back and hold up my sketchings for me again. Make them give you a good lunch down stairs—do, Gilmore, make my kills beasts of servants give you a good lunch."

I was too much disgusted to reply; I turned on my heel, and left him in silence. There was an up-train at two o'clock in the afternoon, and by that train I returned to London.

On the Tuesday I sent in the altered settlement, which practically disinherited the very persons whom Miss Fairlie's own lips had informed me she was most anxious to benefit. I had no choice. Another lawyer would have drawn up the deed if I had refused to undertake it.

My task is done. My personal share in the events of the family story extends no farther than the point which I have just reached. Other pens than mine will describe the strange circumstances which are now shortly to follow. Seriously and sorrowfully I close this brief record. Seriously and sorrowfully I repeat here the parting words that I spoke at Limmeridge House—No daughter of mine should have been married to any man alive under such a settlement as I was compelled to make for Laura Fairlie.

LITERARY.

Miss Martha Haines Butt, of Virginia, has published her "Leisure Moments," to which we lately alluded. It appears to be a charming book, and will no doubt be widely read. Few ladies in the country have so many admirers as the beautiful and talented Miss Butt.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, Jan. 9, in the Senate, a speech against the Admiral claim was made by Senator Dixon, after which Senator Lemmon spoke in favor of the claim, and declared that he could not support Senator Douglas for the Presidency. ——In the House there was little speech-making. Three ballots for Speaker were had, 219 voting each time, requiring 110 members for a choice. Lee each ballot Mr. Sherman secured 105, Mr. Hamilton 88, and Mr. Gilmer declined from 13 to 15. The roll was muttering.

On Tuesday, 10th, in the Senate, Senator Green resumed the position of Senator Douglas, charging him with inconsistency. The Senate went into executive session and then adjourned. ——In the House, the Slavery question and the Helper book were discussed at length by Messrs. Gartrell, Hickin, Morris, and Edwards. No ballot was taken.

On Wednesday, 11th, in the Senate, Hon. Morton J. Wilkinson, the Senator recently elected in Minnesota, for six years, commenced on the 4th of March, 1859, appeared and was sworn in. Senator Green subsequently resumed his remarks on the territorial question, overturning the position of Senator Douglas and was followed by Senator Pugh, of Ohio, in reply to the remarks of Senator Iverson. Senator Pugh early gave way to an executive session—In the House, speeches on the Speakership and the Slavery question were made by Messrs. Scranton, Campbell, etc., after which a vote for Speaker was had, 111 being necessary to a choice. Mr. Sherman received 105, Mr. Hamilton 91, Mr. Gilmer 29, scattering 13. A second ballot was ordered. Some vacancies were made by Messrs. Clark, Allen and others, after which the vote was taken. The ballot resulted, Mr. Sherman 109, Mr. Hamilton 91, Mr. Gilmer 29, Mr. Davis, of Indiana, 8, scattering 7. Necessary to a choice 111. The ballot was declared void.

On Thursday, 12th, in the Senate, an exciting debate took place on Senator Pugh's resolutions. Messrs. Seabrook Pugh, Douglas, Davis, Green, and Clay participated. Senator Douglas made the explanation of his letter. ——In the House, after a personal explanation between Messrs. Sherman and Hamilton, a discussion arose on Mr. Clark's resolution in reference to the Helper book, and a number of amendments and speeches were made by members. An altercation took place between Messrs. Hickin and Gilmer, which was with difficulty kept in a gentlemanly tone. The call of the House was ordered, and all ended quietly.

On Friday, 13th, the Senate not being in session, in the House Mr. Smith spoke in favor of Mr. Clark's resolutions, and in condemnation of the Helper book. He was responded to by Mr. Bingham. A general discussion then ensued, when Mr. Etheridge moved the adoption of the plurality rule on the vote for Speaker, to take effect on Monday next. Several speeches were then noted, but no question was taken, and the House adjourned.

MESSAGE OF GOVERNOR LETCHER, OF VIRGINIA.

Governor Letcher's Message was delivered to the Legislature of Virginia on the 4th inst. It opens by alluding to the happy tranquility of an earlier period of the republic, which has been interrupted by the interference of the citizens of the Northern States with the rights and institutions of the South. The Massachusetts Personal Liberty Bill, and perhaps other States, legislation has been employed to defeat the execution of the Fugitive Slave Law within their limits.

It is cheerfully conceded that the true interest of the citizens of the North are loyal to the Constitution and Union; but it is not to be disguised that a large number are indifferent to both, and are hostile to the extention of the slave territory and slave States. This unfriendly state of things originated in the resistance by Northern people of the Constitution. He suggests that a convention of all the States be assembled in Philadelphia and five conference be had, to ascertain if the questions in controversy cannot be settled on some basis mutually satisfactory to both sections. If the difference be irreconcilable, let the people of each State in convention be discussed. He recommends the Legislature to adopt resolutions in favor of calling such a convention as is provided in the fifth article of the Constitution, and appeal to the Legislatures of the several States to unite in the application proposed to be made to Congress in pursuance of the provisions of this article, that the slave-trade fail or refuse to unite in the application, it will furnish conclusive evidence that a determined purpose exists to keep up the agitation. If the convention meet, and the question can be settled, he is confident that the friends of evidence equally conclusive. He also suggests that a committee of two of our most experienced statesmen be appointed to visit the Legislatures of those States which have passed the Personal Liberty enactment for the Fugitive Slave Act, and insist, in the name of Virginia, upon their unconditional repeal. The Governor thinks the new reached a point which demands a speedy settlement if the Union is to be preserved. Virginia does not ask to be told that honor, patriotism, and duty enjoins toward its present condition. Nevertheless, it is for them to be prepared, and the Governor recommends the revision of the militia law, the purchase of arms and munitions, that brigades of minute-men be organized, and that the Military Institute be established. He also recommends the fostering of direct trade with Europe, manufactures, and the encouragement of the completion of the internal improvements of the State.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF WISCONSIN.

The Annual Message of Governor Randall of Wisconsin was delivered to the Legislature of that State on 10th inst. The financial condition of the State is in a prosperous condition. The Slavery question is discussed at length. The Governor thinks that there is no sufficient view of the various questions involved in that subject. He favors an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which will allow to the people of the several States the right to regulate, prohibit, or abolish slavery, as they may deem expedient. He also recommends the fostering of direct trade with Europe, manufactures, and the encouragement of the completion of the internal improvements of the State.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF KANSAS.

The Territorial Legislature of Kansas, on the 3d inst., passed the bill to abolish Slavery in that Territory. It is stated that it was expected Governor Black, the Administration Executive of the Territory, would veto it.

DEMOCRATIC CONVENTIONS.

The Kentucky Democratic Convention terminated its sessions last week. The extreme Pro-Slavery resolutions reported by the majority of the Committee were adopted, and a resolution proposing a reaffirmation of the Cincinnati Platform was voted down. On Tuesday, the Administration Democrats of Illinois met in Convention at Springfield. The resolutions endorsed Douglas's sovereignty, applaud the Administration, and indorse its views upon the Slavery question. The Democracy of Indiana assembled on Wednesday at Indianapolis. After a severe struggle the Douglas faction was successful in placing one of its number in the Chair, preliminary to permanent organization. The Alabama Convention was also in session on Wednesday. The proceedings were extremely turbulent, the ultraists, controlled by Mr. Yancey, continuing ruling the Convention—the object, so far as the temporary organization was concerned, they succeeded in effecting.

WHAT JOHN BROWN COST VIRGINIA.

A letter from Richmond, Virginia, says: "From a rough estimate formed by a gentleman high in official authority in this State, the cost of the transportation of troops, arms, and ammunition to and from Harper's Ferry during the late excitement will amount to about $50,000. This estimate is founded upon an assumption of the fact that the railroad companies would charge the State but half fare—half the usual rate for full fare—for transportation. I understand a great deal of clamour has been practised in the Old Dominion in the disaffected local. Every man who could appear in a military overcoat, whether licensed or otherwise, and could muster a rifle, assisted to Charlestown. This trick is understood to have been very successfully practised during the whole period of the Harper's Ferry émeute and the excitement at Charlestown.

"The average cost of each man's rations per day during the stay of the military at Charlestown was reckoned by the same authority at 1s¾d cents. The other estimates, it is unfortunate, will be in part dependent upon this basis."

UNION MEETING AT ALBANY.

A very large meeting, called to express the devotion of the citizens to the Union, and their aversion to the new unhappy design, was held at Albany on the 12th. The outer hall of the Capitol—the Assembly Hall being found to permit its chamber to be used for the purpose—was crowded in its utmost capacity, and additional room necessarily extended. Mr. Garret Y. Lansing was selected as Chairman, and a speech upon the subject having been completed, Mr. Henry J. Raymond was called for, and spoke at some length upon the recent agitation throughout the South, in its pre-est egitated state, of the substantial unanimity of the Southern sentiment, and of the general disposition to interfere with their peculiar institution when proclaimed by fact. Ex-Governor Seward followed Mr. Raymond in a speech of great eloquence; and a series of resolutions vigorous resolutions were passed.

EXECUTION OF THE MURDERER MADDS.

Patrick Madds, who was convicted of the murder of his sister, Mrs. Turbett, at Newark, New Jersey, on the 25th of May last, by shooting her with a pistol, was executed on the 12th inst. in the Essex County jail at Newark. The prisoner made a speech upon the scaffold, which, for recklessness, incoherency, and blasphemy, has scarcely been equalled. The execution was witnessed by about three hundred persons.

CENTRAL MARRIAGE.

The Boston Traveller tells the story of the marriage of a dentist of that city with a lady medium, his wonderful matrimonial experiences, and the ultimate desertion of that affinity after eighteen months. The dentist was intolerably tedious for years ago, in a lady whom he subsequently deserted her and gone to Kansas, since which she had taken up the profession of spiritual manifestation. She was fair and attractive, and admiration of her spiritual gifts operated with her personal charms to overcome the bachelor's heart. Besides, the spirits told them they were made for each other, and they were married in accordance to the heavenly voice. They were married, but the honeymoon had hardly begun to wane when the spirits subject to strange trances, during which she would pull her bonnet off, scratch her hair, and otherwise disorder her toilet, and consequently when he was in bed, and exposed and unbecoming. When she was accused of the trance she was full of regrets at what had happened. At the bidding of the spirits he took her with him to Texas, where she proclaimed him an Abolitionist, and he narrowly escaped violence at the hands of a mob. When they got back, the spiritual persecutions continuing, and the spirits demanding that his sufferings of mind, body, and estate were greater than he could bear, suggested a separation, and obtained it by mutual consent. After the separation the woman confessed that she had imposed upon him from first to last, that the spirits were feigned, that she beat and scratched him because she wanted to, and that all the spiritual messages he had received were of her own manufacture.

DRANK HIMSELF TO DEATH FOR TEN DOLLARS.

Silas Wing, says the New Haven Journal and Courier, last week, in company with Thomas M'Gwinn, entered the distillery of Keeler & Co., corner of Fleet and Water streets, early Saturday evening. M'Gwinn asked Wing to bet he would not drink. He was answered that Wing, which some one of the number present remarked he might as well offer to bet he would go to bed, as the effect was connected. Wing, who is said to have been a temperate man, then said he could drink a quart, and a quart wine without feeling it. M'Gwinn then offered to bet ten silver half dollars (which could not do it) that the wager was made. Wines commenced upon his wine by drinking a quart after quart, until he reached the eighth, when those who had furnished it refused him any more, and left the room. Numbers were present, but any man at one time. Wine then sat down on a bench near the stove for about ten minutes, when he suddenly fell backward on the floor, apparently helpless. He was immediately thrown out, and died about eleven o'clock, totally unconscious. Dr. Jewett was called, and held a post-mortem examination of the body, and pronounced before the jury that he found the remains of Wine in a perfectly healthful condition, and that he was not known to came to his death from apoplexy, produced by drinking too much Wine.

PERSONAL.

The President has nominated Hon. J. K. Faulkner, of Virginia, Minister to France.

We read in the Comercio of Lagunyra, Venezuela: "Yesterday Miss Ellis Smith, daughter of the American Consul, Andrew J. Smith, Esq., died in this city. In the short space of eight days this gentleman has lost two daughters, and his only son is at present very seriously ill. We most sincerely sympathise with Mr. Smith in his afflictions. Five American ships lying in the harbor lowered their halfmast in testimony of sympathy."

The sea has since died.

Richard Frost, the Secretary of State under Governor Brown's "Provisional Government," is on his way to Washington with Austin, Preston, and Stanton.

"The Hon. Morton S. Wilkinson has been speaking a few days recently after the severe labors of the late Fall campaign and preparing for Congressional duties. He was born in Annandale, in this county, and is the son of the late Alfred Wilkinson, a sterling Democrat, and the nephew of the late Governor of this State. He is six feet three inches in height, with a high forehead and large brain, and will be forty-one years old on the 23 i of January. He is a lawyer, and has been in the Underwood & Stannard law office and established a firm in this State. He moved to Minnesota in 1853, and has lived for a time in Rice's Rapids till 1857, when he went to St. Paul, which has been his home till a year ago last Fall, when he went to Winona, a hundred miles southwest from that town."

As the Hon. Stephen H. Phillips, the Attorney-General of Massachusetts, was walking in Washington-Street, in Boston, on Monday, he slipped upon the icy side-walk and fell heavily upon his right knee, by reason of the bone of which the knee-cap was broken. Dr. Gay set the limb soon after, and Mr. Phillips was quickly conveyed in the Supreme Court, but as he suffered considerable pain he was excused from attendance and returned home. It will be recollected that a similar accident occurred to the late Attorney-General Hallett only a few weeks since.

The New York correspondent of the Boston Journal thus makes history of an evening incident in a matrimony-goods palace on Broadway:

"In one of our large dry-goods houses, at the close of the year, an affair happened not to the usual routine of trade. A number of clerks were discharged. It is the rule of the house to give no reasons whatever. Two of the clerks applied for one. It was refused. Twelve guineas was required, and the money was paid in full-faith service, and on the fact that the applicant was about to remove to Boston. The money was not refunded, with the demand to 'be gone.' The excited clerk, not having the fear of his master, nor the sense of the weight the fare before his eyes, 'pitched into' the astounded dry-goods man, and thrashed him in the most vigorous style. The fellow was arrested, and was bailed again, when the excited clerk was arrested for assault. He was thought to have any public or legal notice taken of the affray. The police are investigating the affair. Yesterday, though the affair created a profound 'impression' in the 'dry-goods' of the season."

That Hurlford Press says that Brackett, the sculptor, has had letters from Her Majesty's Government, and has been commissioned from that State for copies of his bust of John Bunyan.

The following good story is told of Washington at the time, Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, was the time when several of the Anti-Lecompton men voted for Mr. Gilmer, of North Carolina, one of the conservative Democrats approached Mr. Stevens, saying he was very much surprised that that man should have voted for Mr. Gilmer, who owned nearly "a hundred head of niggers." "Does he?" said Mr. Stevens, "I did not know it before for him myself, for it is your little one-headed nigger men who make all the trouble."

ENGLISH NEWS.

ENGLAND.

DEATH OF A FAMOUS BELLE.

The Court Circular announces the sudden, among the obituary of the week, the death of a Mrs. Anne Willoughby. The Lady Willoughby formerly the beautiful and celebrated Anne Rodbertis, formerly Maid of Honour to the Princess of Wales, was noisily in love. It is due to her memory that this announcement should be accompanied by Royal Highness to compromise her honor. Some singular circumstances of her life may be recalled. She was married to marriage by the Duke of B——— for his own purposes, and when the Duke of B——— had accomplished her to bestow her hand upon himself, backing him out by an offer of a large pecuniary sum to purchase assent, etc. The young lady, wavering and somewhat perplexed between the two offers, was about to make her acceptance, requested Lady Jersey to give her advice on the single point. Lady Jersey, who considered it unwise to consult her heart upon the occasion, but St. Nicholas, who was the richer man, replied, "Why, the Duke is undoubtedly supposed to be, but whether when sleeping or waking, I cannot say." The lady accordingly married the Duke after Miss Rodbertis met Mr. Henry Wallingford, then the handsomest man in town, and the two fell desperately in love, and in due course they were married. Mr. Wallingford attended the Duke, and he has survived him for his long term of forty-nine years."

THE QUEEN'S GOLDEN WEDDING.

The golden bestowed which was lately presented to the Queen, and conveyed to Windsor Castle under the charge of Colonel Wemyss, R.E., was received by Mr. Phillips, solicitor of her Majesty, at the conversazione of the Greek Street Institution. A few days beforehand attended, and may be supposed, immense interest and attention, and, as the decoration of the hall was of a magnificent kind, seems to merit commendation from the beauty of its workmanship as much as from the richness of its value. The shield, and the carpet on which it stands, are valued at £10,000.

A LADY RUNS OFF WITH HER FOOTMAN.

The correspondent of the Manchester Guardian says: "A rather romantic affair has been the talk of the gossips on clubs and drawing-rooms for the last few days—if I may so call it. Gossiping is the business of the week now found its way into the London Times. There can, therefore, be no further reason for withholding from the facts in connection with the case. The lady in question is the daughter of Sir Edward Antrobus, and she has for she had a fortune of nearly £15,000 a year, absolutely unfettered by any will. She was considered the handsomest girl woman in England. All this fortune she is now free to squander as she likes, and squander, I also foresee, the fortunate Buckley whom she has chosen for the partner of this flight. Buckley is a footman who has always taken the first steps for obtaining a divorce, but such is the power of wealth and influence that the Ecclesiastical Court Court that his attention has been informed (I am told) that Buckley has been in the habit of writing to the case can be brought to issue. Meanwhile, the affair is a nice one to be largely discussed in fashionable circles—so-well and widely known for its philanthropic activity as well as its wealth."

WOULDN'T MARRY A MAN IN DIRTY BOOTS.

A curious termination of an intended marriage took place lately at Halifax. On that day Henry Greaves, of Mount Tabor, and Mary Mitchell, of Gibbet Street, in that town, had arranged to be married at the parish church. The wedding party met before the ceremony at the house of the bride's father, and proceeded in a hackney coach to the church. When they had arrived at the inn window of the coach, the bridegroom was seen with the intended husband for not having his shoes cleaned. They, however, still pursued the journey, but shocked was she on going into the church at finding that company with the dirty boots that she renewed her complaints, and setting at defiance all remonstrances, left the church and refused to be married. Dinner had been provided for sixteen and tea for twenty. After the return of the wedding party, the proprietor of the premises to be borne by each party named a further topic of dispute, as the disappointed bridegroom refused to pay anything unless he had the trap, which cost him the whole sum. The bridegroom, it is said, has commenced an action against the bride.

FRANCE.

THE POPE WON'T GO TO CONGRESS.

The Pope refuses to be represented in the Paris Congress. The following letter from his Holiness has been published "Le Pape et le Congres" he denied by Napoleon.

A BEE ON DIPLOMATIC SCENT.

A letter from Paris says: It is an acknowledged fact that the Marquis de Moustier, in his position of French ambassador, has successfully contributed to the fall of Sebastopol on the 8th September, 1855. Your readers will remember the mission of that vast pile, one of the royal yachts, in the palace of Sans Souci, was found to have been left behind in the hall of receiving the dispatch boxes and taking out the contents. A few days after that occurrence appeared the greatest sensation in Germany and Europe in general, the fallacious servants of Napoleon. Among the many reasons given him in performing the valuable papers were sentenced to eight years' penal servitude, one of the number of high treason. (In the political world it was no secret, even at that time, that the disposition in question had been stolen at the instigation of a diplomatist of high standing, and that the Marquis de Moustier had made a position to transmit their contents to the Emperor Napoleon. The same was subsequently confirmed by the Count Munster, the then military ambassador of Prussia, at the court of Napoleon III. The Count Munster communicated in them with respect to the fortifications of Sebastopol, and the position of the Russian fortifications in general, enabled the French commander to select for his point of attack the one where even which the Crimean stronghold could be taken."

A VALUABLE DIAMOND.

A letter from Paris says: The arrival of the Bombay mail come hither a Mr. Asoum, having for sale a considerable number of diamonds, some of them of extraordinary for size and importance. He has disposed of a few, but the greater number remain. The £18,000, an uncut brilliant, of unusual magnitude, he has refused to sell for £20,000, although he says he has received as high as £220,000, which if he can't get in Paris, he carries the stone to London, and sells it there. Mr. Asoum's diggings in Lucknow, and some other favorite hidden localities, during the anxiety and confusion.

A TAILOR SEWED UP.

An amusing story is told in the Courrier de Lyons. A Sheriff's officer went to call on a tailor. The man of the law has grey at work in his shop, and, as he was unknown to him, a person can be apprehended in his own house. The officer, on entering the shop, was not at first particularly an intention of issuing forth, so the former hit upon the following trick to get rid of the bailiff. He stooped down, and arranged that one of them should pretend to be the owner of the house, and that the other should run after him, crying "Stop! stop! he has stolen my cloth." The thought he was really robbed of his commentaries, and ran after the thief. The tailor was thus left alone, but only lost his liberty. He made a pathetic appeal to his daughter, who let him out by the unobserved door.

A TALE OF A BROKEN PITCHER.

We read in a Paris paper: "Every evening, about ten o'clock, a woman comes to her position under the Colonnade, at the corner of the Rue Vivienne, her occupation being to sell water from the fountain, for which purpose, like the daughter of the Danaides, she has a pitcher in her hand. Last night, as the observers a gentleman advancing she quietly placed the pitcher on the ground, and, turning round, broke herself in the neighboring door-way. Owing to this precaution, the pitcher unfortunately falls over and breaks the pitcher, sells his trousers, and, with the money, buys another woman. 'Be more careful another time, then,' says the gentleman, kindly, 'and you will not get a good pitcher.' 'Oh, my good sir,' says the woman, weeping, 'I can indeed sorry that this misfortune has happened to me!' And she would have enough tears to fill another pitcher. The gentleman makes her a present of a franc, and walks away, not so much easily change his inexpressives, and at the same time did not wish to be troubled with breaking her pitcher. At this one was valuable. 'The pitcher,' says the fair Parisian, 'is the only property I possess.' 'Oh, replies he! The gentleman, misled by her distress, puts his hand in his pocket, pulls out his purse, and examines even five francs to the unfortunate woman, who then goes to purchase a new pitcher. The two observers enter gentlemen—and so on to midnight. As there are women who have no pitchers to break, and who live in the streets in Paris, it has given birth to a new species of industry, that of selling pitchers to be broken by broken pitchers."

ELECTROBIOLOGY UNDER A NEW NAME.

The Tribune Paris correspondent writes: "Take any small brightish object, a knife blade, pen-holder, half-sixpence, anything that will reflect a person's eyes, a little within the and above the range of his or (which is best) let her eyes look at it steadily for a time, and it at all thinks of it fixedly, as she must be engaged to do, she will serve to produce somnambulism, or, more unhealthy, and the chances are, that in a space of from one fifteen minutes she will be in a state of the natural sleep, nervous sleep, artificial catalepsy—what you to keep your eyes fixed on the object, and not think of it's seeming true, most of our magnetic sleep—what we have selected for the name of the day. Some have just two feet from the floor, tickle the palms of them, put the eyelids down, and you will be like a pumpkin-pie. Then you will be like a flagstaff, cut off one of them if you please, and you will be as rigid and stiff and fatigue or pain. When you have experimented sufficiently, blow upon her eyes, and she will open gently, if you choose with your fingers, and she will wake up utterly unconscious of all that has passed."

"Here is an invaluable anesthetic method, a relievor of the sufferings of the poor in hospitals and lying patients —a key, it is hoped, for the philosophers to open the mysteries of sleep, and to throw light on the workings, and charlatanism, and superstition, and insanity, and dead spirits, and the second sight of dreamers, or back places, wherever they can prove residence, and let in the daylight of science, and observation, and common sense, and philosophy."

THE SUCCESS IN PARIS.

He adds: "Robert Houdin's visit to Paris now with expert ments in Hypnotism. The above supposed case is the summary of several of the clever phenomena of all the successful experiments. Dr. Broca, an eminent surgeon here, of the Academy of Medicine, Velpeau, who had been set to look into the matter by reading a book of Dr. Braid's, published in England, published in 1845—Dr. Broca, I say, began his experiments last month, and has since made a report to the Academy, which we have been a pulsid operation, on a patient who was utterly unconscious of all it was doing to him, and suffered no natural state. He made a report of his experiment, which Velpeau, one of the greatest and most incredulous laugh old surgeons of the world, consented to read before the Academy of the Sciences. Velpeau is too careful of his great reputation, as well as his candid and cautious a man, to countenance Dr Broca's visit. But the mere fact of his reading it immediately gave its statements a certain authority. Velpeau said to all members of the profession: 'Here, these experiments are respectable men, and the house will not compromise their own little professional dignities and reputations, and run of practice.' A few days after, Velpeau read a new bill mand—Trousseau, Nelaton, and all the lesser and little ones—are setting their private patients and inmates of the hospitals acquiring inwardly, upwardly, and abominably in a catalepsic degree, and to the new title (invented by Braid in 1845) of hypnotism (which is Greek, hypnos, for sleepiness, nothing more), are seriously investigating facts, which, under the old and modern titles of inspiration, enchantments, fascination, spirit-power, witch-power, devil's power, trance, ecstasy, animal magnetism, charlatanism from the time of the old Egyptian priests, down to this month of December and "Professor" Houdin's last visit to the capital of, duping superstitious millions, and driving mad unhappy thousands.

A FRENCH TRAGEDY.

A trial at the assizes of Corrèze has excited considerable sensation. The prisoner, Jean Lafarge, was the technical accused of the murder of his daughter, by the infliction of a wound in the head, with a hatchet, by which severed the skull. Of the facts there could be no doubt, but the issue was whether Lafarge had the "presence him" Not Guilty." It appears that his daughter had been very much in the habit of committing suicide. When circumstances rendered it to appear to be possible, she attempted, but without the result of violation. An inquiry was instituted, which showed that the child had died by the hand of her father, and that the truth, to her parents, hoping for their forgiveness. In the course of the investigation, Lafarge's father, a man of high honor, the strictest integrity, and unimpeachable veracity, was called into a box to give evidence on finding the dishonor of his family. Some hopes, however, were entertained that the testimony of the witness would have effaced the recollection of what had occurred; but the prisoner's counsel refused to do the old gentleman mercy of the father, who attempted suicide by hanging, but was cut down in time to save his life, and was led to bed. The prisoner, when she found her father. He, in a state of excitement, left the instrument which was near him, and with it attacked and killed his child. He was found guilty of manslaughter, and, on his own acknowledged what he had done, which was the result of a moment of frenzy, and that his family was not about to be borne. The mayor of the village having been called upon to give his opinion as to the character, spoke of him in the highest terms, describing the family as one of the most honorable and respected in the district. Amidst the tears of the audience the verdict of non culpable was returned, and the prisoner restored to his father with expressions of tenderness and warm feeling.

ITALY.

AN ENGLISHMAN IN TROUBLE

The Paris correspondent of the Morning Post contains a letter from Naples, dated December 10, which says: "The Marquis of Normanby, Major and Mrs. Hunter, at Naples, on the 8th instant, was riding on horseback at the head of his troop, when he encountered a funeral mass. He was smoking his cigar, which is not allowed at that moment, and on the procession approached him and ordered him to put away the cigar. The gentleman refused, and was then arrested and imprisoned. The gendarmes then, with his bayonet, attempted to force the cigar from his mouth. Major and Mrs. Hunter rescued the Englishman horsewhipped him. The gendarme was then arrested, and the Major and Mrs. Hunter, with money, seriously wounded him. Doctors Strange and Gamble attended the wounded man. The case, it appears, is dangerous, and may result mortally. Mr. Major's conduct was undoubtedly in the right, and a little to English."

SPAIN.

ACCOUCHEMENT OF THE QUEEN.

At latest dates there was nothing of importance respecting the health of the Queen (Isabella) of Spain. The Queen of Spain has been safely delivered of a princess.

THE WAR WITH MOROCCO.

The war between the Spaniards and the Moors appears to be carried out in the spirit of extermination. The Spaniards have taken no prisoners since their first engagement, and give no quarter and giving none. There has been a great deal of fighting, and as many of the principal Spanish regiments have been engaged, it is decided to have another letter from Algeciras contains this paragraph: "The Moors are now in the vicinity of Tetuan, and the other reserves surrounded, and had the opportunity of the enemy, and the Spaniards have the approach of their enemies, deliberately aimed and fired upon them with good effect. The Moors are now in their desti-bolos." The Spaniards, in twenty days, have lost 2,000 men, principally from the effects of the climate, and the further loss. The letter adds, "The Spanish troops display excellent spirit, and are in the most decided advantages to sustain it in presence of the many hardships they are called on to suffer."

AUSTRIA.

PROSPECTS OF ANOTHER REVOLT IN HUNGARY.

Intelligence from Vienna, by the last mail, is unimportant, another revolt in Hungary. A letter from the Hungarian capital, by way of Paris, says that the country is in a state bordering monstrous outrage: "While a Protestant meeting was being held in the house of a Protestant of the Imperial patent, a multitude of Roman Catholics, who had been attending a grand Mass in the Cathedral post Kisfaludy, assembled outside the place of meeting to show their disapprobation of the Protestant Religion. They were afterward a body of infantry and cavalry, with fixed bayonets, and dispersed the crowd. Many were wounded in the crowd, and dispersed it in a very brutal fashion. The Protestants were not the aggressors in the beginning of the disturbance, and they had not even been summoned to disperse. The Protestant Superintendent of the Pest district's game we shall be greatly surprised. Most people now entertain his opinion of the Haynbarge.

RUSSIA.

AN ANTEDILUVIAN FROG.

We translate from the Gazette de Heidelsberg another of the wonders of science. The following puzzled naturalists so long:

"The search for the foundations of a gasometer a live frog was found at the depth of fifteen feet, and at about the same depth a piece of wood was found. The frog had no mouth, or rather his mouth was hermetically sealed by the growth of the skin, and he was quite blind. Although his eyes were wide open, he appeared to be blind. He was placed in a glass vessel filled with air, but his vitality and vivacity increased gradually at to became perfectly active. He lived for about a year. The last time I first seen his skin was spotted with red; after a few hours the spots changed from red to yellow."

CHINA.

APPRECIATION TO THE UNITED STATES.

Advices from China state that the Government of the empire had by no means forgotten the services of the threatened war between China and England and France. The Viceroy of Canton, Yeh, has written with eight hundred coolies, had been lost in the China Sea.

JAPAN.

THE EMBASSY TO THE UNITED STATES.

Late advices from Japan contain official notice from the Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs to the effect that the native embassy to Washington would embark on the Pawhatan on the 4th of February, and that the Sandwich Islands to Panama, and thence to Washington by railroad. The Japanese envoy would number in all seventy persons. An increasing trade was going on between San Francisco and the Japanese ports.

ST. DOMINGO.

TROUBLE WITH EUROPEAN POWERS.

Letters from St. Domingo City, written on the 12th ult., state that a European force, consisting of ten French, one British, and one Spanish vessels of war, lay before the city. The object of the visit of the fleet was, immediately to force the existing government to recognize the immense amounts of which it was indebted to which President Boze floated the county in 1858—58.

THE FASHION FOR 1860.

PATERFAMILIAS. "Good Heavens, Mrs. J., are you going a masquerading?"

MRS. J. "No, my dear, 'tis only the new fashion. You have been going on so long about hoops that I thought I would try how you liked this sort of thing. So come, Jones, come out for a walk."

YOUNG AMERICA.

CLARA. "What were you saying to uncle, Alfred?"
ALFRED. "Oh! I was only saying that if they'd get up a cavalry squadron in our town, I'd find a man and horse."

ALFRED. "Oh, if you please, uncle, we want to play at William Tell: do you mind standing with the apple on your head while we shoot?"

A MERRY CHRISTMAS.

A BEETLE came out of its hiding-place and looked at him. A spider crawled up his leg and examined it; but he did not move. He sat alone in his lodging, a dark, sombre man. In the room beneath there were sounds of merriment, and he had caught, as he mounted the stairs, the flutter of dresses in the hall; and a murmur of children's voices and laughter had reached him; so he shut the door close that he might hear nothing.

On the table was a tray with an inflated cup and saucer and a toast-pot, and a little kettle on the hob kept bursting into wheezy snatches of song, to remind him that it was there waiting. But the dark man's head leaned on his hands, his hands on his knees, and his great black shadow darkened the wall behind. The little spirits that had been hurrying to and fro among the red coals came out and looked at him, but were not stirred. They perched upon his chair and upon his knee; they gathered in solemn conclave upon the hearth—

"There was a Christmas fire not so long ago," began a little spirit, nodding solemnly at the kettle, "very different from this. We were there, for we are the spirits of the Christmas fire. How it leaped and crackled in the grate, and sent out a jolly red-hot glow all round the room! How it shone out on wreaths of evergreens, and its dancing lights kissed the red berries on the walls! And little feet daintily shod came in upon the oak floor; bright faces laughed back at the jolly fire, and there was sweet music and dancing and merriment. He was there, and he had singled out his partner from among the merry ones. Close at her side he kept through the dance, the song, and the game, and thought,her pretty hand was tenta little, and her manner quieter than the rest, as it seemed to like it too. There was a world of happiness—half, alas! of half trusting—in her young face, as beautiful as it was gentle.

"But when the music was heard no longer, and the dusky figures danced to dance upon the oak floor; when the jolly fire had sunk a little lower —nothing to be compared with that bit of rubbish though—and his partner came back from the floor-way timidly. There were sounds of supper in a distant room; but they wanted no supper, these two; they seated alone by the friendly fire, and the gentle one trembled a little, with a flush on her cheek deeper, perhaps, than fire or dancing could call forth. But he—that dark, sombre man—held her hand in his, and he put on her finger, tenderly, a glistening ring. We were there, we saw it, and we wished them 'A Merry Christmas!'"

Then all the little spirits clapped their hands and chanted again, "A Merry Christmas!"

Then there was a mourning sound among the little spirits, and another took up the tale.

"There was a Christmas tho not so long ago," he began, sorrowfully, "which shone upon the same oak floor, and lighted up wreaths of the same evergreens, and heard the same merriment. But it was clouded. No light footstep trod the floor, no gentle one stood by the friendly fire, but other sounds were heard.

"He was there, then, passion on his face, and rage in his heart; and, cut opposite to him—white and angry too—his only brother.

"'You have dared'—cried out the dark man—'you have dared to set your miserable foot across my path—to take away that which was dearer to me than life—to steal from me that which was mine faithfully and—'

"The pale brother's head was bent, but his words were bitter.

"'You have your secret close. I knew nothing. I dared to love. What sin was there in that?'

"'Puny coward! In my father's house you were ever the tempter. When we were children my very tongue was not my own. Did any dispute arise, I must give up my will to you—the youngest—always! Enough, you were weak. When I left that home, because I could no longer bear the constant bickerings you and your tender sister raised between us, you triumphed. I, the eldest, gave up my birthright and turned out into the world for you. Is the sacrifice never complete? Am I to give up to you my heart's blood—the love of my life? Shall I grovel before you now, and bid you take her and be happy, holding forth the right hand of fellowship? So help me all the passions of my nature—no! Across my father's threshold my foot shall pass never again. I look upon your face no more!'

"'Be it so. Before I go from your presence forever hear me solemnly that mine alone is the folly, mine the love. Hear me say that never, by word or action, has she broken her plighted truth to you. She may have always distrusted—let your vengeance end there.'

"But in that dark man's heart there burned a flame hotter by quench than the hottest fire, and the fuel which fed it was jealousy, distrust, and wrath. When the little figure, once so joyous, stood before him powerful; when she had come troubled face wistfully, and prayed him to say what she had done, why did he not listen? Should he not look to himself how they stood their ordeal on that other Christmas night, and the words that were spoken then? Ah! he did remember, and the thought of that great happiness lost to him forever—for he did not believe her—lent strength to his jealous anger and bitterness to his tongue. He resented her humiliation; he pointed to the hand which tinged her cheek—a blush of shame, not for herself, but for his unmanly suspicion—he called it a witness against her; he discredited her pure truth, for, he said, his eyes had seen her listen to another's words of love. So deceived, he would never trust again; henceforth he should be alone in the world.

"Oh! how could he look into her gentle face and doubt the heart which cried out after him, in its great love, with an exceeding bitter cry, that he would not leave her in anger; that he would come back and recall his harsh words!

"Shall he have a merry Christmas who left the gentle one alone with the reproaches he had heaped upon her—alone on the deserted hearth, to bear her sorrow as she could? He who, when the news reached him that his father was gone away to his place—that his home was broken up—that over his sister and the poor pale brother, fragile from youth, hung the iron hand of poverty—hugged the knowledge to his heart, with the bitter thought that it served them right—shall he have a merry Christmas?

"No, no!" came forth from the little chorus, singers, mournfully. "No Christmas for him—no merry Christmas!"

Then the dark man started to his feet suddenly, and great drops of moisture stood on his forehead, and a look of despair and remorse distorted his features. "Where," he shrieked, "was this Christmas night—what had he been doing?

The little spirits have hurried back among the few remaining embers, and they peep out to see one of them—nothing is to be heard but the heavy breathing of the dark man as he thinks over his dream.

* * * * *

There was another Christmas fire which shone upon the oak floor of which the spirits had talked, and lighted up a few scattered evergreens; but the room was not decked for a merry party; there were no laughing, dancing feet.

On the friendly hearth stands the gentle one; and there too, but not near her, is he who once placed a glistening ring upon her finger and whose barbarous heel had ground it into a shapeless mass on that same hearth-stone. In the shadow he stands, with a heavy heart, and thinks, though he is there to listen to him, his heart fails when he thinks of the past; and he knows not what to say.

"Mary—" he begins, but goes no further, so many words rush to his lips; and she stands there in statue-like attitude, awaiting with cold and tender memory from the past, no hope for the future.

"You sent for me—I am here."

"Oh, Mary!" the master is bended against me, and justly. If words of mine could speak my deep repentance and reasons—if years of penance could make my sorrow known, then, then you could know how I shrink in horror from myself and the thought of what I have done—then I might hope something from you."

Silent still, and statue-like. Oh, memory of that other Christmas, come back and give him hope!

"My brother has forgiven, and my sister, would ask, will you be less merciful?—but that you have more, far more to forgive."

"Through all these weary months," says the listener on the hearth—and his head sinks lower on the cold, dead hearth—"through all these weary months there has been that within which told me you would one day know the wrong you did. Whatever there was of love in my heart, it is forgiven long ago. The ring which you crushed is here. I have kept it for you; will you take it?"

"Oh, Mary, hear me! I implore forgiveness. Your lip says 'Forgiven,' but your voice denies it. Mary—"

But the hand trembles which he takes in his; he sees that her face is pale, and tears are shining in the blue eyes; and her voice trembles, all that cruelty, all those false accusations, have not crushed out from her heart its great love for him.

On the hearth-stone the ring lies, before the friendly fire; into that fire drops the crushed and battered pledge of a broken betrothal; let its memory melt away with it. A great joy has possessed over the sombre face of the dark man; a ray of beauty from hers brightens it as he looks down tenderly upon her and whispers, "Is it a happy Christmas, Mary?"

"It is happy."

Then a bright glow starts up in the old grate, and the two can not hear it, perhaps; but there is a chorus among the little spirits of the Christmas fires, as they shout in their glee, "A new one, "We are here; we see it. A Merry Christmas!"

CANDLEMAS EVE AT CRAIGLEIGH.

CANDLEMAS EVE at Craigleigh was Candlemas Eve and something more. It was Fanny Eglinton's birthday;—one would vouch her eighteenth year; and before another summer has passed over her head she was to become the bride of the heir Captain Leicester Maynard, of the Bengal army, who had just returned from India. Open house was to be kept for only that one day, and in the evening a grand ball was to take place—a ball for old and young. The grown-up people were to have the pleasure of the dance by-and-by, and the little folks were to enjoy themselves, unmolested and unrestrained, in the French drawing-room. The forenoon of the eventful day was already advanced, like an invading army, not only upon the Grange, but also upon the neighboring village. The "Maynard Arms" was full to overflow, and the jolly host who had a lodging to let soon found a tenant in some prudent bachelor who preferred a strange room to a house full of the noise of the Saturnalia.

The old gallery looked splendidly, and as night came on seemed to brighten more and more, as one by one the guests began to drop in. There had been a little confusion attending dressing, especially in the bedrooms, because when lights were assembled all at once by seventeen young ladies, nine mammas, six papas, and ten other persons, there were not enough looking-glasses to supply half the number required. In this emergency wine bottles were pressed into the service, and if an unwary observer had visited the rooms the following morning he would have been bewildered at finding how much claret had been discussed by the young ladies, as evidenced by the number of empty bottles to be seen upon their toilet-tables.

However, if they had had Aladdin's Palace to dress in, and his lamp to dress by, they could scarcely have looked prettier or more elegant than they did—some gliding gracefully over the polished floor, others tripping it coquettishly, as if not liking to stand alone for admiration, but one and all wending their way to the old gallery at length, where Sir Robert had stationed himself to receive his guests.

Some officers of the —— Regiment, with whom Leicester had been garrisoned in India, were among the first arrivals, and then began the hall in earnest. The grim old knights who hung on the walls scowled a darker scowl than ever as the fair young girls flew over the polished floor, and the inspiring music and the merry chatter rose up to the roof, shaking the old banners in their faces. More and more arrivals, fresh revelers, poured in at every moment, and soon the old gallery was full—full of welcome, full of merriment, full of hospitality.

It soon became evident that the notion of keeping the denizens of the two ball-rooms separate was impracticable. What! were the grown people to take no part in the dance, to shut out from the privilege of dancing with the rising belles, and be forbidden to see the conjurer? Perish the thought! Were the mammas to be denied the sentimental honor of dancing with the largest partners they could find? Was a tall Guardsman to carry off Lucky Clara to waltz with him in the picture gallery, and Jack Eglinton not to follow and defy him? Such tyranny would have caused an émeute. No! the old gallery was freely together, and it is hard to say which enjoyed themselves the most.

After supper, when the jaded musicians had retired to have their innings at the good things, Jack Eglinton dragged the grand piano out of a recess in which it had been stowed away, and Fanny (his sister) and Ada Maynard played a waltz for the impatient juveniles. Then some mistletoe was hung on the frame of the great chandelier, under which all the merry dancers paused. Bless their pretty eyes, how they sparkled! Bless their rosy cheeks, how they blushed! There was Jackhandsome, honest Jack Eglinton—great in the reverse, figure up with Lucky Clara in the centre of the room. He had private mistletoe arrangements of his own, and refrained from joining in the ball-room revels. Henry Maynard (Leicester's younger brother) seized a sprig of berries from a vase, and gave the signal. Every available sprig of mistletoe in the room was in instant requisition for a dozen of his friends and school-fellows, and it was soon "turn round," "join lips," "up the middle and down again." Every body kissed his own partner, and Tom Bright (the "funny boy" of the evening, who wore the Knave of Clubs pinned to his coat by his coat, in token of his twelfth cake rank) rushed about, kissing other people's—all but Charley Howard's. Charley was small, and the boys were in my boy's inspiring cause; but he fought like a young lion in defense of pretty Laura Steadman, so Tom was baffled. I fancy Laura must have succeeded with his championship, for Tom was a great favorite. Had he not sung a comic song that had put the whole room in a roar? Had he not delighted the conjurer in one of his cleverest tricks? Poor, brave little Charley! When, half an hour after, he had made formal proposals for the hand of his offended partner upon the strength of his late achievement, he was called a stupid boy, and told to go away! Oh, the ingratitude of woman!

Leicester Maynard went to the piano-forte and chatted with Fanny for a space—dance, gentle Lady Grace—took baby Maude and danced her. What business had she to come bursting the mistletoe barrier with her pretty, perfumed curls, when she knew that her lover—Cecil Deighton, of the Guards—Inkermann Deighton—was looking on, and that no one would dare to take advantage of her tantalizing position? Why did that paddingheaded fellow Clogger go about trying to spoil sport, and to keep the bright wreath out of sight? I hope he got his shins kicked, and I think he did. But these little drawbacks were as a drop of rain compared with the bright wave of merriment that flooded the place, carrying away all unkindly feelings, all stupid restraint, upon the tide.

The night was wearing apace, and so was brought to a conclusion in reasonable time. The last guest departed; the inmates, tired out, sought their beds—all but Leicester Maynard and his friend Deighton, who adjourned to the room of the former to smoke their cigars. A common ancestry had evidently been in the ancient gallery, and the hospitable old house was still.

Neither Leicester nor Deighton had the remotest idea of going to bed, they had so much to talk and think about.

"Leicester," said Deighton, after they had sat for some time puffing away in silence, "what o'clock is it?"

"Only half past four."

"How light the mornings are getting! Is that the sun or the moon shining through the chinks in the shutters?"

"Never mind the sun or the moon, old fellow! How about your own particular star? What have you been doing? Grace been talking about all night? Is it settled at last, eh?"

"Don't chaff?"

"No—but is it?"

"Well, she says so."

"By Jove! I wish you joy," cried Leicester, wringing his friend's hands. "You're the luckiest fellow in the world—next to me."

"And what is it you're doing now?" said Deighton, gravely, gazing into the fire.

"Repeating all your absurd speeches to Fanny. I'll be bound to."

"Do they occupy the same room, then?" Deighton inquired.

"Yes; we are all packed as close as herrings in a cask to-night. They sleep in the west wing, right opposite our window."

"That lights gets stronger and stronger," said the Guardsman, after a pause. "The sun must have risen. I'll open the shutters and see."

"Well, do if you like," Leicester replied, with a yawn.

Deighton unfastened the bar and threw the shutters apart. As he did so a red, lurid glare flashed into the room, and, uttering a cry of anguish, he sprang back and seized his friend by the arm.

The west wing was in one sheet of flame!

The alarm had already been given, and the friends saw by the blaze of the conflagration scores of laborers and servants hurrying from all directions to the scene of the fire. Leicester rushed from the room, followed by Deighton. They tore down the dark stairs, shouting "Fire! fire!" as they descended, until the west wing of Craigleigh could but follow his friend, knowing nothing himself of the intricate corridors and passages that led to that portion of the old house, and when, on dashing open one of the doors, a hot cloud of smoke burst forth in their faces, he lost sight of him for a moment, and a scream of agony was found himself in the entrance-hall, amidst a crowd of terror-stricken women and fainting women.

Fearful must it have been to those young girls —sleeping calmly and happily under the fatigues of their night's enjoyment, penetrating dreams over again some word or look earnest enough to have written itself upon their memories—fearful, indeed, to have their peaceful slumbers disturbed by the terrible cry of "Fire! fire!" No one knew how near it might be. Fire around her, and she in a strange room, the way to escape unknown, which was unknown to her, or in her fear forgotten. Fire! and in her haste to fly she might unwittingly rush into the midst of the blaze! Fire! Ah! baby, when safe herself from danger, was threatening these dear to her, who were still unrescued from the flaming building. "Fire! fire!" Ah! fire! Mothers wildly seeking their children; children who could hardly be restrained from rushing into the flames in search of their parents. Of the fearful scene Leicester Maynard saw but little, for he was rendered nearly powerless on the spot by the overpowering fear that possessed him for one of the west wing. He dashed himself with all his force against the locked door, but it stirred not. He shrieked until his voice failed; no answer! He burst into a room where his father's latter and carpentering men were at work, and, seizing a tool axe, threw himself once more upon the old door, and, between the blows that he rained thick and fast upon it, shouted, "Ada! Ada! Lady Grace! Fire! fire! Fire! fire! It is I, Leicester, who calls; unlock the door. Fire!" There was no answer; but the door began to yield under the axe at the good elbow, and the lock would part from the panel. It was given.

The head of the axe flew off!

With his bare hands Leicester tore away the splintered wood, and the heavy door, wrenching off its hinges in its fall, dropped with a loud crash into the passage.

The great rush of air caused by the falling mass drove back the flames, and the flames and smoke from the staircase beyond; but he had hardly sprung half-way up when they closed behind him, and enveloped him entirely in their arms.

It was then that Leicester heard Deighton's voice calling, as well, chided even, upon Grace to rouse herself and fly to him. Poor fellow, he knew not where to find her. Leicester shouted in return; but that to follow would be impossible, as the staircase was already tottering.

"Ladders and ropes to the window! quick, Deighton!" he cried to it yourself. Is there any chance of saving them. "Leave me here; I will do all that can be done." *

When Lady Grace and Fanny had at last retired to their room they felt as little inclined for sleep as their lovers. Young ladies have generally quite enough to talk about after any late ball almost morning. They chatted on, and never guessed how time had passed till a dull, heavy knocking against the door. They opened door, and a sight burst upon their gaze well calculated to strike terror into bolder hearts than theirs. The house was filled with smoke and flames, while the fearful cry of "Fire!" resounded throughout the house.

Fanny and prompt in any emergency, as soon as she had in some degree calmed the fears of her more timid companion Fanny ran to the head of the flaming staircase and cried for help. Help was nearer than she had hoped, for the next moment Deighton, scarcer, emerging from the smoke, stood by her side.

Fanny was pale as death and fearfully calm. "I had no hopes that you prayed that you were safe," she murmured in her lover's ear, as she paused for a moment in her endeavors to restore Grace to consciousness; "I prayed you are here."

"To save you, darling!"

"Ah! I fear it is to perish with me."

Better so than to live without you. But we are losing precious moments. For the love of life, Lady Grace, don't faint again! Do rouse yourself!" he cried, as his wild agony.

"Hush!" said Fanny; "you are too impetuous. Cecil's Dear Grace," she whispered, gently, "Leicester, we" "we are in great danger. We depend upon each other for safety, under God. We must all be saved, or all—But, please God, we will be saved. Be a brave girl, darling, for Cecil Deighton's sake."

Brave enough. Fanny, with womanly tact, had touched the right chord. There was warrior blood in the gentle patrician's veins, which the name of her lover set in a glow; and the excited, weeping girl of a moment before sprang to her feet, dashed the tears from her eyes, and was ready for any thing.

Leicester then led the two girls into their room, and, closing the door against smoke and flame, threw up the window, sprang upon the outside sill, and shouted to the crowd below to hasten the movements of those who had gone in search of ropes and ladders.

"They are coming! they are coming!" he cried, in a tone of exultation, as though he were watching some frequently-contested race. "Deighton is with them. They have a ladder strong enough to save fifty of us. They are here!—hurrah!—

they are here!" and Leicester almost screamed with joy and excitement. On they came. Let the flames roar, and the old house crumble beneath their fiery tongues. What matter?—his darling would be safe. Oh, the wild joy of giving her existence to her old father's arms!

Up rose the heavy ladder, foot by foot; but, oh, how slowly did it seem to rise, though strong arms and willing hearts were strained to the utmost! Up it rose, till it stood trembling on end in the air. Leicester could hear his own heart beating—he was low kneeled slowly toward the window. It was full twenty feet too short!

A low moan rose up from the crowd collected below. It was echoed into each other's faces, and spoke not. There was a deep silence, broken only by the roaring of the flames and the crashing of falling timbers.

What were Leicester's emotions now? The roaring of the flames became more and more loud; the beams grew suffocatingly hot, while smoke began to creep under the door, and to curl about Fanny and Grace that were kneeling in earnest prayer, as though it were a dim shroud infolding them.

Then it was—when all seemed lost—that the remembrance of a boyish piece of folly flashed across Leicester's throbbing brain. The window in which he stood was the very last on the third story of the west wing. Within two yards of it were the capitals of those Corinthian pillars that ornamented that angle of the house. Beyond them, on the south side, was a ledge, similar to that on the west, near to which was a massive water-spout. Below was a terrace, raised some twenty feet from the ground. Now, the ladder, though far too short to reach the window from the lawn, if placed upon this terrace would come up to a level with the window on the south side of the house; so that, if he could but pass his dear one and Grace round the capitals of the column to the ledge beyond, they would be saved. His mind was made up in a moment. To remain was certain death, for the fire was crackling at the door.

"Do not attempt it! do not attempt it!" cried Deighton, as Leicester shouted to him to place the ladder on the terrace. "You could not pass round, and how can they fly?"

"I have done so for a swallow's nest," cried Leicester, eagerly. "Do as I ask you, man! it is our only chance."

"It is indeed!" cried a voice from the crowd. "God help them! it is indeed!"

Leicester looked down, and saw that the speaker was his father.

There was no difficulty in making the courageous girls understand the plan. The only question that arose between them was who should first brave the danger. The answer soon decided. Fanny was calmly courageous—Grace unnaturally daring. Upon the bravery of one he could depend as sure and steady as fate—not at what moment that of the other might be quelled by the imminent danger. If Fanny passed in safety he would have no fear for Grace. With one hand firmly clasping her little waist, and the other holding on by the corner of the window sill, he drew his head, with their faces to the wall, Leicester and his plighted bride passed inch by inch along the narrow ledge till they gained the capital of the pillars. Here there was a broader footing, and Leicester paused. "Rest a while, darling," he whispered: "we are half round, but the worst half is to come. Five minutes more, and, please God, we shall be safe."

"It would be so sweet," murmured Fanny in response, as he stooped her close to his heart, "to be saved by you: but, oh! I fear! I fear!"

"Fear nothing, my own. Recollect Grace has to follow. Are you ready?"

"Quite—quite ready."

Still holding her firmly with one arm, while part of hers, widely extended, embraced the slippery wall, they shuffled—I know of no other word—round the narrow ridge, rendered doubly slippery by half-melting snow, dislodging the portions of moss and rubbish that had accumulated there, and which at every step they took, making it appear to the breathless spectators as if the narrow path were crumbling beneath their feet. It was a fearful moment, and every movement had life and death in it; every inch brought them nearer to the one or the other. The nerve and trust of the fair girl did not fail her, but, creeping along slowly and surely, as the first part of their transit had been passed, they doubled the angle and gained the terrace front.

Here Leicester had anticipated that all difficulty would have ended; but no. As Deighton stood on the top round of the ladder, his head was not quite on a level with Fanny's waist, as she stood in the recess I have mentioned. The ladder was still seven feet too short. "Lower her with your arms and I will carry her," said Deighton, who was scarcely to be recognized but for his voice. His hair was singed, there was a red burn upon his forehead, and his face was ghastly pale. Leicester trembled, and for a few seconds when she should see him. "No, that will not do; you can see how the weight as you are; go down a few steps and guide her feet as I let her down."

"Now, my darling," said Leicester, "kneel with me; do not be afraid; I have firm hold of you. Now try if you can find the top step of the ladder with one foot; Deighton will guide it—so—there. Now, can you put down the other and stand up? Cling to me, my own fear; that's brave and well: now try the next step; can you reach it?"

"Not as you are holding me," she said.

He smiled as she held from her waist for her arms. She then gained the third step, and he only held her wrist. Clinging to the water-spout, he leaned over the ledge till Fanny had descended far enough to be able to grasp the side of the ladder with her disengaged hand.

"Now, darling, you must release my hold; go down slowly and steadily."

She gently returned his parting pressure, and, with a look of ineffable tenderness, murmured something so softly that he could not catch the sound, but, from the motion of her lips, he formed it into a blessing. Descending slowly, preceded by Cecil Deighton, she looked up all the while, with the same sweet expression on her lips.

She reached the ground in safety, was caught to her old father's heart, and a great shout of joy arose, but was instantly hushed when it was seen that Lady Grace had begun the perilous route so fortunately traversed by her friend. Grace had heard all the directions given by Leicester to Fanny, and acted upon them promptly and silently; but her dress, which was long, caught upon "a bit o', cloing and got caught in the masonry, so that Leicester had to leave her clinging to the wall unsupported for several moments while he disengaged it. They reached the recess, however, in safety, but Grace had not strength left to stand upon the ladder.

"Shut your eyes, Lady Grace," Leicester said, in as gay a tone as he could assume; "shut your eyes; trust to Cecil."

Kneeling as before, holding by the old spout, he lowered the now inanimate form till Deighton could falrly clutch his dress, and hold it fast for of losing his balance. He then rapidly descended the ladder, and Leicester blew from the shoot which then arose that they had reached the ground in safety.

Maynard now rushed forward and clasping to Fanny's rown, and, if the flames had not killed it, to save for her and Lady Grace as many of their little treasures as he could. There was a miniature of the mother of the former, and a bracelet, that she had noticed upon her arm at the ball, and which he determined to save at all events.

Fanny was in Leicester's arms and Fanny's trinkets—as, containing some valuable, old, family jewels. These he had entrusted to a banker, and flung out of the window. He then pocketed every thing of value that he could lay his hands upon, indiscriminately, and was rushing out from a window directly below him, threatening destruction to the ladder, his only hope of safety. There was nothing to be done but to cut away the rope. He did so; sliding, as he had often done when a boy, astride upon the ladder. It was too late. He felt a flash across his eyes—a pain—a blow, and then —nothing!

Then followed a great roar and crash. A myriad of bright sparks shot into the air, and all knew that the roof had fallen in. The flames, which for a moment were smothered beneath the falling rafters, broke forth again with redoubled fury.

But I did not desert those whose story I have to tell. By almost superhuman exertions the fire was confined to the west wing, in which it had originated, and the rest of the old house was saved. But Lord Leicester Maynard, the young Sir Leicester Maynard flickered between life and death. When at last he had recovered from the severe internal injury caused by the fall, he still lay ill in silence and darkness, and only knew by a warm drop that sometimes fell on his brow that one he loved was watching over him. A slight wound he He had been blinded by the flames through the midst of which he had fallen.

One day when Grace had awakened from a sleep, he pressed the little hand that seldom left his grasp, and said, "Guess what I have been dreaming of, dearest. I fancied I missed he, not waiting for a reply, "that I was watching the rebuilding of the west wing that you have been telling me about, and wondering why the room we used to call yours will be where it was before."

"Not exactly, Sir Robert says; but it will be finished exactly in the same manner, so that you will scarcely see any difference."

"I shall see intolerable any difference," replied poor Leicester, somewhat sadly.

"You must not think or speak so mournfully. You know you were patient, dearest, hitherto; be patient a little longer."

"There have been very many 'little longers,' Fanny, but they have always ended as you have promised. No, dear one," he said, "sight has gone forever, and I shall never see your dear face again, save in dreams."

"Listen," whispered she. "As you will look upon the gloomy side of things, I will humor you, and take the same view. I will not say how much, however, have we not much to be thankful for? It is almost a miracle that you were not killed upon the spot where you fell. It is a great God, but human skill should fail in averting this calamity from you, have you not one to share your sorrow, which should be elevated and strengthened, by a minister to your every wish? One whose eyes shall see for you carefully and truly; one whose very being belongs to you? Will not my love abate some part, at least, of the misfortunes you dread?"

Leicester told her that it could not be; that the sacrifice was far too great; that he had thought of this, and dreaded it more than even the fact itself; that he must bear his calamity alone!

"You know not what you are doing," replied Fanny, vehemently; "you know not how fast love changed almost to bitterness. "Is the exercise of a love which the everyday monotony of a cold world chains down fruitless in one's heart a sacrifice? Oh, Leicester! when you cease to love me, speak those words again. Sacrifice! would you—oh! but hush! How wrong I have been, how thoughtless, how selfish! Hush! you must indeed not speak again. I have been sadly imprudent. You must be calm. If you cannot bear to speak, I will go. You must obey me now."

Days and nights were alike to the blind man; but I think it was about every fourth day that a strange step entered his room, and a strange hand removed the bandages, and examined his eyes. The lids were so swollen and blistered by the flames, which had burst forth full in his face, that they had remained closed. On one of those days Leicester felt the lid gently raised, and the great oculist, after a close scrutiny and a lengthened pause, whispered in Fanny's ear, "I wish you joy, young lady; his eyes are safe."

They are perfect! Sir Leicester Maynard may have arrived at the dignity of spectacles a little before his time, and his handsome face have one more lineament to trace upon it; but what of that?

The Lady Grace and Cecil Dayton, Fanny Eglinton and Leicester Maynard, were married on the same day.

PAID FOR YESTERDAY.

THE scene opens in a dentist's room in the West End of London. The dentist was a fashionable dentist, with an exceedingly, what is called, gentlemanly appearance. You might have taken him for a banker, or a lawyer. A carriage drove up to the house, and a lady carefully attired—Westend Costume, and some of those women do look very captivating, she inquired for Mr. Filey. That gentleman made his bow.

"Mr. Filey," she said, "I have come to you once and once." She sighed. Of course Mr. Filey was full of sympathy—in his aspect, at all events.

"Yes," she said, "very sad. You are great in teeth, Mr. Filey. Do you remember me years ago?"

Mr. Filey begged to be excused his forgetfulness, attributing it to his extended practice.

"Ah! I was then younger, Mr. Filey. I am now, as my card will have shown you, Lady Spriggs."

Mr. Filey bowed to the title.

"I have a bill to pay, Filey; the heir to a vast property. He has but one defect—his teeth! Oh! the trouble those teeth have given us! His Obility is much attached to his dentist, and never goes a dentist's shop—I mean house, and we are at our wit's ends what to do with him. Do you think you can, if I call and take him here, Mr. Filey, that you could so manage as to remove one or two of his—I think you call them grinders—without his being aware of it?"

The proposition was rather startling, but Mr. Filey was an old hand, and an able.

He said he thought he could that, if he had the young gentleman there, he would extract the teeth, and he should hardly know any thing of it—so delicate and sudden would be the manipulation—if it was over.

"That will do," said the lady. "You will eternally oblige his family, Mr. Filey, and deeply shall I feel indebted to you, believe me. I will take the liberty of calling to-morrow to arrange, if you please. May I know what it will be?"

She drew forth her purse, and paid the sum Mr. Filey had put down on paper.

Arrangements were then made that the young gentleman should call on the morrow, at two o'clock p.m., precisely. The device not to alarm his sensitiveness in the matter of his teeth was promised by Mr. Filey, who was forewarned that the young gentleman was a dandy, and dressed quite in the fashion—in fact, commonly; so that, unless you knew it, you would not presume him to be heir to a title and estate.

The scene closes on Mr. Filey bowing the lady into her carriage.

At the Bazaar, displays a jeweler's shop. West End. Messrs. Spitchcock & Co. A lady alights from her carriage, and enters. She desires to see some jewelry. A case is shown with diamonds for her eye. Her taste is pleased by a beautiful bracelet, and a pair of ruby ear-rings which suit her complexion to a charm. She is assured that they suit her admirably. She hands her card—Lady Spriggs; or perhaps residing at Mr. Filey's.

"If you know Mr. Filey, the dentist?"

"Very well, indeed," she is told, "and Sir Sampson also, his father."

She then desires them to make out their bill, and tell her the amount of her purchases. Four hundred and fifty pounds! announced to, the shopman wasn't astonished! But what a country this is, where women can lavish money on diamonds—and why not my wife. However! the lady said she would be infinitely obliged to them, if, within half an hour—that was, by two o'clock, precisely, and she named the hour—they would send up the things, and dispatch them and the bill, by one of their young men, to Mr. Filey's, where Sir Sampson, her father-in-law, would write out a check, and liquidate the debt. Some woman's rigmarole, I suppose. However! the request was readily assented to. Messrs. Spitchcock & Co. were closes with her being bowed into her carriage a second time.

Act the Third. A young man with parcel calls at no 49 Grosvenor Square, Mayfair, at Mr. Filey's, and asks to see Sir Sampson Spriggs.

"Her ladyship is within," says the page.

The young man says he will do. He is ushered into a room where he sees the lady.

Well, the lady affably took the parcel from the young man, and said:

"I will take it to show my husband up stairs. He will be with you in a few minutes and hand you the check. You will excuse me? I must first satisfy him of the necessity I have for the articles." Of course the young fellow thought that all was fair and straightforward. He said he would be happy to wait. He took a chair.

Well. He waited. The minute hands of the clock went round. He waited on. Before he had time to feel uncomfortable in his mind the door opened, and a gentleman walked in who bowed to him and made his mind quite easy.

"I brought some things," said the young man; "and am waiting—"

"To see me," said Mr. Filey, admiring the stratagem of the lady immensely. "To see me. Yes. I'm aware. A beautiful day to-day, Sir? Rather sultry. May I offer you a glass of wine?"

Of course the young man didn't object. Ha! ha! You know how they used to prepare victims for the sacrifice!

Well. They talked. Mr. Filey said:

"Pray take a chair, may I ask you?" and the young fellow, warmed by his wine, was quite agreeable to any thing.

"Will you open your mouth, may I ask?" said Mr. Filey.

"What for?" says the young fellow, amazed.

"Oh, nothing!" says Mr. Filey. "I merely wished to inspect. The conformation of your tongue struck me as peculiar. Not that it affects your speech, Sir. Not at all. But pray allow me."

The poor unsuspecting fellow opened his mouth. Ha! He opened his mouth and gaped.

"Now draw back your tongue," said Mr. Filey. No doubt the young fellow thought him a very eccentric baronet, but he complied.

In a minute one of his grinders was seized—wrenched in a vice, wrenched, twisted, and. Heaven spare us all the horrible agony! The grinder came out at last, in the midst of stifled screams, and, I'm afraid, curses. It came out, and the young man was guilty of an assault on the body of the dexterous operator. Mr. Filey went down.

"Where the lady? Where's Sir Sampson Spriggs?" roars the young man, with his hand on his mouth.

"My dear Sir," says Mr. Filey. "You really —you may be eccentric; but when one is doing you a good, Sir—doing you a service—"

Service, indeed! shrieked the wretched young fellow.

"Service to pull out a tooth when I didn't ask you?

"Ask me, Sir," says Mr. Filey. "Ask me! you it has been arranged by your estimable aunt, Lady Spriggs, and that it was paid for yesterday—"

"Paid for yesterday!" bawls the victim, starting back.

"This tooth, Sir, was paid for yesterday," says Mr. Filey, very composedly.

"Lady Spriggs—my aunt?" exclaimed the confounded youth.

"Come, Sir," says Mr. Filey. "I think whatever your objection to part with it, you owe me an apology. I will not say, in due form. I expected ingrice. But you will acknowledge—"

The young man deliberately asked for Sir Sampson Spriggs, or the parcel of jewels which he had brought half an hour ago from the shop of Messrs. Spitchcock & Co., whose servant he distinctly proclaimed himself to be.

"Bless me!" said Mr. Filey, "is there some mistake! Have I really?—on my honor, I—"

"If you will go up to Sir Sampson Spriggs and get that parcel of jewelry immediately—" said the young man.

Mr. Filey started.

"I won't prosecute you," the young man added, washing his mouth out with water.

"You are not the nephew of Sir Sampson?" said Mr. Filey.

"Don't laugh at a chap, after what you've done to him," growled the young man.

"There's a mistake," said Mr. Filey. "Sir Sampson is not here. It was an innocent stratagem—"

"Innocent?" sneers the young man.

"To get you to submit to the operation—Lady Spriggs—"

"Will you ring for her or not?" cries the no longer unsuspicious youth.

The bell was rung. The ready page informed them that Lady Spriggs had left the house shortly after her brief interview with the young man. By degrees the mysterious confidence of Mrs. Filey in her ladyship was melted and dispersed. He accompanied the young man to Messrs. Spitchcock's, broken his head on the adventure, and was, let us hope, something like due reparation to the poor victim of the cleverest piece of rascality I know of. The rest was in the hands of the police in London.

WANTED—A POLICEMAN.

EVERY body—that is, every body that is any body—knows the Café Talleyrand in Regent Street, London, how good it is to dine there, and how much better it is to sup there, if it is possible, somebody else's expense. Most of us—for we all belong to the Upper Ten Thousand, I hope—have dreamy pleasant recollections of that Temple of the Palate.

We remember those little rooms upon the left, the passage with the long table, and the one either side, and at the end, the Statue and the Fountain; the Salle itself—the sanctum of the Café Talleyrand weighty fact that it is the only room that is adapted for any number of guests), the ring of peaceful steel, the silvery clash of transverse fork and spoon, the clink of glass and china, and that unison of the innumerable Gargamelles pervading all as deep pervades a drama. What luxurious dinners did we there eat! The most part swelled the harmony—there "More Moselle," or, "Yes, some Curcoa," and a certain wine in there—which was a favorite with gentlemen who loved good eating and (particularly) good drinking "not wisely but too well," would have to be excepted.

"The next time you want a dinner, Sir," our head-waiter would on such occasions remark to the offending person, "you will find at the Cat and Pumpkin' round the corner, Sir; but not here, Sir—not here." If that gentleman could possibly have been any thing else than a man, he was, would, I am confident, have been a bishop. There is a beautiful legend extant respecting this dignitary, who has been at the Café Talleyrand for three generations or so, which I will take the liberty to repeat, although it has been current for years, and applied falsely to chefs of other establishments. A gentleman, still young, and only melancholy in expression so far as it is fashionable to be so, once stepped into the Salle d'Heliogabalus, and ordered a dinner; not a mere collection of good dishes, be it understood, but that judicious assortment of them which alone is worthy of that title. He was dressed to admiration; his hair and mustache were miracles of the art of the coiffeur; and his hands were whiter even than the waiters', though he was attended upon by two of the most gentlemanly of them, as a man of his distinguished taste deserved to be.

He began with absinthe, and concluded with a glass of eau-de-vie; and throughout the meal took the right wine in the right place, and plenty of it. The head-waiter was so impressed with his judgment that he actually came out of his bower, and took the last dish away with his own superlative fingers, and the dined person acknowledged the attention with a graceful bow. It was evident, however, that this excellent judge of what was good for him, had but an indifferent digestion—with such apparent inconsistency are the gifts of fortune distributed! for he sighed heavily when he had concluded his repast, and while he was imbibing his bottle of claret. Presently he touched the little silver bell—or the bell that looks like silver—which pertains to every table in the Salle d'Heliogabalus, and the waiter was at his elbow before it had ceased to tinkle. There was now a mournful indecision in the dined person's countenance, which, in a meaner man, would have signified something like intoxication, but it presently disappeared. "Bring another bottle of claret," said he, "and be sure that it comes from the same bin;" and the waiter brought it.

The gentleman had been four hours dining and drinking, when he was heard once more to sigh deeply and to tinkle the silver bell again.

"Waiter," said he, languidly, but with that politeness to his social inferiors that never deserts a real bon-vivant, though gluttons possess it not —"waiter, be so good as to fetch a policeman."

"A policeman, Sir!" replied Ganymede. "Most certainly, Sir." And off he hurried to the head-waiter to know what the strange wine was, of which he would not have had the guest suppose him ignorant for worlds. The head-waiter understood the difficulty at once. He procured the gentleman's bill—it was £3 17*s.* 6*d.*, as far as I remember, exclusive of attendance—paid it himself, and got it receipted.

"If I understand your last order aright," observed he, in his musical whisper, "you have no money about you?"

The gentleman nodded blandly.

"You have probably left your purse at home?"

"Alas! no; I have no home: I am a ruined man, in fact; but I have been accustomed to dine well, and was determined to do so once again before I was locked up for good: that is all."

"Sir," replied our head-waiter, with emotion, "I sympathize with you—you are a man who deserves a good dinner; and you must permit me to be your creditor upon this occasion."

Whether this best of Samaritans ever got reimbursed for that act of charity I can not tell; but if the esteem of all who know him can repay a man for a pecuniary sacrifice, I am sure that our head-waiter has been paid in full.

If the gentleman had taken the eau-de-vie first, and the absinthe last, it would, of course, have been a different matter.

THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS.

THE anniversary of the Battle of New Orleans was celebrated for the forty-fifth time at Tammany Hall, in this city, on the evening of the 8th inst., by the usual ball and banquet. Current political events imparted a peculiar interest to the celebration: the Battle of New Orleans being a Southern victory, and General Jackson being a Southern hero, while those who celebrated the day here were generally Northern men. We may remark that, notwithstanding the recent defeat of Tammany in the Mayoralty contest, the day was never kept with more enthusiasm. The Herald reporter thus describes the scene:

"The hall-room was very brilliantly illuminated, and the concourse of beauty and fashion, though not very extensive, was yet imposing and attractive. The walls were very handsomely decorated with flags and paintings, and ribbons of a variety of colors floated from every part of the room. The arrangements were very complete, and reflected much credit on those who superintended the exhibition. Prominent among other flags was the red cross banner of Old England, placed opposite to the free flag of America, in token of the disappearance of ancient and fratricidal animosity, and of the good time to come, when, separated yet united, they shall tremble in the breeze, as the representatives of the highest degree of human liberty throughout the habitable globe. The portrait of Washington of course occupied a prominent place, and in fact the hall every where bore marks of patriotic sentiment and taste.

"At about eleven o'clock the regular procession of the Sachems took place. Dancing was suspended for a moment, and to the lively music of the band the whole body of Tammanyites advanced into the ball-room. After making several circuits of the large hall, the leader of the procession, bearing a red cap of liberty surrounded by brilliant stars, came to a stand in the centre of the room, the whole company forming around him."

THE BALL AT TAMMANY HALL, NEW YORK, ON JANUARY 9, 1860, IN COMMEMORATION OF THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS.

"HE SAT DOWN ON THE LUGGAGE-PILE NEAR HIM AND BURST INTO TEARS."

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

CHAPTER III.

WHAT LITTLE FILKINS had DONE.—ALSO AN INSIGHT INTO WHAT HIS SUCCESSOR WAS DOING.

LITTLE FILKINS, second book-keeper, had not been smashed, as appearances seemed to indicate, between the covers of one of the big ledgers. Neither was he—for I must do proper historical justice to the excited state of Cheswick mind, by detailing these painful rumors—imprisoned in the specie vault by Mr. Green, in revenge for his having asserted that that gentleman was a muff, where day by day he grew thinner, and shrieked invariably for the help that would not come, biting the useless cogics and fifty-dollar pieces in an agony of hunger, thirst, and despair. Neither had he drowned himself in the lonely depths of the neighboring Lake Squilligochizzet; neither had he, which appeared the least improbable rumor, written a vow in his own blood, pierced with a pin, from a large vein of the arm, that he would drink himself to death in a fourth story room of the Gold Eagle Tavern, hired for that purpose. Happily, none of these fearful rumors were true, though such were the combined nausea, mortified pride, wrath, and excited imagination of the people of Cheswick, that, had it been stated that Mr. Green, desirous to obtain the second book-keeper's place for his supposed friend, the new-comer, had commanded little Filkins to strip and jump down his own throat, which order the young man had been terrified into obeying and so put an end to himself, it would have been received as at least entitled to mature consideration.

But little Filkins, second book-keeper, though of no remarkable cleverness of brain, and rather wild withal, still had not kept books five years for nothing, but knew that, with place, and a good constitution, Life, and not Death, came out, on squaring accounts, on the credit side. Wherefore, undesirous of quarreling with the many possibilities of bread and butter, to say nothing of moistening, which still lay strewn generously through the world for a hearty pretty kind and stout after all, he packed up his baggage for the midnight train as soon as he found himself superseded by the fair-haired substitute for a partner, and went down to the station where, as I hours before, he had been carelessly awaiting the arrival, smoking, as he lounged, for want of thought. A little sullen at the loss of his place, and a little provoked at his dim perception of what certainly looked like injustice in singling him out for punishment, he paced up and down the moist platform, a small but noticeable object in the hush of midnight, behind paletots three deep, his head muffled in a shawl, his hands in his pockets, and smoking his cigar in quick puffs. The cars were later than usual, which did not add sweetness to his mood.

Suddenly, at the end of one of his walks, and just as he was about to turn, a tall figure opened the door of the passenger-room and stepped out, sweeting him breast to breast. The ex-second book-keeper started involuntarily, as was natural at that time of night, but regained his composure, as the stranger spoke in a very gentlemanly manner: "Mr. Filkins, I believe?"

"All right," was the laconic answer of that young gentleman. — "Drive ahead."

"My name, Sir, is Ernest Beckford. I wish to have a few moments' talk with you, if you will allow me, before the train starts."

"Oh, it's you, is it?" rejoined the ex-second book-keeper, in a tone of extreme satirical commiseration. "Well, I'm sorry for you, but I can't help you. Want a little information as to management of affairs in your new place, don't ye?—Usual desire in the promoted—very usual. Under the peculiar circumstances, however, could—decidedly cool. Desire any thing else of the man whose shoes you've stepped into?"

The young man, whom we, like little Filkins, will by this time have recognized as the late junior-partner of the preceding afternoon, replied, with not any more than a slightest touch of sarcasm in his voice, that any information which the ex-second book-keeper might chance to possess would be more advantageously handed him to-morrow, unless extreme exigency called on him to be prodigal; and then checking himself, as with a sudden remorse at having permitted any irony to characterize his manner toward one naturally nettled by his circumstances, and blessed with no great talent for rising above them, he threw a cheerier kindliness into his voice, and said:

"Joking aside, I wish no information—none at least of the kind that you imagine. In several ways I can be of material benefit to you. You are out of your place at Cheswick Branch. I trusted you—it you say, I am in your shoes—I know that. That is unpleasant for both of us. Until next week you will be. Your interest in interests would be best attended to by having me in it. So I came and filled it. But to show you how entirely free from any motive of personal house; you can be pretty sure of it, I may say, for I am not uninfluential with them, though young, having been a large stockholder in some of the firm. Here it is; present it as soon as you arrive."

This last was said with the manner and tone of one by nature fitted to command, and with such a Saxon directness and irresistibility that little Filkins, who, up to this moment, had been inwardly debating on the probabilities of his somnambulism, woke up, and stretched forth his hand, took the proffered letter, with—

"I'll be hanged if you ain't a dem foine fellow! I didn't do you justice, Mr. Beckford, it's all right now. I'll take your letter, and very much obliged to you too."

"You're very welcome. Now that's done with I've one more thing I want to say. If it seems a liberty, pardon it. I am not one of those men who purchase with the benefit the right to preach; but I hope the interest I have shown in your welfare thus far will be a proof to you that what I say now is disinterested. You're of the Wenham family of your name, I believe?"

"That's so? Lord! how did you know?"

"I have been in Wenham. Besides, I have known of you for some time. You have a splendid mother—as noble a specimen of woman as ever lived! And two true-hearted sisters, beautiful, accomplished, and good, just coming out into the society they are able to be the pride of. They are younger than you, and they have no father. Suppose now that their only brother should, all at once, turn straight about and be the man he can be—their ornament and support, and his mother's rejoicing every where?"

The three paletots on the outside of what was really the kind heart of Filkins had been moving up and down tumultuously for some time like the study of a small earthquake, done in plate cloth; and at this juncture he sat down on the luggage-pile near him and burst into tears. "Oh, oh!" sobbed little Filkins, dropping his cigar, holder and all, on the platform. "That's too much, that is! That's too much! Oh, oh, oh!"

Ernest Beckford continued: "My friend, God can help you to do—to be, all that is worthy of Him—of them—of yourself. That's right! don't be ashamed to cry; you couldn't do a manlier thing under the circumstances! Unless it is to right about face for your whole life, for their sakes and yours, immediately, before you leave this platform. There's the whistle, will you do it? will you be a free man from this night, so help you God?"

Little Filkins arose, and if he had been a great many kilometres high instead of only five feet five he couldn't have been more sublime than he was when, grasping Beckford's hand like a vice, he said, in a voice all husky and trembling but resolute,

"Beckford, I say, God bless you! I think He sent you. You've opened my eyes for the first time these five years. If I'd known you when I first came to Cheswick—specially when I first fell in with that devil—well, I won't tell you who I mean, for I oughtn't if you don't know—most likely you will know before long; if I'd known you, I say, I wouldn't have broken their hearts, dear souls. I've done it for the last time, though. Bear me, Beckford. So help me God, I never touch that damned drink again!"

"God hear and help you! He will!" was the reply of the young Saxon, uttered with a hearty solemnity and cheerfulness. "Good-by! I shall wish to hear from you. Remember!"

So the train to New York bore away little Filkins through the damp, half-solid dark. But its light sprinkled with a shower of cinder-stars that whirled in the wake of the rear car, that little object, just vitalized and made sublime by the sudden new revelation to him of the manhood that was in him, stood on the platform gazing wistfully back at the tall slender figure by the station, and, when the curve shut out the last glimpse of Cheswick light, retreated hastily to a lonely seat among the sleeping through passengers, and wept again to find what truesouled men, after all, were Ernest Beckford and little Filkins.

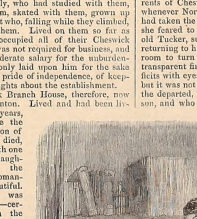
And for the present, this is enough of a hint what little Filkins had done.

But our chapter is devoted also to sketch a little of the doings of his successor. And here it is necessary, absolutely necessary, to introduce a woman.

The Banking House of Cheswick Branch, that is the outward and visible Banking House of stone and brick, was but partially occupied with the business-paraphernalia of Clingham & Co. As paying-teller Bradby remarked, late one evening, when his natural powers were assisted, it was a bank which was not all a bank. On one side of the front door (for it was a double building) all the first story was devoted to money-making, the vault beneath that story was equally given over to money-holding. But the rest of the house—saving a slight look of massive closeness and retention about it, as if the pecuniary element of the bank part had communicated itself to the whole, and none of the inhabitants could get out for an airing unless the very best paper on short time were presented for them at the front door—was a very comfortable family house indeed.

To most of the citizens of Cheswick, who looked upon Clingham & Co. simply from their financial point of view, and would have been as much surprised if you heard that any of the partners were actual human beings with a heart in them as to hear that some fact asserted of a patent safe, or of an unceasing source of astonishment that all the Bank building was not put to some sort of use; which meant that it was either rented for a boarding-house, or for a banking-house. But Clingham & Co., having a human as well as a patent-safe side to their nature, had not let the upper rooms boarding, in his affiliation, an old and tried friend of their free, unbroubled, and as yet unmourned boyhood. John Manton, namely, who had studied with them, fought for them, skated with them, grown up with them, but, falling while they climbed, now lived on them. Lived on them so far as this, that he occupied all of their Cheswick house, which was not required for business, and received a moderate salary for the subunderstood some service, only laid upon him for the sake of his dishonored state of independence, of keeping things at rights about the establishment.

In Cheswick Branch House, therefore, now lived Zoë Manton. Lived and had been living for twenty years, in which time the wife and mother of his youth had died, leaving him with one only child, a daughter, now at the threshold of womanhood, and beautiful. Nora Manton was not a shy girl—certainly not in the painful sense; but she need have been much more than merely not shy to have put their early impress upon the whole of her own eyes which belonged to the juniors of Clingham & Co., Cheswick Branch. It was very seldom, therefore, that she passed under the Oriental languor of Mr. Bradby's gaze, or the cagle glances of Mr. Tuttle. The subs only knew her afar off—partly sufficiently enough had they ever seen her to discuss her points, as all fine fellows do of women and horses.



But in the evening, and when the little creatures who might have annoyed her were all gone, then Nora Manton came down in her beauty, and, breathing freely, roamed at will through all the counting-house, president's room and all, taking a delight in being familiarly among the tall solemn desks and heavy iron-nailed doors, which had been her mystery, her perplexity in childhood, as we all do in examining fearlessly any and awe of ours which has been detected as a humbug, and discovered to be nothing to be afraid of after all.

She was an imaginative child, this Nora Manton. For her all those heavy-studded doors had once been the barriers to countless Aladdin chambers, Ali Baba caves, and Emperor jiujing-places. Oh, could she but enter and gaze! And the desks—all of the olden make, with clawed feet and curling, carven rails, were veritable hippogriffs to her, who bore patiently all day the weight of ledgers and elbows, but at dusk, being released from the spell, flew leagues away into golden cloud-mountains across the sunset, and came back before midnight full of the shining parterage on which they had been regaled—dollars for daisies, crowns for clover. And that was the way, so Nora thought, that Clingham & Co. made all their money.

At seventeen years and eight months she had of course become aware, poor child! how much harder it is to get money, and how impossible it is that there should be any such things as hippogriffs. Necessarily, these two facts, which are virtually the dismissal of the supernatural and the acceptance of the natural, characterize all coming out of childhood. But with her the change was only a partial one. She had lost nothing of that sweet faith, nothing of that sweet belief in, and sometimes communion with the intangible; she was one of those souls whom a painter must love to paint and a poet to write about all the time, though the critics should accuse them never so much of reproducing their own ideals—a soul that is the real and only true conception of exquisite womanhood—the child-woman.

Nora Manton had been making bread; for John, her father, was no one else's on any consideration. She had been also darning his stockings; had played and sung all his favorite old tunes to the piano, from Robin Adair down to the most modern of all, True Love can ne'er Forget. She had then read him to sleep with stirring political articles upon the downfall of the country emitted in the Cheswick Tri-Weekly Double-Fist; and then, seeing that the last column of our liberties had fallen, and Mr. Manton's head and eyelids with it, Nora, knowing that he was good for one hour's sleep at least, left him on the settee before the grate, and sallied into the money territory for one of her strolls. Here was one burner of gas lighted in the counting-house that was kept alight all night, and this one was plenty of company for the young girl, loving, as she did, to nestle in weird shadows with which she could half-frighten herself, and then spring out of them laughing and singing like some of the other household sprites on a romp.

There were two ways of entrance into the money department from the other portion of the house. You might go in by a door which opened into the superintendent's room from the parlor, or, passing through the common entry of the building, you could enter by the green baize valve which controlled all day the life currents of Cheswick's financial heart. Of late, whenever Nora visited the counting-house, she had taken the latter way. Not exactly because she feared to see the ghost of the well-known old Tucker, superintendent for so many years, returning to his former seat in the glass-walled room to turn over airy bank statements with transparent fingers, and scowl at imaginary delicits with eyes having no speculation in them; but it was not pleasant to have suggested to her the departed, who was always a queer old person, and who would be the very one to come back, if that thing was ever done, to push Mr. Lake Gown from his stool. Then again there was something disagreeable in that room's associations with the living as well as with the dead. Lake Gown was forty in body, he was also forty in soul; for he had never lived faster in his emotional than in his digestive nature. Lake Green was bland, paternal, by no means starveling in his demonstrations—a very quiet person; but in spite of all these estimable and soothing qualities he had frightened Nora Manton. Why, how, exactly, she could not have told, but he always impressed her with a sense of danger. When he came, three years before, to Chesvick, he was very much the same person as now; but she, with all a woman's feelings, was a little girl in look, so Luke Green took her one day on his lap. She felt then as if he were only a bit of a very thin coat, and got away from him as soon as possible, lest she should break through and find it very deep and cold there below. So the queer little child—children will be so queer every body knows—had always been afraid of him, and professed this dread to her womanhood. And of late days she had instinctively felt there was still more cause to be frightened. Luke Green had been blander to her than usual at the rare times when they met—had looked almost as if he would like to take her in his lap again. Women appreciate attentions almost as quickly, and read their meaning even better when they dislike than when they have the source. So Nora Manton avoided him scrupulously. He called on her father oftener than ever, but he never saw her unless in the street or at church.

So much—and pretty long it is, I know—for the reason why Nora Manton on this particular night, after a week spent her father safely down, bering over the ruins of his country, ran through the entry instead of the superintendent's room, and darted into the counting-room by the baize door. The gas was burning brightly as usual, from the one burner over the cashier's desk, and in the light the room, as diffused through the wide, paper-smelling apartment, Nora went dancing and humming with the first sense of free pride that she had known that day. For she liked to make bread, and darn stockings, and read to her father; but these amusements could bear a little dilution with something else.

She had no playmate but herself, and yet, from a very pretty acquaintance with that one, she had acquired a familiarity, an ease of conversation with her that was very enviable. She climbed up on the cashier's stool and began soliloquizing,

"I'm a capitalist; I'm Mr. Nora Clingham, why, what's my name that is? Mr. John Manton, how d'ye do, Sir?—upon my word, the very man I want to see! Do you know that in balancing accounts with you yesterday we made a slight mistake in our favor? The Bank is in debt to you—let me see—just one hundred and fifty thousand. Leave it on deposit or take my check for the amount?"

"Check for the amount, if you please. I wouldn't want you, but I have to pay the first instalment on my new Hudson River country-seat to-morrow, and I have only seventy-five thousand ready cash for the current quarter. Besides, I want to get a pretty set of mink—victorine, mud, and cuffs, all only $75—for my little girl Nora, named after you, Mr. Clingham. ought to have a new coat for Sunday myself."

Here Nora paused for a minute, looking very sad, as if Mr. John Manton had been twitting himself on facts—which I'm afraid he had—for she remembered often she had heard him rub the shiny elbows of her father's veteran swallow-tail, and dampened them without taking the gloss off much, and the corners of her mouth quivered. But she rallied like a brave little woman, and changing into the person of the fabulous Miss Clingham, resumed her soliloquy.

"So you shall, my old friend! so you shall! Keep up heart, John Manton, my boy; here's a check for one hundred thousand; go get what you like and be happy, and if you want any more call around in the course of the afternoon."

"Oh, isn't it grand to be a capitalist! Every dollar's just a hundred little copper chances of making something happy! Oh, it's so nice! I like to be a capitalist so much!" cried Nora Manton, in her own sweet person once more. And she looked about among the inkstand desks, as charming an incongruity as a valentine in the post-bag among notices of protest.

"What shall I do next?" said Nora, when she accomplished the desse pas to her heart's content. "Let me see—oh! I guess I'll be what I used to. I'll be a love-sick young maiden with great blue eyes: I shall cry a great deal, and shall wonder if there's any body to love me in all this big world. I'll be a love-sick miss! I like to be a capitalist so much!" cried Nora Manton, in her own sweet person once more. And she looked about among the inkstand desks, as charming an incongruity as a valentine in the post-bag among notices of protest.

"What shall I do next?" said Nora, when she accomplished the desse pas to her heart's content. "Let me see—oh! I guess I'll be what I used to. I'll be a love-sick young maiden with great blue eyes: I shall cry a great deal, and shall wonder if there's any body to love me in all this big world. I'll be a love-sick miss! I am! I must get out of the way as quick as I can: so I plunge down into the cavern of the sea among the mermaids. But—terrible! here comes that awful fish called a Filkins, with an immense long thing sticking out beyond his mouth; he isn't a sword-fish. Let's see, what is he? Oh, he's a cigar-holder fish, and how he swims this way; he has his eye on me! Help! I pronounce the mystic spell; I rise to this surface in the shape of a mermaid, in a good Genius in flowing robes—that's General Washington over the clock—commands me to fly to yonder beach, and with my two fair arms to protect me, to love me better than his life, forever more!

"Oh, that's splendid! How well it does wind up after all! Pretty for you, Nora Manton; you, nearly eighteen! I don't care! it's splendid: there's nobody to hear or see me and I'll do it please. Mr. Green's room's the lower. I dance into it joyfully, making up this song that the birds sing—and I sing it with them as I go:

"More than all the stars above me
Does my true Knight love me—love me.
There is none like him in any land!—
With love are his eyes full!—
They are two blue skies
Of loving as sweet as heart can bear!"

So singing, so dancing, Nora Manton whirled in through the door of the superintendent's room, which opened with a touch, and, before she could stop herself, sank into the very arms—not of Luke Green, but of Ernest Green, indeed, nor yet of his arm-chair, but into those of Ernest Beckford.

The first impression of having a beautiful woman in your arms is said to be in no degree painful. But when in reactionary feeling comes of not being perfectly sure what she knows of your truly excellent institution."

From Gov. Sprague, of Rhode Island,

"Presents thanks for the beautiful engraving, and accepts the membership with great pleasure."

From Gov. Chase, of Ohio.

"The engraving is admirable."

From Gov. Begg, of North Carolina.

"I shall be happy to have my name enrolled as a member of an Institution which is doing so much to promote the cause of the Fine Arts in this country."

From Gov. Weller, of California.

"I will take pleasure in doing all I can to advance the interests of your admirable Association."

From Gov. Willard, of Indiana,

"Assures the Directory of the Association of his warmest regard and consideration."

From Gov. Cannon, of Delaware,

"Presents grateful acknowledgments, and hopes that the Association may meet with that liberal encouragement which, from its design and labors, it so justly merits."

From Gov. Morrill, of Maine.

"The engraving is one of the finest ever published. I desire to make my acknowledgments for it." &c. &c.

From Gov. Bissel, of Illinois.

"Thus far our success in engraving furnished by the Association, in workmanship and beauty, surpasses its expectations. The one now furnished is, of itself, worth four times the amount requisite to secure a membership. Every gentleman, I am sure, rejoices at the early success of your enterprise. It has done more already to cultivate a correct taste among our people a love of art, and inspire a taste for its excellences, than all other causes for the last fifty years."

Gov. Lowe, of Iowa, Gov. Kitts, of North Carolina, Gov. Gist, of South Carolina, Gov. Winsor, of Michigan, Gov. Brown, of Georgia, and others, extend the kindest words of congratulation and approval.

As also do the following eminent persons, among others: Senator Simon Cameron, of Pennsylvania, William Gilmore Simms, of South Carolina, Edward Everett, of Boston, Henry T. Tuckerman, of New York, etc.

Mrs. L. H. Sigourney writes: "The engraving of 'Shakspeare and his Friends' is truly a magnificent work. It has been the theme of unqualified admiration from myself and all others who have seen it. You have my best wishes for the prosperity of the Art Association which has already exerted so powerful an influence in uplifting and refining the taste of our native land."

Mrs. Anna Cora Ritchie says: "Accept my thanks for the engraving entitled 'Shakspeare' which I highly value, and which will adorn the walls of my Southern home. The original picture has always been dear to me. I would gladly promote them by any means in my power. You have my best wishes for your ever increasing success."

"Paul's celebrated painting of 'Shakspeare and his Friends' has been engraved in a style worthy of the painter, and the plate purchased by the Cosmopolitan Art Association, which will furnish it as a premium to their subscribers for the current year. How they can give a quantity about it, worth two dollars, and the magnificent engraving, which is worth two dollars, for seven dollars, is one of the mysteries withheld from us; but we cannot possibly figure out, though it has been done by the wisest men of the age. We can simply express the strongest admiration of the beautiful production of art, and the liberality and energy of the Association that has produced to afford all the world an opportunity to possess a 'purest treasure.' Those subscribing $15 by Tuesday next and it strikes the eye as a 'perfect work.' Like a sweet second to music, or a beautiful flower, it enhances. The picture contains fifteen figures, in standing and sitting postures—the Immortal Bard occupying the foreground of the group. He is represented as discoursing to the lovely company of Queen Elizabeth, Sir Walter Raleigh, Burbon, Beaumont, Fletcher, Selden, Sylvester, Earl of Dorset, Ben Jonson, Camden, Earl of Southampton, Sir Robert Cotton, Dekker, and Daniel. We long to hear what he is saying, but the distance is cruelly cold and the inspiration glorious, the artist tells us in every lineament of the listeners, as well as of the speaker. It is altogether a magnificent work—genius paying tribute to genius; and let every man, through the agency of the Cosmopolitan Art Association, it may, before another New Year's Day dawns, have Shakspeare and his Friends in his own homes. We pity the man, woman, or child, who can look at this engraving without a thrill of pleasure."

The Great Tribulation,

The new volume by the Rev. Dr. JOHN CUMMING, which has awakened such a prodigious interest throughout the religious community, Second Series now ready. Moslin, Price $1. HURD & CARLETON, Publishers, N. Y.

From Halsted's late Treatise on Metempathy.

"Miss ——, aged 92, had been for something more than two years past, subject to epilepsy. She was also in the habit of walking in her sleep. These fits of somnolency supervened to any trifling excitement, so that she came to expect either sleep-walking or epilepsy to follow a day of excitement or fatigue. She occasionally had daily periodical turns of drowsiness or lethargy, from which it was almost impossible to arouse her. Her face flushed painfully at times, and she was all nervous excitement. Her stature was found very much compressed and fallen. One month's treatment reduced it to its natural size, and caused it to maintain an upright position. She had no fit of epilepsy after commencing treatment, but occasionally experienced spasms. She remained under treatment two and a half months, and left cured."

This Powder can be obtained at a trifling cost by enclosing 25 cents to H. HALSTED, M.D., Round Hill Water Cure, Northampton, Mass.

THE Publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE have the pleasure to announce that they have made arrangements with the Author of "Tom Brown" to receive the Monthly Parts of THACKERAY'S New Novel, "Lovel the Widower," in advance of publication in England. The First Part appears in the present Number of the Magazine. The Tale will complete about Eight Parts, one of which, with the original illustrations, will be published in each successive Number.

ANTHONY TROLLOPE, the Author of the brilliant Novels, "Dr. Thorne" and "The Bertrams," will write, expressly for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, a Series of Stories under the general title of "Tales of Many Lands." The First One of this Series is contained in the present Number; others will appear at short intervals during the year.

The Publishers renew the assurances which they have so often made, that HARPER'S MAGAZINE will continue to maintain the conservative position which it has assumed. They do not undervalue the importance of the questions of DUTY on the different sections and parties of the country. Each of these has organs expressly devoted to its advocacy and maintenance. The Publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE do not pursue an impotence that there should be a periodical which, leaving the discussion of those vexed questions to their own especial advocates and opponents, shall inculcate those principles and cherish those opinions only in which wise and patriotic citizens of every political section are hartily united. Their Magazine will be, as heretofore, the organ of no party in politics or sect in religion; but a National work, drawing materials and welcoming contributions from every section. The Contributors whose papers appear in its pages, residing in every section of the country have, of course, different personal opinions upon the exciting questions of the day. What these private views may be, or how they are expressed, beyond the pages of the Magazine, the Publishers have little to and of their purpose to inquire; but they will exercise the most watchful care that nothing shall find place in any department of the Magazine which shall render it an unwelcome visitor in any household.

PETTEVIAN STYLE.—Against patent Medicines most persons are justly prejudiced. Health is too valuable to be trifled with, and no one possessing ordinary common sense would wish to take a patent medicine of which he can know nothing except what is asserted by the maker of it, a person who for all he knows, may be an arrant rogue. The Pettevian Syrup can not be placed in that category, for every one is obliged to believe that there is no quackery in it. The formula of the preparation was published in the Medical Journals. The proprietors are well known in Boston, and are gentlemen in every sense of the word. Their character is a guarantee, even if they do not claim that the syrup is a panacea, that it is one of those diseases in the cure of which a skilful physician will be found most efficacious. The diseases in which they claim the Syrup to be beneficial are many, and though this remedy is regarded as one of the most modern, it has been in use for many years, and cures are said always obtained, for the reason that it is sometimes difficult to find out what is being administered. It is also to be considered by physiological chemists, that it is not a mere mixture of drugs, but the result of much study and labor in the production of protoxide, which, when taken into the system, will have the same effect as the Syrup. The protoxide, however, is said to be a very unstable compound, and when by the combination of the Syrup with the absorption of oxygen from the air. It is claimed that it is in the Pettevian Syrup that it has been found by the ingenuity as to remain permanent, further oxidation being impossible.

Pamphlets containing numerous certificates of cures from eminent physicians, and others, can be had on application to the Agents,

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $2 50 A YEAR.

The First Number of the Fourth Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY appeared on the 2d of January. Last year over 4,500,000 Numbers of HARPER'S WEEKLY were sold, being half of which were sold in the single month of January. In commencing the new volume, the proprietors desire to state that it has been their purpose to render HARPER'S WEEKLY, in the first place, and before any thing else, a FIRST-CLASS NEWSPAPER, containing a full history of current events, equal to the daily press in fullness of description, and superior to the daily press in accurately illustrating what is said. How far they have attained their aim, the three volumes now published will show. The illustrations in the Third Volume will bear evidence to the fidelity with which every important event of the past year has been related and illustrated in the pages of HARPER'S WEEKLY. They would refer, in this connection, to The Italian War, the Great Eastern Steamship, the Japanese Embassy, the Harper's Ferry Insurrection, the Tragedy Legislature, China, &c., &c. The value of the paper will be best realized by comparing what it did not attempt, and by trying to conceive how little people would really know of passing events if they had to rely on written descriptions alone. In this respect, the arrangements for the coming year will be even more complete than have been heretofore. HARPER'S WEEKLY has regular staff correspondents in the principal cities of the globe, and commands the pencils of the first artists in the country. It will thus present, in the most finished manner, a complete illustrated history of our times, and, as subjects of interest to readers in every section of the country are generally interesting pictures, it will be found, week by week, the most attractive newspaper in the world. HARPER'S WEEKLY may rely on finding in its pages next year an account of every important event, and a picture of every memorable event which occurs, and a portrait of every man who attracts the attention of the people of this country.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue, as heretofore, to include that class of news that are written by native and foreign authors. It has already published a Story of Tom Cobb, by CHARLES DICKENS (with original illustrations drawn for HARPER'S WEEKLY). What will be done with Sir EDWARD LYTTON BULWER'S The Dead Secret, by WILKIE COLLINS; Framley Parsonage, by Mrs. GASKELL; Orley Farm, by CHARLES READE; and TROLLOPE, by GEO. WM. CURTIS, will be seen in publishing The Woman in White, by WILKIE COLLINS, and The New Partner in Congress a Co., Doctor Thorne, and The Bertrams, by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, will be illustrated by JOHN MCLENAN, Esq., of London, and will appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY. HARPER'S WEEKLY are purchased from their authors by the proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY, who, therefore, have no claim for a mere right of priority what amounts to a handsome price for a story.

In addition to serials, each number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will contain a complete tale by a writer of the highest reputation. In respect to these tales, as with the serials, the publishers will endeavor, in the best their ability, to secure that regarding their origin.

The other departments of HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue to receive earnest attention at the hands of the publishers.

Have just Published;

SELF-HELP.

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS OF CHARACTER AND CONDUCT.

By Samuel Smiles,

Author of "The Life of George Stephenson."

With a Complete and Elaborate Index.

12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

[From the London Saturday Review.]

Mr. Smiles, the biographer of George Stephenson, has written a book called Self-Help, in which he has collected a wonderful number of stories showing how men get on in the world. The literary merit of the work is very great, and few authors have so successfully surmounted the difficulty of weaving into a connected and pleasant narrative a long string of anecdotes. Both requisites of success—industry and largeness of aim—are aptly illustrated by Mr. Smiles, whose profusion of biographical anecdotes seems inexhaustible.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States on receipt of Seventy-five Cents.

THE COURT OF DEATH.

A Large and Splendid CHROMO-LITHOGRAPHIC ENGRAVING (23 by 31 inches) of the Great and Sublime Moral Painting of

THE COURT OF DEATH,

By REMBRANDT PEALE,

has been published by the undersigned.

The regular and lowest price for such Engravings is $5, and at this price about 8,000 copies are usually sold; but, under the conviction that 100,000 of THE COURT OF DEATH will be called for, they are sold at

ONE DOLLAR EACH!

Each purchaser also receives a numbered certificate of proprietorship in the Original Painting, worth $25,000, and is entitled to an equal share in its final distribution, to be made by the certificate holders when the 100,000 engravings are sold.

Testimonial from the venerable Rembrandt Peale, now in the 82d year of his age:

"PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 16, 1859.

"I have seen the Chromo-Lithographic Engraving of my Painting of the Court of Death, recently executed for Dr. G. G. Colton, (the present proprietor,) by Baroty, Major & Knapp, of New York, and can certify that IT IS AN ACCURATE AND ADMIRABLE COPY OF THE ORIGINAL PAINTING. REMBRANDT PEALE."

FOR ONE COPY, $1, and postage 12 cents. SIX COPIES for $5, postage free.

Agents cannot fail to make from $300 to $400 per year above expenses, in canvassing for the work. All who see the engraving and have a parlor, will want a copy. $1.16 from agents will secure one copy, a letter of agency (stating special terms) and 40 descriptive and historical pamphlets for distribution.

The demand for the pictures since they were issued (Dec. 1) has far exceeded the power of the printer to furnish them; but we have thus far never failed to fill the orders from the country on the day of receipt.

To avoid mistakes, the Name, Town, County and State should be plainly written.

MISREPRESENTATION.

A NOVEL.

By Anna H. Drury.

Author of "Friends and Fortune," "Eastbury," &c.

6vo, Paper, 50 cents.

[From the London Spectator.]

There is no living writer of fiction who might not be proud to have produced such a novel as Misrepresentation, but there is not one among them all who could have written it except Mrs. Drury herself. * * * Mrs. Drury is an able and conscientious artist, and therefore her novel is racy of that originality which belongs to every work that is the genuine outcome of an individual mind. The story is singularly well constructed—it is not a short one, but so close is its texture that not a page could be spared. The characters are numerous and distinctly marked, and they talk like men and women, not like puppets, or like a book. The diction throughout is worthy of the matter, never careless or labored, always suited to the occasion, and leaving on the reader's mind the impression that the author has conveyed her meaning in the best form of words she could have chosen for the purpose.

[From the London Athenæum.]

This is a novel with a good plot, which is well and carefully worked out. The characters are every one of them human beings, and act and move like such. The authoress steadily minds her own business, and does not lose the thread of her story, nor allow the action to stand still while she indulges in oracles about her own opinions. What observations there are spring up naturally, and are indigenous to the occasion, and are all of them very good and human. * * "Misrepresentation" will be read with interest, especially by those who find themselves shut up in the house with the roughs and colds and other blessings brought by November and its fogs.

[From the London Leader.]

We hope our readers will get the work. The characters are admirably drawn, and the whole subject of "Misrepresentation" is treated with great skill by the talented writer.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States on receipt of Fifty Cents.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. IV.—No. 161.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE CROWN OF LOVE.

OH, might I lord my arms with thee,
Like that young lover of Romance,
Who loved and gained so gloriously
The fair Princess of France!

Because he dared to love so high,
He, bearing her dear weight, must speed
To where the mountain touched the sky:
So the proud king decreed.

Unhalting he must bear her on,
Nor pause a space to gather breath,
And on the height she would be won:
And she was won in death!

Red the far summit flames with morn,
While in the plain a glistening Court
Surrounds the king who practiced scorn
Through such a mask of sport.

She leans into his arms; she lets
Her lovely shape be clasped: he fares.
God speed him whole! The knights make bets:
The ladies lift soft prayers.

Oh have you seen the deer at chase?
Oh have you seen the wounded kite?
So boundingly he runs the race,
So wavering grows his flight.

"My lover! linger here, and slake
Thy thirst, or me thou wilt not win."
"See'st thou the tumbled heavens? they break!
They beckon us up, and in."

"Ah, hero-love! unloose thy hold:
Oh drop me like a cursed thing."
"See'st thou the crowded swards of gold?
They wave to us Rose and Ring."

"Oh death-white mouth! Oh cast me down!
Thou diest? Then with thee I die."
"See'st thou the angels with a Crown?
We twain have reach'd the sky."

GEORGE MEREDITH.

"SHE LETS HER LOVELY SHAPE BE CLASPED."

WHERE IS THE OTHER?

RELICS seen in lat. 69° 00' N., long. 99° 24' W.: Not brought away. 29th May, 1859. * * * a small worsted-work slipper (lined with calf-skin, bound with red ribbon). * * * CAPT. MCCLINTOCK'S Dispatch.

JANE VAUGHAN was alone with her sailor lover, George.

"There's something the matter, George, I can see it in your face."

"Yes, Jenny, there is; I'm going a long voyage. You know, Jenny, I was to have gone to Calcutta, but when your father said what he did—you remember?—I made up my mind to get on faster. I'm going with Sir John Franklin—three years, perhaps—but it will be the making of all of us who come back, so you mustn't mind, Jenny; time will soon go by, and I shall be able when I come back to find a nest for you—little wren."

He spoke hurriedly, as though to prevent her speaking.

She sobbed out, "Three years, George? Not see you for three years! It's very cruel—it's very hard."

"No, Jenny, not 'cruel,' not 'hard.' It's sure to make my fortune, and I might work in the ordinary way for years before I satisfied your father."

"But surely, George, you could do something on shore, if not at sea, to prevent this terrible separation. Can't you be a clerk, or something? You draw nicely—much better than old Mr. Sumner at Miss Hilditch's. Can't you give lessons, or do any thing? I'm sure you could, so clever as you are, do something."

"My dear Jenny, you don't understand these things. When a man has once chosen his profession or trade, he had better stick to it; he'll have so much to learn in his new calling; so many competitors, that it's a hundred to one if he succeeds. I chose to go to sea like a fool—I've learned my business like a man—and I mean to keep to it like a wise man. There now, Jenny, only three years and it's all done—money and fame in three years! Cheer up! don't make it worse for me, for I feel it not a little."

She saw he did feel it by the gathering moisture of his eye.

"After all, it's for the best, Jenny, dear."

So said Jane's father; so said her mother; and she?—she was silent.

The three weeks soon passed—too soon. Poor Jenny tried hard to be cheerful, but now and then would look at the fine handsome face of her lover and feel it so hard that he must go away for so long—

> And dearer still he grew, and dearer,
> E'en as the parting hour grew nearer.

The last day came, and her mother contrived to leave them alone together more than was customary; "his last day," she said, and called to mind her own experience of some five-and-twenty years ago. Jenny bore her burden bravely. Not a tear was seen except by George—he was quieter than usual.

"You won't sail on a Friday, George? I think it's such a bad day; so many ships are lost that sail on Fridays."

"I don't know, I'm sure; but I don't really think it makes much difference, Friday or any other day."

"But it is unlucky, and I dreamed this morning of a wedding, and all the people were in white. It's dreadfully unlucky, that it is."

"Why, what a little goose it is; why is that unlucky?"

"I don't know, but they say it is."

"Who says so?"

"Old Mrs. Crace; and her husband was a sailor—"

And here Jenny looked as if she would like to say something more.

"Well? say on, Jenny."

"I've got something for you—it will keep you from being drowned;" and her little hand was inserted in her pocket, and brought out as its captive a small bag of silk, with cord enough to go round the neck, attached.

"What is it, dearest?"

"I can't tell you; but, indeed, she said it would prevent your being drowned. Do wear it. Her husband always wore one, and he died in her arms, as I should like you to die in mine, if you must die first. Do wear it?"

"Oh yes, I'll wear it; but you can tell me what it is, eh? What is it?" And he looked into her face. "Come, tell me."

"It was old Mrs. Crace gave it me; she's been attending Charlotte Golding, who was married this time last year; she said she was sure it was a good thing, and made me promise to give it you, so I made the bag, and here it is. Do wear it?"

"Certainly I will, as I'd wear any thing you'd like me to; but still I should like to know what this charm is."

"Old Mrs. Crace said that the doctor laughed at her when she told him about her husband having one."

"Old Mrs. Crace!—the doctor! Why, what does it mean! Oh, I see! how stupid I am. Mrs. Golding has a baby, hasn't she? Ah, yes! I understand. I'll wear it."

"Thanks, dear George. She says, she's sure her husband would have been drowned if it hadn't been for that."

"Now, George, my boy, the chaise is here; come along."

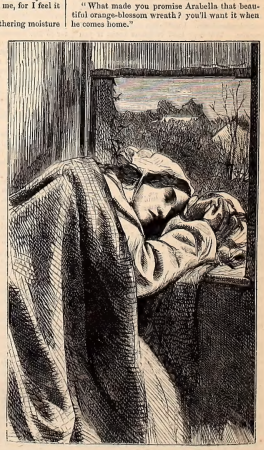
He came out of the room, she clinging to him, and shook hands with them all and went down stairs.

"Don't look back—don't look back;" and one after another the shoes of the sisters are thrown after him for luck.

"Look out, George!" said his brother William, from the top of the stairs, "here's Jane's coming!" and he seized the slipper from her foot and flung it.

George heard him, and turned.

"There, Jane, he's caught the slipper, and kissed it, and taken it with him."



"Oh! William! William! you've killed me! He looked back, and you made him. Oh! my God! my God! he's gone—quite gone, now! I shall never see him again!—never!—never!" and Jenny sank into their arms fainting.

* * * * * *

"What made you promise Arabella that beautiful orange-blossom wreath? you'll want it when he comes home."

"OH, WILLIAM, YOU'VE KILLED ME."

"SO COLD, AND ALONE!"

"No, Charlotte, I shall never want it; she'll never come back. Old Mrs. Crace said one day, before he left, it was a sure sign of bad luck if the shoe did not strike the person on the back; just that if he looked back it was worst of all. I didn't throw mine, for fear, and then for William to do it. Oh dear! it makes me so sad."

"Nonsense, child! he'll come back soon enough. You'll just be two-and-twenty, that's a year younger than I was when I married Mr. Gosling."

"No, Charlotte! he'll never come back!—never! Oh! William! William!"

"Why, silly; what has that to do with it? I've no patience with you giving away all your nice things."

* * * * *

Time passed; three years went by, and Jane was paler. The winter of '48 had come; Jane had learned to know—had grown irritable—unsociable; slapped the children; scolded the servants; read many novels; on the vanity of life. One of her sisters had been married; Jane had said spiteful things about her; Jane was not a family favorite; Jane was unhappy; the more she read the worse she became.

Just then a wealthy suitor of the old school tried to arrange a match with her, through her father, who was willing enough, but she snubbed him most unmercifully; she knew George would not come home to shame and jail she would be contented.

'49 came; Jane was worse. "Try a London doctor." She went to London—saw the doctor, a queer, strange man. When she went in he looked at her a long while without speaking.

"Well, what's the matter with you?"

"She's not positive, and—" began the mother.

"Let her speak. Let her speak herself. What's the matter with you?"

"I don't know," said she, and the tears stood in her eyes.

Poor Jane! She could feel he was in earnest, and kind, too, with all his abrupt way, and that evening she told her tale with many tears.

"Poor child!" he said, stroking her hair. "Don't allow your mind to dwell upon your great trouble—he may come back. You shake that head of yours as though it were impossible. All nonsense about the slipper; and when he does, you'll be better fitted to take care of him, if you do these things, than if you mean and fret yourself into the grave. Another thing. Try cold baths and the skipping-rope, backward and forward. There ought to be a skipping society, with prizes, to encourage that most healthy exercise, as there's a society for every thing now. Don't misunderstand me. I want you to take plenty of exercise. You may read religious books if you like; but don't neglect those other matters, as you have done in time past. Now I must go. You can stay here with my wife as long as you agree. Good-night, my child."

Poor Jane was heard to say that she was happier that evening than she had been before or since, except the night that she walked home with George from—— And Jane said no more then.

* * * * *

"What's come to Jane, I wonder? She's not slapped me for a month—not even when I upset the ink all over her letter to Mrs. Barnett."

"I don't know, Miss Ellen," said Susan, "but she's just as good-tempered and kind as she used to be when George went away—only she seems to be different like—like as though she didn't care for any thing."

Ah, poor Jane! She would not think of her absent one; from morning till night she was as busy as ploughed. Her father noticed the change, and, with the delicate peculiar to some men, supposed she had forgotten George, and, with the rest of the world, thought him dead. He spoke to the rejected of him again pressed his claims, and murmured something about "comfortable home," "father's consent," "not a young man, but healthy, and in respectable," "admiration," "love for her," "if Miss Jane would take him he'd be very happy." She heard him this time patiently, and began to feel that his eloquence was irresistible, the more so that he saw the handkerchief to her eyes.

"Mr. Smithson, I am really very sorry, but I can't do what you ask. I am very much obliged to you for your kind feeling, but I can't be your wife. Though I'm sure I shall never see George again, I love him, and I would not marry any man unless I loved him alone. Don't ask me again. You have known me since I was a little girl that you used to take on your knee—don't, for my sake, ask me again—I must refuse. Let us be friends;" and she held out her hand. He took it.

"My dear Miss Vaughan—my dear Jane, I'm very sorry; I didn't know this—I respect you very much—I—I—if you can't be my wife you must be my daughter. I bought this for my wife, as I thought; I'll give it to my daughter. There, don't say a word more, there's a good girl. I'll see your father."

"And mother, please?" said Jane.

"Oh yes, and your mother too."

He left, and Jane found on the table a handsome gold watch and chain; and Jane wore it, and walked with Mr. Smithson to church next Sunday, and when he came of an evening made his favorite mixture for him; and he, in return, got for her all the information relative to the expedition. Never heard the name of Franklin mentioned in the papers but he worried the Admiralty until they sent him the latest particulars in an envelope with a very large seal.

So passed the time. One by one her younger sisters grew up and found in Jane a friend and confidante. One by one they told her woman's great secret—were over head and they loved. She saw them happy brides and mothers, and not a word of envy did they hear. She nursed their children, romped with them, played with them at all matters—when asked—and became a son to the circle that was about her, so that "Aunt Jane's coming!" was heard as a herald's cry to many little hearts, as well as a sense of peace and repose to older ones. But there was one group among them that was not pleased to see her. Her brother William married, and his children afterward knew that to Aunt Jane his was indebted for almost every thing; from him the man he was; encouraged, helped him, as only a sensible woman can help a young man; and in William's house Aunt Jane was always welcome.

She had strange ways, too, had Aunt Jane; she hated snow; nothing would induce her to see it. She would sit in a room all the time when it was on the ground, with candles instead of daylight; and once, when little George brought her a snowball as bad made, she burst into tears and sent him away, and was not herself again for a long time. Strange, too, that she had the sea; she would, in the spring time, go to the sea-side, to an unfrequented fishing village, and stay in the seaboard cottage for weeks. Some of the children one heard her murmur, "He can't be drowned—he can't be drowned!" and reported that she was mad. She was not mad; she knew of it, and spoke her little George whether he thought so. He wished every body was, if she was, she was so kind—there was no one like her—and nice little boats on the beach: might he have one?

He had his boat—and she was mad, they said.

Poor Aunt Jane, she was mad indeed, and all the children missed her much: no fingers like Aunt Jane's to dress dolls, make kites, or mend clothes. No dance-music like hers, and her body and legs got tired so soon; she would play for an hour at a time; she never danced except with children. And now here was Christmas all and no Aunt Jane—it was not like Christmas at all.

She lay down, never to rise again: they were hurry-stricken to find her dead, and that very evening—it was Christmas Eve—she said to them, "Is there any snow?"

"Yes; it is quite a foot deep."

"Open the window-curtains, and let me see it."

"It's better not," they urged; "it will make you so ill."

"No; it will do me good, now. I shall not see it again."

The sun was just on the horizon, and his deep red light, as the winter's fog hung about him, shone on the sea and on the snow no longer. It was a soft covering of warm red—it was the summer of winter—all was warm with his light.

"Lift me up to see it," she said, and I wonder how it looks where he is. I've heard that it's very beautiful. William, take care of this," and she gave him from under her pillow a parcel in white paper. "You know what it is; and take this letter to Dr. Barnett, and see him, will you? Now bid me good-by, all of you."

They would not leave her.

"No, I ask it as a favor. Do, I will not ask many more. Kiss me, dear," to one of her nieces. I should like to die alone, as perhaps he did—as perhaps he did. To go."

At last they went, one by one, slowly, William last.

"William, dear."

"Jane."

"I forgive you now. Only listen to what Dr. Barnett says, will you? Kiss me once more: now go. * * * He would die of cold—perhaps alone. I will join him by the same road—of cold, and alone."

She rose with great effort, and moved to the window; the sun was nearly lost, the warm hues of red had left it, a dull ivory purple had their place. She opened the window wide, and let the cold blast blow upon her, murmuring, "Of cold, and alone! Of cold, and alone!" God forgive me! It's but a few hours less, and life is so weary!—Of cold, and alone!"

They came in soon, and found her dead. She had gone his road—cold and alone!—with a sweet smile upon her pale thin face.

* * * * *

"You're the person to whom this letter refers, Sir, I presume?"

"I am, Sir."

"Well, Sir, you're a man now, and, to judge by your looks, a sensible one, and can therefore take a little advice from an older man. Jane was quite right, Sir; you killed her."

"Oh, Dr. Barnett!"

"You did, Sir. Mind, I don't blame you for her death; it was a toy's trick, and the only blame attaching to you is in not having told her all its results. But for that she would have been alive now; not happy, but hopeful. You destroyed her hope, and killed her. I know you'll say that it had nothing to do with his fate, and so on; but remember that we are different, Sir, one from another. That turning back of his, as he went away, had no effect on your mind, nor would it have on mine; but she was so constituted that any thing of the kind would receive a powerful influence. Superstitious to a fault, still there was the fact, and it was like a death-blow to her when that happened. There's much to be learned yet, Sir, of even our physical differences: one man is poisoned by what another man takes with impunity. So in our mental differences, there's much more to be learned—very much more; and until this knowledge is ours, we must deal with facts, faults or no faults. The superstition is silly—puerile; still it existed, and should at that time have been respected. She died through it. Good-by, Sir, and God bless you. Some and no one any time you like: I shall always be glad to see a friend of hers."

He offered his hand, and as William felt its grasp he knew how small was his share of blame in the Doctor's eyes.

William is, at this time, regarded as one of the most considerate of men.

One is in the midst of eternal snows and ice—perhaps looked upon for the last time. The other? Has William it still? If not—Where is the other?

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1860.

THE ATHLETIC REVIVAL.

WE devote a considerable portion of our space this week to an engraving of skating on the Central Park. We do so, not only because our engraving is a faithful and graphic picture of the times, but likewise because we wish to record our testimony in favor of skating as a popular diversion.

Skating and other manly athletic exercises the decline of which in the United States has been the primary cause of the unhealthy constitution, the pulmonary men and women, the sickless views, the dyspeptic nose, the puny forms, and the bloodless cheeks which characterize the population of our great cities at the present day.

There was a time when skating, and other athletic exercises, were popular, and we may say universal, in New York, as in our other large cities, for we can still remember the performances of the late King of England, William the Fourth, on skates on the frozen "Collect" —now far from frozen this year as printed and published. After the Collect (or "Kolch," as some antiquarians have it) was built over, and the creeks running up Beekman and Canal streets were filled in, the art of skating fell gradually into disrepute; and the commercial spirit making unusual progress, there grew up here—as it had grown in Boston, and, we are sorry to say, in Philadelphia—the disposition to regard athletic exercises as unfit for the duties and pains of maternity; and the males were devoid of time, thought, and energy. A few on behalf of those who have the good fortune not to belong to this emasculated generation that we plead for skating and all muscular exercises. We refer to the boys, young men, and young girls of the American cities; and on their behalf we desire to see muscular edification spread.

It has been too much the fashion to pronounce our climate responsible for the undoubted decay of our race in our cities. But in reality our climate, though changeable, is not unhealthy. It is not nearly as damp, or as chill, or as squalish as the climate of Great Britain. It is not as cold as that of Southern France or Spain, where they raise uncommonly fine men and women. It is not as cold as that of Sweden and Northern Russia, whose inhabitants are universally well developed. Nor is there any thing in the sudden fluctuations of heat and cold which need breed disease in robust persons prepared for the climate.

The misfortune has been that, in the first place, a large proportion of our people have taken no care to guard against changes of temperature; and, in the second, that nothing has been done to render the body able to look out for itself. We—and especially the females among ourselves—have the habit of dressing unsuitably. Shoes and gaiters are habitually sold for out-door wear which are only fit for ball-rooms, and which are no more protection to the feet than silk stockings. Light linen clothing is worn by men, and still lighter material by ladies, when woolen stuffs would be much more healthy, comfortable, and better suited for the ever-recurring changes in the temperature. In the hottest, as in the coldest, climates, experience proves that the skin should be always regulated in flannel—the texture which absorbs perspiration soonest, and retains caloric longest. Yet how few of us, male and female, wear flannel next the skin!

The main defect in our habits, however, has been in respect of bodily exercise. In every foreign country muscular development is a matter of prime consideration. In France and in England both girls and boys are taught physical exercise at schools, and encouraged by their teachers to endeavor to excel in feats of strength and endurance. Some of the English boarding-schools turn out young ladies of sixteen to eighteen who could wring the necks of some of Sixth Avenue beaux. These English girls skate and run, and leap and skip, and practice gymnastic exercises for an hour or so every day. How much better fitted are they for the practical business of life than the puny skin-and-bone girls who issue from our finishing schools, full of metaphysics, German, and nonsiches, but incapable of walking a mile or nursing a baby!

We are, we hope, on the right track at last. This skating business seems to have aroused public attention. We should like to hear of some of the fashionable boarding-schools going in a body to the skating-pond in the Park. The police arrangements are so complete that they could do so with perfect safety. And if they did, we think that people would form a better opinion of them. If it were announced that Madame A. or Mrs. B. took her scholars to skate twice a week, a good many fathers would conclude that Madame A. or Mrs. B. was the person to be trusted with their daughters. And not a few young men, looking out for wives, and prudently warned of the peril of marrying sickly women, would be inclined to give the preference to the pupils of those institutions over young ladies who could recite Schiller, play Thalberg at sight, or discourse upon "Intellect, Sensibility, and Will."

TAXES ON BACHELORS.

A RESOLUTION has been introduced into the Legislature of Virginia inquiring into the expediency of taxing bachelors, as such. There is precedent for the measure. In the republic of Sparta bachelors were not only taxed, but were subjected to various painful disabilities and annoyances. At Athens and Rome the laws looked with equal disfavor on celibacy; and though there was no whipping of naked bachelors through the streets, the penalty was so adjusted that miserable males who had no children paid more than their share. The same principle is recognized by the laws of France and Germany at the present day: bachelors are liable to military service where married men are exempt.

It must be avowed, however, that in all these countries the motives for discouraging celibacy were stronger than any which exist here. Throughout modern Europe, as in ancient Greece and Rome, the females outnumber the males; hence, even if every man does his duty, and takes unto himself a wife, there will still remain a considerable number of single virgins —who are consequently a dead loss to the state. In this country, owing to various causes—immigration, the frail health of our women, etc., etc.—males preponderate over females. There are parts of the country, as, for instance, in inland towns and villages in New England, where the females outnumber a majority of two to the sex-port towns, and then the frontiers, the males are largely in excess. But, taking the country as a whole, the census reports show that there is rather more than one man to every woman in the country. On the face of it, therefore, the natural tendency of mankind to marry ought to suffice to insure the natural increase of our population without special laws on the subject.

American girls of good education do not know how lucky they are. Every American girl who is sane and sound—and many who are neither the one nor the other—has not one, but many chances of marrying. It is very different in Europe. In the country towns in England marrying men are so rare that it is quite common to see a dozen charming girls, all well-educated, genteel, and lovely, waiting for a half-starved curate or a wretched attorney. Among English mothers match-making is carried on to an extent unknown to us, and is the very highest circles of our aristocracy); and this not from mean motives, but from sheer necessity. In Russia no father expects his daughter to get a husband unless she buys him. Every man who has a daughter begins, when she is eight or ten years old, to save money for her dot—i. e., the purchase-money of a husband. Papa and mamma deprive themselves of luxuries, and even necessaries, to amass a respectable sum; the boys' education is cut short, and their patrimony discounted, in order to swell the dot. In proportion to its amount is the quality of the husband. A father who can give his daughter half a million of dollars may expect a General or a Senator; he who has a hundred thousand to bestow will fix his mark at a rising lawyer, a distinguished author, or a physician; he who has amassed twenty thousand francs will be satisfied with a young merchant or a clever doctor. But he who has no money to give his daughter will never expect her to marry at all. The mariage d'amour is a thoroughly obsolete institution in France. In Germany, and indeed throughout Europe, the rule is much the same. Among the same. A father who expects his daughter to marry must buy her a husband. Hearts were once conquered, the poets say; now they are bought. 'Tis simpler!

Our American girls should indeed congratulate themselves. Censorious foreigners have illnaturedly said that they are neither as healthy, nor as soundly educated, nor as economical, nor as well fitted to be mothers, wives, and housekeepers, as many of their European sisters; yet see how much luckier they are than the girls of France and England!

SEA DREAMS. AN IDYLL.

A CITY clerk, but gently born and bred;
His wife, an unknown artist's orphan child—
One babe was theirs, a-Margaret, three years old:
They, thinking that her clear germander eye
Droopt in the giant-factoried city-gloom,
Came, with a mouth's leave given them, to the sea:
For which his gains were dock'd, however small:
His gains were small, and hard his work; besides,
Their slender household fortunes (for the man
Had risk'd his little) like the little thrift,
Trembled in perilous places o'er a deep:
And oft, when sitting all alone, his face
Would darken, as he cursed his credulousness,
And that one unctuous mouth which lured him, rogue,
To buy wild shares in some Peruvian mine.
Now seaward-bound for health they gain'd a coast,
All sand and cliff and deep-inrunning cave.
At close of day; slept, woke, and went the next,
The Sabbath, pious varlets from the church,
To chapel; where a heated pulpiteer,
Not preaching simple Christ to simple men,
Announced the coming doom, and fulminated
Against the scarlet woman and her creed:
For sidelong-swaying his arms, and shriek'd
'Thus, thus with violence,' ev'n as if he held
The Apocalyptic millstone, and himself
Were that great Angel: 'Thus with violence
Shall Babylon be cast into the sea;
Then comes the close.' The gentle-hearted wife
Sat shuddering at the ruin of a world;
He at his own: but when the wordy storm
Had ended, forth they moved and paced the sand,
Ran in and out the long sea-framing caves,
Drank the large air, and saw, but scarce believed (The soothfake of so many a summer still Clung to their fancies) that they saw, the sea.
So now on sand they walk'd, and now on cliff,
Lingering about the thymy promontories,
Until the mid-west darken'd in the west
And rosed in the east: then homeward and to bed:
Where she, who kept a tender Christian hope
Haunting a holy text, and still to that
Returning, as the bird returns, at night,
'Let not the sun go down upon your wrath,'
Said, 'Love, forgive him:' but he did not speak;
And silenced by that silence lay the wife,
Remembering our dear Lord who died for all,
And musing on the little lives of men,
And how they mar this little by their feuds.

But while the two were sleeping, a full tide
Rose with ground-swell, which, on the foremost rocks
Touching, ripjetted in spirts of wild sea-smoke,
And swirling in sheets of wasteful foam, and fell
In vast sea-cataracts—ever and anon
Dead claps of thunder from within the cliffs
Heard through the living roar. At this the babe,
Their Margaret cradled near them, wail'd and woke;
The mother, and the father suddenly cried,
'A wreck, a wreck!' then turn'd, and groaning said,

'Forgive! How many will say, "forgive," and find
A sort of absolution in the sound
To hate a little longer! No; the sin
That neither God nor man can well forgive,
Hypocrisy, I saw it in him at once,
As it is not true that second thoughts are best,
But first, and third, which are a viper first;
Too ripe, too late! they come too late for use.
Ah love, there surely lives in man and beast
Something divine to warn them of their foes:
And such a sense, when first I lighted on him,
Said, "trust him not;" but after, when I came
To know him more, I lost it, knew him less;
Fought with what seem'd my own uncharity;
Sat at his table; drank his costly wines;
Made more and more allowance for his wife,
Weut further, fool! and trusted him with all.
All my poor scrapings from a dozen years
Of dust and deskwork: there is no such mine,
Now: but a gulf of ruin, swallowing gold,
Not making. Rain'd! rain'd! the sea roars
Rain: a fearful night!'

'Not fearful; fair,'
Said the good wife, 'if every star in heaven
Can make it fair: you do but hear the tide.
Had you ill dreams?'

'Oh yes,' he said, 'I dream'd
Of such a tide swelling toward the land,
And I from out the boundless outer deep
Swept with it to the shore, and enter'd one
Of those dark caves that run beneath the cliffs.
I thought the motion of the boundless deep
Bore through the cave, and I was heaved upon it
In darkness: then I saw one lovely star
Larger and larger. "What a world," I thought,
"To live in!" but in moving on I found
Only the landward exit of the cave,
Bright with the sun upon the stream beyond:
And near the light a giant woman sat,
All over earthy, like a piece of earth,
A pick-axe in her hand: then out I slipt
Into a land all sun and lovesong, trees
As high as heaven, and every bird that sings:
And here the night-light flickering in my eyes
Awoke me.'

'That was then your dream,' she said,
'Not sad, but sweet.'

'So sweet, I lay,' said he,
'And mused upon it, drifting up the stream
In fancy, till I slept again, and dream'd
The broken vision; for I dream'd that still
The motion of the great deep bore me on,
And that the woman walk'd upon the brink:
I wonder'd at her strength, and ask'd her of it:
"It came," she said, "by working in the mines:"
O then to ask her of my shares, I thought;
And ask'd; but not a word: she shook her head.
And then the motion of the current ceas'd,
And there was rolling thunder; and we reach'd
A mountain, like a wall of burs and thorns;
But she with her strong hand tore the steep hill
Trod out a path: I follow'd; and at top
She pointed seaward: there a fleet of glass,
That seem'd a fleet of jewels under me,
Sailing along before a gloomy cloud
That not one moment ceased to thunder, past
In sunshine: right across its track there lay,
Down in the water, a long reef of gold,
Or what seemed gold: and I was glad at first
To think that in our often-ransack'd world
Still so much treasure left: and then I feared
Lest that gay navy there should splinter on it,
And fearing waved my arm to warn them off;
An idle signal, for the brittle fleet
(I thought I could have saved it were it) near'd,
Touch'd, clink'd, and clash'd, and vanish'd, and
I woke,
I heard the clash so clearly. Now I see
My dream was Life; the woman honest Work;
And my poor venture but a fleet of glass
Wreck'd on a reef of visionary gold.'

'Nay,' said the kindly wife to comfort him,
'You raised your arm, you tumbled down and broke
The glass with little Margaret's medicine in it;
And, breaking that, you made and broke your dream:
A trifle makes a dream, a trifle breaks.'

'No trifle,' groan'd the husband; 'yesterday
I met him suddenly in the street, and ask'd
That which I ask'd the woman in my dream.
Like her, he shook his head. "Show me the books!"
He dodged me with a long and loose account.
"The books, the books!" but he, he could not wait,
Bound on a matter he of life and death:
When the great Books (see Daniel seven, the tenth)
Were open'd, I should find he meant me well;
And then began to bind them tight and sore
All over with the fat affectionate smile
That makes the widow lean. "My dearest friend,
Have faith, have faith! We live by faith," said he,
"And all things work together for the good
Of those"—it makes me sick to quote him—last
Gript my hand hard, and with God-bless-you went
I stood like one that had received a blow:
I found a hard friend in his loose accounts,
A loose one in the hard grip of his hand,
A curse in his God-bless-you: then my eyes
Pursued him down the street, and far away,
Among the honest shoulders of the crowd,
Read rascal in the motions of his back,
And scoundrel in the supple-sliding knee.'

'Was he so bound, poor soul?' said the good wife;
'So are we all: but do not call him, love,
Before you prove him, rogue, and proved, forgive.
His guin is loss; for he that wrongs his friend
Wrongs himself more, and ever bears about
A silent court of justice in his breast,
Himself the judge and jury, and himself
The prisoner at the bar, never condemn'd:
And that drags down his life: then comes what comes
Hereafter: and he meant, he said he meant,
Perhaps he meant, or partly meant, you well.

'"With all his conscience and one eye asleep"—
Love, let me quote these lines, that you may learn
A man is likewise counsel for himself,
Too often, in that silent court of yours—
"With all his conscience and one eye asleep,
So false, he partly took himself for true;
Whose pious talk, when most his heart was dry,
Made wet the crafty crowsfoot round his eye;
Who, never naming God except for gain,
So never took that useful name in vain:
Nor deeds of gift, but gifts of grace he forged,
And snakelike slimed his victim ere he gorged;
And oft in Church meetings, o'er the rest
Arising, did his holy oily best,
Dropping the too rough H in Hell and Heaven,
To spread the word by which himself had thriven."
How like you this old satire?'

'Nay,' she said,
'I loathe it: he had never kindly heart,
Nor ever cared to better his own kind,
Who first wrote satire, with no pity in it.
But will you hear my dream, for I had one
That altogether went to music? still,
It awed me. Well—I dream'd that round the north
A light, a belt of luminous vapor, lay,
And ever in it a low musical note
Swell'd and died; and, as it swell'd, a ridge
Of breaker came from out the belt, and still Grew with the growing note, and when the note
Had reach'd a thunderous fullness, on these cliffs Broke, mixt with awful light (the same so that Which lived within the belt) by which I saw
That all these lines of cliffs were cliffs no more,
But huge cathedral fronts of every age,
Grave, florid, stern, as far as eye could see,
One after one: and then the great ridge drew,
Lessening to the lessening music, back,
And past into the belt, and swell'd again
To music: ever when it broke I saw
The statues, saint, or king, or founder fall;
Then from the caps of ruin which it left
Came men and women in dark clusters round,
Some crying, "See them up! they shall not fall!"
And others "Let them lie, for they have fall'n."
And still they strove and wrangled: and I grieved
In my strange dream, I knew not why, to find
Their wildest wailings never out of tone
With that sweet note; and ever when their shrieks
Rose loudest up the gamut, that great wave
Returning, though none mark'd it, on the crowd
Broke, mix'd with awful light, and show'd their eyes
Glaring, and passionate looks, and swept away
The men of flesh and blood, and men of stone,
To the waste deeps together: and I first
My wistful eyes on two fair images,
Both crown'd with stars and high among the stars—
The Woman Mother standing with her child
High up on one of those dark minster-fronts—
Till she began to totter, and the child
Clung to the mother, and sent out a cry
Which mix'd with Margaret's, and I woke,
And my dream awed me:—well—but what are dreams?
Yours was but from the breaking of a glass,
And mine but from the crying of a child.'

'Child? No! said he, 'but this tide's rore,
And his,
Our Boanerges with his threats of doom,
And loud-lung'd Antibabylonianism
(Although I grant but little music there)
Went both to make your dream: but were there such
A music, harmonizing our wild cries,
Sphere-music such as that you dream'd about,
Why, that would make our Passions far too like
The discords dear to the musician. No—
One shriek of hate would jar all the hymns of heaven:
True Devils with no ear, they howl in tune
With nothing but the Devil!'

'"True" indeed!
One of our towns, but later by an hour
Than those ourselves, spoke with me on the shore;
While you were running down the sands, and made
The dimpled flounce of the sea-furbelow flap,
Good man, to please the child: she brought strange news.
I would not tell you then to spoil your day,
But he, at whom you rail so much, is dead.'

'Dead? who is dead?'

'The man your eye pursued.
A little after you had parted with him,
He suddenly dropt dead of heart-disease.'

'Dead? he? of heart-disease? what heart had he
To die of? dead!'

'Ah, dearest, if there be
A devil in man, there is an angel too,
And if he did that wrong you charge him with,
His angel broke his heart. But your rough voice
(You spoke so loud) has roused the child again.
Sleep, little birdie, sleep! will she not sleep
Without her "little birdie?" well then, sleep,
And I will sing you "birdie."'

Saying this,
The woman half turn'd round from him she loved,
Left him one hand, and reaching through the night
Her other, found (for it was close beside)
And half embraced the basket cradle-head
With one soft arm, which, like the pliant bough
That moving moves the nest and nestling, sway'd
The cradle, while she sang this baby song.

What does little birdie say
In her nest at peep of day?
Let me fly, says little birdie,
Mother, let me fly away.
Birdie, rest a little longer,
Till the little wings are stronger.
So she rests a little longer,
Then she flies away.

What does little baby say,
In her bed at peep of day?
Baby says, like little birdie,
Let me rise and fly away.
Baby, sleep a little longer,
Till the little limbs are stronger.
If she sleeps a little longer,
Baby too shall fly away.

'She sleeps: let us too, let all evil, sleep.
He also sleeps—another sleep than ours.
He can do no more wrong: forgive him, dear,
And I shall sleep the sounder!'

Then the man,
'His deeds yet live, the worst is yet to come.
Yet let your sorrow for this one night be sound:
I do forgive him!'

'Thanks, my love,' she said,
'Your own will be the sweeter,' and they slept.

Macaulay.

28RH DECEMBER, 1859.

O DYING year, did'st wreak thy latest scoff
On those who, wearied with thee, bade thee go,
And, parting, did'st with palsied hand shake off
The noblest name our Golden Book could show?
Vain spite! Self-banished, thou shalt pass away,
Bearing his life whose fame was England's pride:
But through the years English tongues shall say,
"That year! An ill one. Thou Macaulay died."

My whole, to men a glorious sight,
Oft to my first brings life and light.

II.

My first, how welcome to the weary band
Of pilgrims toiling o'er the desert plains
Of parch'd Arabia! To them smiling hearts
The very word speaks hope. My second may
Be rich and sumptuous, or poor and mean;
Whate'er its guise, the life of every man
Depends on its supply. My whole is that
Which soothes our woe for those we love,
Governs its evolution, and sweetens healing
The saddest accents of a parting hour.

THE SLAUGHTER OF THE INNOCENTS.

BY JACQUES MAURICE.

[See account of the falling of the Pemberton Mills, at Lawrence, Massachusetts, in No. 160 of Harper's Weekly.]

The clank and the clash and the roar
And the hum of the spindle and wheel,
And the beating heart and busy tongue
Have ceased. Death has set his seal:
The wails, the murderous wails their woe have hurled—
But the awful sound still shakes the shuddering world.

The groan, the shriek, and the prayer,
The mighty dread and fear,
The roar and hiss of the hellish flame
Have ceased. And the pall and the bier
And the hearse have darkened the street and valley and hill:
But the wail of the widows and orphans is never still.

It steals to the rich man's ear
And smites on his selfish heart.
And he knows and feels, as it chills his blood,
In the slaughter his hand had part:
God help that hard man, with his conscience awakened too late!
Already is come a fearful judgment of hate!

The maimed and the ruined shall crawl,
And the whisper and look shall be feared;
And the dead, all the dead, shall stare at him in dreams,
Crushed, bleeding, stark, blasted, and seared:
Immortals among us shall sit and his heart so cold,
For he weighed precious lives against perishing silver and gold.

IRVING PARK, TARRYTOWN.

ONE of the best evidences of a progressive civilization is to be found in the improving condition of the family home. The advancement of a community in culture, in true refinement, and in sound morality is uniformly in proportion to the thriving condition of the homestead, of its appointments, and its associations. Accordingly, when we find our people taking, as they now do, a deeper interest than ever before in the character and location of their dwellings, and in the influences by which their families are to be surrounded, we discern at once the evidence and the cause of a more solid and enduring prosperity.

The true and appropriate home for the family is unfortunately in the country. The man of business may find it necessary to pass some portion of his daily life in the marts of trade, encountering the strife and tumult incident to commercial or professional occupations; but there is no reason why he should establish his household in the same tumultuous arena. The dust and din and spread of a large city is perhaps the necessary sphere, and therefore the proper and legitimate one, for an active man during some part of his life; but it certainly is not the true sphere for his wife and little ones. We are gratified to perceive that this view of the subject is now generally taken by the business men of our great and growing metropolis.

In connection with this topic we take pleasure in presenting to our readers, in the present number of the Weekly, several finely executed illustrations of country seats located in the new Tarrytown Park. For a numerous class of our citizens this particular locality seems to possess (on account of some peculiar features) more than ordinary interest.

The premises shown in our engravings constitute a part of the domain of IRVING PARK, recently laid out in the vicinity of Tarrytown. These grounds, though but lately introduced to the public, have already acquired an enviable reputation, not only for the extent and variety of landscape views which they embrace, but for their admirable internal arrangements, the distribution of drives and walks, and other attractive features.

The gentlemen whose residences we have been permitted to sketch for our readers have indicated, we think, equal taste and judgment in the style of their dwellings, as well as in the locality selected. Differing as their positions do in architectural features, they are yet equally impressed with an air of quiet repose and refined rural enjoyment, the effect of which is agreeably increased by the entire harmony of expression between the structures and the adjacent grounds. Though the buildings are not yet completed we are enabled (by leave of the architects) to present them accurately as they will appear when finished in the early part of May or June. It is proper to state, however, that in these sketches the artist has merely intended to present the aspect of each dwelling as it appears from the approach, without attempting to include in so limited a space the varied and magnificent scenery visible from the veranda of each.

It is a remarkable circumstance in regard to these grounds that the situations are so nearly equal in point of scenery as to make it somewhat embarrassing to decide upon a preference. We think, however, that the position of Mr. Stout's residence is one of the most commanding in the Park, and certainly more attractive, in regard to river views, than any we have seen elsewhere. It is, indeed, every way worthy of the elegant mansion that is about to embellish it.

As the subject of rural dwellings is one of increasing interest to the public, and especially so to the cultivated classes who read our Weekly, we intend in a future number to illustrate some of the fine river views that belong to this Park, in connection with other residences to be erected there in the ensuing spring and summer.

It would probably be difficult to find an area of the same extent better adapted to the purpose of a Necropolis. And Park than this ground. The contrast between the thickly-shaded groves of the lower section, and the wide-spread lawns and terraces of the higher ground, the wild scenery explored by labyrinthine walks in the western quarter, and the picturesque effect of the bold declivities of the east park looking down through the vista of Sleepy Hollow, make up a most agreeable variety of rural scenes. The roads and carriageways leading through these various features of the ground afford excellent facilities for a quiet drive away from the public road, as well as for equestrian exercise, and for juvenile practice in the saddle or the pony-chaise.

We subjoin from the printed circular a brief description of these drives:

"The Western Drive commences at the Lower Entrance, taking a northerly direction, parallel with the Pocantico. Along the eastern side of this road, and extending to the Aqueduct, is a range of moderately-elevated, and finely-shaded ground, called the Croton Range. On the opposite side, and facing the sites of this Range, is the West Park, which is traversed by the Sylvan Road, and by winding walks leading to perennial springs, to the Cascade, to balconies overhanging the stream, and to various other secluded spots.

"The Croton Drive diverges from the north end of the above road, passing to the east and south, across the Aqueduct, and through the rising ground beyond, till it intersects the Central Avenue.

"This Avenue extends from the North Gate of the Upper Entrance, through the central portion of the ground, terminating in the North Drive. On either side of it are several smaller sections of ground, which are enclosed by the entire harmony of expression between the structures and the adjacent grounds. Though the buildings are not yet completed we are enabled (by leave of the architects) to present them accurately as they will appear when finished in the early part of May or June. It is proper to state, however, that in these sketches the artist has merely intended to present the aspect of each dwelling as it appears from the approach, without attempting to include in so limited a space the varied and magnificent scenery visible from the veranda of each.

"The Terrace Road, lying east of Central Avenue, and parallel with it, connects the North Drive with the Circuit.

"The South Drive commences at the South Gate of the Upper Entrance. Taking an eastern direction, it passes near a fine grove of evergreens, and forms the boundary of several unique and picturesque sites. At the point where it reaches the East Park it sweeps around the shoulder of the hill so as to bring the whole of Sleepy Hollow at once into view. Here it terminates in the "Eastern Drive, which follows the ridge of the hill northward to the Pavilion. This drive separates the East Park from the villa sites on the opposite side. Leaving the Pavilion, it descends toward the north (presenting some of the finest inland as well as river views) till it intersects the North Drive."

On the whole, we are inclined to think that this mode of country life is destined to be speedily and extensively adopted in the vicinity of all our large cities. The Neighborhood Park, on the plan of this one at Tarrytown, offers inducements that no ordinary situation in the country can compete with. The difference in the price of ground under this arrangement is less than we should have supposed, and not to be compared with the advantages and privileges which the ground carries with it.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

THE NARRATIVE OF MARIAN HALCOMBE, TAKEN FROM HER DIARY.

* * * * * * *

LIMMERIDGE HOUSE, November 7.

'Tis morning Mr. Gilmore left us.

His interview with Laura had evidently grieved and surprised him more than he liked to confess. I felt afraid, from his look and manner when we parted, that she might have inadvertently betrayed to him the real secret of her depression and of my anxiety. This doubt grew on me so, after he had gone, that I declined riding out with Sir Percival, and went up to Laura's room instead.

I have been sadly distrustful of myself in this difficult and lamentable matter ever since I found out my own ignorance of the strength of Laura's unhappy attachment. I ought to have known that the delicacy and forbearance and sense of honor which drew me to poor Hartright, and made me so sincerely admire and respect him, were just the qualities to appeal most irresistibly to Laura's natural sensitiveness and natural generosity of nature. And yet, until she opened her heart to me of her own accord, I had no suspicion that this new feeling had taken root so deeply. I once thought time and care might remove it. I now fear that it will remain with her and alter her for life. The discovery that I have committed such an error in judgment as this makes me hesitate about every thing else. I hesitate about Sir Percival, in the face of the plainest proofs. I hesitate even in speaking to Laura. On this very morning I doubted, with my hand on the door-handle, whether I should ask her the questions I had come to put or not.

When I went into her room I found her walking up and down in great impatience. She looked flushed and excited; and she came forward at once, and spoke to me before I could open my lips.

"I wanted you," she said. "Come and sit down on the sofa with me. Marian! I can hear this no longer—I must and will end it!"

There was too much color in her cheeks, too much energy in her manner, too much firmness in her voice. The little book of Hartright's drawings—the fatal book that she will dream over whenever she is alone—was in one of her hands. I began by gently and firmly taking it from her, and putting it out of sight on a side-table.

"Tell me quietly, my darling, what you wish to do," I said. "Has Mr. Gilmore been advising you?"

She shook her head. "No, not in what I am thinking of now. He was very kind and good to me, Marian, and I am ashamed of having distressed him by crying. I am miserably helpless; I can't control myself. For my own sake, and for all our sakes, I must have courage enough to end it."

"Do you mean courage enough to claim your release?" I asked.

"No," she said, simply. "Courage, dear, to tell the truth."

She put her arms round my neck, and rested her head quietly on my bosom. On the opposite wall hung the miniature portrait of her father. I looked over her, and saw that she was looking at it while her head lay on my breast.

"I can never claim my release from my engagement," she went on. "Whatever way it ends, it must end wretchedly for me. All I can do, Marian, is not to add the remembrance that I have broken my promise and forgotten my father's dying words, to make that wretchedness worse."

"What is it you propose, then?" I asked.

"To tell Sir Percival Glyde the truth with my own lips," she answered, "and to let him release me if he will, not because I ask him, but because he knows all."

"What if you need, Laura, by 'all?' Sir Percival will know enough (he has told me so himself) if he knows that the engagement is opposed to your own wishes."

"Can I tell him that, when the engagement was made for me by my father, with my own consent? I should have kept my promise; not happily, I am afraid; but still contentedly"—she stopped, turned her face to me, and laid her cheek close against mine—"I should have kept my engagement, Marian, if another love had not grown up in my heart, which was false there when I first promised to be Sir Percival's wife."

"Laura! you will never lower yourself by making a confession to him?"

"I shall lower myself indeed if I gain my release by hiding from him what he has a right to know."

"He has not the shadow of a right to know it!"

† The passages omitted, here and elsewhere, in Miss Halcombe's Diary, are only those which bear no reference to Miss Fairlie, or to any of the persons with whom she is associated in these pages.

"AND RESTED HER HEAD QUIETLY ON MY BOSOM."

"Wrong, Marian, wrong! I ought to deceive no one—least of all the man to whom my father gave me, and to whom I gave myself—but I kissed her lips to mine, and kissed me. "My own love," she said, softly, "you are so much too fond of me, and so much too proud of me, that you forget in my case what you would remember in your own. Better that Sir Percival should doubt my motives and misjudge my conduct, if he will, than that I should be first false to him in thought, and then mean enough to serve my own interests by hiding the falsehood."

I held her away from me in astonishment. For the first time in our lives we had changed places; the resolution was all on her side, the hesitation all on mine. I looked into the pale, quiet, resigned young face; I saw the pure, innocent heart, in the loving eyes that looked back at me—and the poor, worldly cautions and objections that rose to my lips, dwindled and died away in their own emptiness. I hung my head in silence. In her place the despicably small pride which makes so many women deceitful would have been my pride, and would have made me deceitful, too.

"Don't be angry with me, Marian," she said, mistaking my silence.

I only answered by drawing her close to me again. I was afraid of crying if I spoke. My tears do not flow so easily as they ought—they come, almost like men's tears, with sobs that seem to tear me in pieces, and that frighten every one about me.

"I have thought of this, love, for many days," she went on, twining and twisting my hair, with that childish restlessness in her fingers, which poor Mrs. Vesey still tries so patiently and so vainly to cure her of—"I have thought of it very seriously, and I can be sure of my courage, when my own conscience tells me I am right. Let me speak to him to-morrow—in your presence, Marian. I will say nothing that is wrong, nothing that you or I need be ashamed of—but, oh, it will ease my heart so to end this miserable concealment! Only let me know and feel that I have no deception to answer for on my side; and then, when he has heard what I have to say, let him act toward me as he will."

She sighed, and put her head back in its old position on my bosom. Sad misgivings about what the end would be weighed on my mind; but, still distrusting myself, I told her that I would do as she wished. She thanked me, and we passed gradually into talking of other matters.

At dinner she joined us again, and was more easy and more herself with Sir Percival than I have seen her yet. In the evening she went to the piano, choosing new music of the dexterous, tuneless, florid kind. The lovely old melodies of Mozart, which poor Hartright was so fond of, she has never played since he left. She took the volume away herself, so that nobody might miss it out and ask her to play from it.

I had no opportunity of discovering whether her purpose of the morning had changed or not, until she wished Sir Percival good-night—and then her own words informed me that it was unaltered. She said, very quietly, that she wished to speak to him after breakfast, and that he would find her in her sitting-room next to us. He changed color at those words, and I felt his hand trembling a little when it came to my turn to take it. The event of the next morning would decide his future life; and he evidently knew it.

I went in, as usual, through the door between our two bedrooms, to bid Laura good-night before she went to sleep. In stooping over her to kiss her, I saw the little book of Hartright's drawings half hidden under her pillow, just in the place where she used to hide her favorite toys when she was a child. I could not find it in my heart to say anything; but I pointed to the book and shook my head. She reached both hands up to my cheeks, and drew my face down to hers till our lips met.

"Leave it there to-night," she whispered; "to-morrow may be cruel, and may make me say good-by to it forever."

5th.—The first event of the morning was not of a kind to raise my spirits; a letter arrived for me from poor Walter Hartright. It is the answer to mine describing the manner in which Sir Percival cleared himself of the suspicions raised by Anne Catherick's letter. He writes shortly and bitterly about Sir Percival's explanations; only saying that he has no right to offer an opinion on the conduct of those who are above him. This is sad; but his occasional references to himself grieve me still more. He says that the effort to return to his old habits of study quits grows harder instead of easier to him every day; and that he implores me, if I have any interest, to exert it to get him employment that will necessitate his absence from Hampstead. He has given up his new scenes and new people. I have been made all the readier to comply with this request by a passage at the end of his letter, which has also most alarmed me.

After mentioning that he has neither seen nor heard any thing of Anne Catherick, he suddenly breaks off, and hints in the most abrupt, mysterious manner, that he has been perpetually watched and followed by two disreputable men since he returned to London. He acknowledges that he can not prove this erroneous suspicion by fixing on any particular persons; but he declares that the suspicion itself is present to him night and day. This has distressed me, because it looks as if his one fixed idea about Laura was becoming too much for his mind. I will write immediately to some of the most influential old friends in London, and press his claims on their notice. Change of scene and change of occupation may prove to be the salvation of him at this crisis in his life.

Greatly to my relief, Sir Percival sent an apology for not joining us at breakfast. He had taken an early cup of coffee in his own room, and he was still engaged there in writing letters. At eleven o'clock, if that hour were convenient, he would do himself the honor of waiting on Miss Fairlie and Miss Halcombe.

My eyes were on Laura's face while the message was being delivered. I had found her unaccountably quiet and composed when I left her room in the morning; and so she remained all through breakfast. Even when we were sitting together on the sofa, in the interval waiting for Sir Percival, she still preserved her self-control.

"Don't be afraid of me, Marian," was all she said; "I may forget myself with an old friend like Mr. Gilmore, or with a dear sister like you; but I will not forget myself with Sir Percival Glyde."

I looked at her, and listened to her in silent surprise. Through all the years of our close intimacy this passive force in her character had been hidden from me—hidden even from herself, till love found it, and suffering called it forth.

At the clock on the mantle-piece struck eleven Sir Percival knocked at the door and came in. There was suppressed anxiety and agitation in every line of his face—a look, sharp enough, which teases him at most times, seemed to be troubling him more incessantly than ever. He sat down opposite to us at the table; and Laura remained by me. I looked attentively at them both, and he was the palest of the two.

He said a few unimportant words, with a visible effort to preserve his customary ease of manner. But his voice was not to be steadied, and the restless uneasiness in his eyes was not to be concealed. He must have felt this himself; for he stopped in the middle of a sentence, and gave up even the attempt to hide his embarrassment any longer.

There was just one moment of dead silence before Laura addressed him.

"I wish to speak to you, Sir Percival," she said, "on a subject that is painfully serious to us both. My sister is here, because her presence helps me, and gives me confidence. She has not requested and will not hear what I am going to say: I speak from my own thoughts, not from hers. I am sure you will be kind enough to understand that before I go any further?"

Sir Percival bowed. She had proceeded thus far, with perfect outward tranquillity, and perfect propriety of manner. She looked at him, and he looked at her. They seemed, at the outset at least, resolved to understand one another plainly.

"I have heard from Marian," she went on, "that I have only to claim my release from our engagement to obtain that release from you. It was forbearing and generous on your part, Sir Percival, to send me such a message. It is only doing you justice to say that I am grateful for the offer, and I hope and believe that it is only doing myself justice to tell you that I decline to accept it."

His attentive face brightened and relaxed; he seemed to breathe more freely. But I saw one of his feet, softly, quietly, incessantly beating on the carpet under the table, and I felt that he was secretly as anxious as ever.

"I have not forgotten," she said, "that you asked my father's permission before you honored me with a proposal of marriage. Perhaps you have not forgotten, either, what I said when I consented to our engagement? I ventured to tell you that my father's influence and advice had mainly decided me to give you my promise. I was guided by my father, because I had always found him the truest of all advisers, the best and fondest of all protectors and friends. I have lost him now; I have only his memory to love; but my faith in that dear dead friend of mine has never been shaken. I believe, at this moment, as truly as I ever believed, that he knew what was best, and that his hopes and wishes ought to be my hopes and wishes too."

Her voice trembled for the first time. Her restless fingers stole their way into my lap, and held fast by one of my hands. There was another moment of silence; and then Sir Percival spoke.

"May I ask," he said, "if I have ever proved myself unworthy of the trust which it has been hitherto my greatest honor and greatest happiness to possess?"

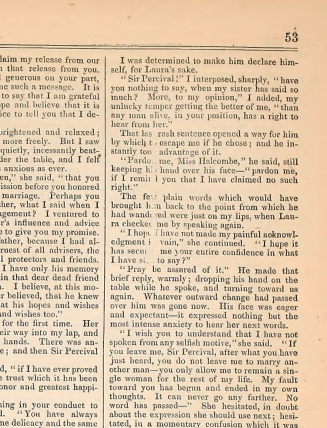
"I have found nothing in your conduct to blame," she answered. "You have always treated me with the same delicacy and the same forbearance, which have deserved my trust; and, what is of far more importance in my estimation, you have deserved my father's trust, out of which mine grew. You have given me no excuse, even if I had wished to find one, for asking to be released from my pledge. What I have said so far, has been said with the wish to acknowledge my whole obligation to you. My regard for that obligation, my regard for my father's memory, will not allow me to go any further, all forbid me to set the example, on my side, of withdrawing from our present position. The breaking of our engagement must be entirely your wish and your act, Sir Percival—not mine."

The uneasy beating of his foot suddenly stopped, and he leaned forward eagerly across the table.

"My act?" he said. "What reason can there be on my side for withdrawing?"

I heard Laura breathing quickening; I felt her hand growing cold. In spite of what she had said to me when we were alone, I began to be afraid of her—afraid she was wrong.

"A reason that it is very hard to tell you," she answered. "There is a change in me, Sir Percival—a change which I am not conscious enough to justify you, to yourself and to me, in breaking off our engagement."



His face flushed so pale again that even his lips lost their color. He raised the arm which lay on the table, turned a little away in his chair, and rested his head on his hand, so that his profile only was presented to us.

"What change?" he asked.

She sighed, and looked downward to me a little, so as to rest her shoulder against mine. I felt her trembling, and tried to spare her by speaking myself. She stopped me by a warning pressure of her hand, and then addressed Sir Percival once more, but this time without looking at him.

"I have heard," she said, "and I believe it, that the tenderest and truest of all affections is the affection which a woman ought to bear to her husband. When our engagement began, I felt that affection was mine to give, if I could, and I came to you with all I could. Will you pardon me, and spare me, Sir Percival, if I acknowledge that it is not so any longer?"

A few tears gathered in her eyes, and dropped over her cheeks slowly, as she paused and waited for his answer. He did not utter a word. At the beginning of her reply he had moved the hand on which his head rested so that it hid his face. At anything but the upper part of his figure at the table. Not a muscle of him moved. The fingers of the hand which supported his head were destined deep in his hair; but there was no significant trembling in them. There was nothing, absolutely nothing, to tell the secret of his thoughts at that moment—the moment which decided the crisis of his life and the crisis of hers.

"AND PINNED IT CAREFULLY IN THE FORM OF A CIRCLE."

I was determined to make him declare himself, for Laura's sake.

"Sir Percival?" I interposed, sharply, "have you nothing to say, when my sister has said so much to you? More, to my opinion, I added, my unlucky temper getting the better of me, "than any man alive, in your position, has a right to hear from her."

That last rash sentence opened a way for him by which to escape me if he chose; and he instantly took advantage of it.

"Pardon me, Miss Halcombe," he said, still keeping his hand over his face—"pardon me, if I remind you that I have claimed no such right."

The few plain words which would have brought him back to the point from which he had wandered were just on my lips, when Laura checked me by speaking again.

"I hope," she said, "I have not made my painful acknowledgment in vain," she continued. "I hope it has not given me your entire confidence in what I have said to say?"

"Pray be assured of it." He made that brief reply hurriedly, dropping his hand on the table while he spoke, and turning toward us again. Whatever outward change had passed over him was gone now. His face was eager and expectant—it expressed nothing but the most intense anxiety to hear her next words.

"I wish you to understand that I have not spoken from any selfish motive," she said. "If you leave me, Sir Percival, after what you have just heard, you do not leave me to marry another man—you only allow me to remain a single woman for the rest of my life. My fault toward you has begun and ended in my own thoughts. It can never go any further. No thought has passed—"

She hesitated, in doubt about the expression she should use next; hesitated, in a momentary confusion which it was very sad and very painful to see. "No word has passed," she patiently and resolutely resumed, "between myself and the person to whom I am now addressing for the first and last time in your presence, of my feelings toward him, or of his feelings toward me. No word ever can pass—neither he nor I are guilty, in this world, to meet again. I earnestly entreat you to spare me from saying any more, and to believe me, on my word, in what I have told you. It is the truth, Sir Percival—the truth which I think my promised husband has a claim to hear, at any sacrifice of my own feelings. I trust to his generosity to pardon me, and to his honor to keep my secret."

"Both those trusts are sacred to me," he said, "and both shall be sacredly kept."

After answering in those terms, he paused, and looked at her, as if he were waiting to hear more.

"I have said all I wished to say," she added, quietly; "I have said more than enough to justify you in withdrawing from your engagement."

"You have said more than enough," he answered, "to make it the clearest object of my life to keep the engagement." With those words he rose from his chair, and advanced a few steps toward the place where she was sitting.

She started violently, and a faint cry of surprise escaped her. Every word she had spoken had innocently betrayed her purity and truth to a man who thoroughly understood the priceless value of a pure and true woman. Her own noble conduct had been the hidden enemy, through-out, of all the hopes she had trusted to it. I had dreaded this from the first. I would have prevented it, if she had allowed me the smallest chance of doing so. I even wished and watched, now, when the harm was done, for a word from Sir Percival that would give me the opportunity of putting him in the wrong.

"You have left it to me, Miss Fairlie, to resign you," he continued. "I am not heartless enough to resign a woman who has just shown herself to be the noblest of her sex."

He spoke with such warmth and feeling, with such passionate enthusiasm and yet with such perfect delicacy, that she raised her head, flushed up a little, and looked at him with sudden animation and spirit.

"No?" she said, firmly. "The most wretched of her sex, if she must give herself in marriage when she can not give her love."

"May she not give it in the future," he asked, "if the one object of her husband's life is to deserve it?"

"Never!" she answered. "If you still persist in maintaining our engagement, I must be your true and faithful wife, Sir Percival—your loving wife, if I know my own heart, never!"

She looked irresistibly beautiful as she said those brave words that no man alive could have steeled his heart against her. I tried hard to feel that the lover was the better man, and to say so; but my womanhood would p.y him in spite of myself.

"I gratefully accept your faith and truth," he said. "The least that you can offer is more to me than the utmost that I could hope for from any other woman in the world."

Her left hand still held mine, but her right hand hung listlessly at her side. He raised it gently to his lips—touched it with them rather than kissed it—bowed to me—and then, with perfect delicacy and discretion, silently quitted the room.

She neither moved nor said a word when he was gone; she sat by me, cold and still, with her eyes fixed on the ground. I saw it was hopeless and useless to speak, and I only put my arm round her, and held her to me in silence. We remained together so for what seemed a long and weary time—so long and so weary that I grew uneasy, and spoke to her softly, in the hope of producing a change.

The sound of my voice seemed to startle her into consciousness. She suddenly drew herself away from me and rose to her feet.

"I must submit, Marian, as well as I can," she said. "My own life has its hard duties, and one of them begins to-day."

As she spoke she went to a side-table near the window, on which her sketching materials were placed, gathered them together carefully, and put them in a drawer of her cabinet. She locked the cabinet, and brought the key to me.

"I must part from every thing that reminds me of him," she said. "Keep the key wherever you please—I shall never want it again."

Before I could say a word she had turned away to the window, and had taken from the table album that contained Walter Hartright's drawings. She hesitated for a moment, holding the book tightly to her hands—then lifted it to her lips and kissed it.

"Oh, Laura! Laura!" I said, not angrily, but reproachfully—for nothing but sorrow in my voice, and nothing but sorrow in my heart.

"It is the last time, Marian," she pleaded. "I am taking leave of him forever."

She laid the book on the table and drew out the comb that fastened her hair. It fell, in its matchless beauty, over her back and shoulders, and dropped round her far below her waist. She separated one long, thin lock from the rest, cut it off, and joined it carefully, in the form of a circle, on the first blank page of the album. The moment it was fastened she closed the volume hastily, and placed it in my hands.

"You write to him, and he writes to you," she said. "Send him back his gift, if he asks after me, always tell him I am well, and never say I am unhappy. Don't distress him, Marian—for my sake, don't distress him. If I die first, promise you will give him this little book of his drawings, with my hair in it. There can be no harm, when I am gone, in telling him that I put it there with my own hands. And say—oh, Marian, say for me, then, what I can never say for myself—say I love him!"

She flung her arms round my neck, and whispered the last words in my ear with a passionate delight in saying them which it almost broke my heart to hear. All the long restraint she had imposed on herself gave way in this first last outburst of tenderness. She broke from me with hysterical vehemence, and threw herself on the sofa in a paroxysm of sobs and tears that shook her from head to foot.

I tried vainly to soothe her and reason with her: she was past being soothed, past being reasoned with. It was the sad, sudden end, for us two, of this memorable day. When she fit had worn itself out she was too exhausted to speak. She slumbered toward the afternoon: and I put away the book of drawings so that she might not see it when she woke. My face was calm, whatever my heart might be, when she opened her eyes again and looked at me. We said nothing to each other about the distressing interview of the morning. Sir Percival's name was not mentioned, Walter Hartright was not alluded to again by either of us for the remainder of the day.

9th.—Finding that she was composed and like herself this morning, I returned to the painful subject of yesterday, for the sole purpose of imploring her to let me speak to Sir Percival about Mr. Fairlie, more plainly and strongly than she could speak to either of them herself, about this lamentable marriage. She interposed, gently but firmly, in the middle of my remonstrances.

"I left yesterday to decide," she said; "and yesterday has decided. It is too late to go back."

Sir Percival spoke to me this afternoon, feelingly and unreservedly, about what had passed in Laura's room. He assured me that the unparalleled trust she had placed in him had awakened such an unswerving conviction of her innocence and integrity in his mind that he was guiltless of having felt even a moment's unworthy jealousy, either at the time when he was in her presence, or afterward when he had withdrawn from it. Deeply as he lamented the unfortunate attachment which had hindered the progress he might otherwise have made in her esteem and regard, he openly declared that it had remained unacknowledged in the past, and that it would remain, under all changes of circumstances which it was possible to contemplate, unacknowledged in the future. This was his absolute conviction; and the strongest proof he could give of it was the generous way in which he now offered, that he felt no curiosity to know whether the attachment was of recent date or not, or to whom the object of it was. His implicit confidence in Miss Fairlie made him satisfied with what she had thought fit to tell him, and he was honestly innocent of the slightest feeling of curiosity to hear more.

He would, after saying these words, and looked at me. I was so conscious of my unreasonable prejudice against him—so conscious of an unworthy suspicion lurking in my heart—of relating on my impulsively answering the very questions which he had just described himself as resolved never to ask—that I evaded all reference to this part of the subject with something like a feeling of confusion on my own part. At the same time, I determined to take one more last smallest opportunity of trying to plead Laura's cause, and I told him boldly that I regretted his peremptory decision to leave me sole arbiter, and induced him to withdraw from the engagement altogether.

Here, once, he disarmed me by not attempting to defend himself. He would merely beg me to remember the difference there was between his situation and Laura's. He was sure, which was a matter of submission only, and his forcing himself to be sure of the future, which was, in other words, asking him to be the suicide of his own hopes. Her conduct of the day before had not only strengthened and increased his admiration of two long years, that all active contention against those feelings, on his part, was henceforth out of the question, but it must think him weak, selfish, unfeeling toward the very woman whom he idolized, and he must bear to my remembrance the fact of his not only putting it to me, at the same time, whether her future as a single woman, pining under an unhappy passion for another man, was to be, or was never acknowledge, could be said to promise her much brighter prospect than her future as the wife of a man who loved her, and who knew she walked on? In the last case there was hope from time, however slight it might be—in the first case, on her own showing, there was no hope at all.

I answered him—more because my tongue is a woman's, than because I had any thing to say and any thing convincing to say. It was only too plain that the course Laura had adopted the day before could not be sanctioned by me, if I chose to take it—and that he had chosen to take it. I felt this at the time, and I felt it just as strongly now. I left him at last, in my own room. The one hope left is, that his motives really spring, as he says they do, from the unbounded strength of his attachment to Laura.

Before I close my diary for to-night, I must record that I have written to my mother's friends in Limmeridge—both men of influence and position. If they can do nothing, I am sure that I am quite sure they will. Except Laura, I never was more anxious about any one than I am now about Walter. All I have heard of his conduct in life, as he has only increased my strong regard and sympathy for him. I hope I am doing right in trying to help him by employing friends. I hope, most earnestly and anxiously, that it will end well.

10th.—Sir Percival had an interview with Mr. Fairlie, and I was sent for to join them.

I found Mr. Fairlie greatly excited at the prospect of the "family worry" (as he was pleased to describe his niece's marriage) being settled to last a little longer. He was entirely out to say any thing to him about my own opinion; but when he proceeded, in his most aggravating and fidgety manner, to suggest that the time for the marriage had better be settled next, in accordance with the wishes of Miss Fairlie, than the misfortune of assailing Mr. Fairlie's nerves with as strong a present against hurrying Laura's decision, I interfered. Sir Percival and Mr. Fercival immediately assured me that he felt the force of my objection, and begged me to believe that they entirely felt with me. Mr. Fairlie, in consequence of my interference on his part, Mr. Fairlie leaned back in his chair, closed his eyes, and was silent for the remainder of the interview. Sir Perc

LETTER FROM MR. BRECKINRIDGE.

The following letter to the Peyton Boswell Committee has been published:

"WASHINGTON CITY, Jan. 19, 1860.

"GENTLEMEN,—The claims of public duty here will deny me the pleasure of participating personally in the compliment which you have tendered to the Hon. Beverly Tucker. I regret this the more, as some one of the objects intended is to bring together men of position and influence from different sections of our common country, in order that they may unite in such an expression of sentiment as will tend to promote peace and harmony throughout the Union."

No man, North or South, who is animated by a patriotic impulse, or who appreciates his citizenship in its high and rational sense, can hesitate to approve the suppression of sentiment which you purport. Events have recently occurred which the reason and the heart of the country deplore and condemn, not only as wrong in themselves, but calculated to loosen the ties of confidence and fellowship by which our people should be bound together. The wrongful attempt of partisans to fasten the responsibility of those individual acts upon a whole section, and to array it before the world in a position charged with such criminality, has provoked a feeling of deep indignation, because of this shameful injustice. The North knows its duties and its rights, and means to fulfil the one and to assert the other, in the Union and under the Constitution. It has no desire to infringe upon any right of the South, nor to encourage, publicly or privately outrages upon or invasions of its territory, or any means by which they may be induced to the commission of these violations of brotherhood by which we have ground into the degrading proportions of a private crime.

"The Constitution was framed and adopted in a spirit of conciliation and mutual concession. If we do not inherit all the virtues, we may at least cherish the precepts and the example of the fathers who projected it by acts of wisdom and patriotism. In the dark hours of the Republic, when civil commotion threatened more than previous than the rash rankings of dissensionists and agitators now do, that Constitution proved to be our sheet anchor and safety. Let us cling to it, in this period of discord and strife, and, no matter what may be the conduct of others, the other in renewing its devotions to all the compromises under which it was formed, and all the obligations which it imposes. Accepted with this purpose, there will be no South or North, but the whole country will be united and happy people, enjoying the blessings and shielding the priceless of a common and glorious country.

"With high respect, JOHN BRECKINRIDGE.

"MESSRS. CHARLES MCBOSWELL, JOHNSTON, AND OTHERS."

THE LATEST FROM PIKE'S PEAK.

From Pike's Peak we learn that the miners were still at work, industriously improving the late discoveries. The election, which had just been held, is looked upon as a decided expression in favor of a separate organization of Jefferson Territory. The news which the mail brings from Kansas Lake is unimportant, the only thing being a desperate encounter between two gangs of desperadoes, the particulars of which are not given.

THE NEW SENATOR FROM TEXAS.

The Herald says: "Several years ago Mr. Wigfall, the late United States Senator from Texas, was a resident of South Carolina, and a member of the Legislature of that State, a difficulty arose between him and Mr. Brooks, the father of the late Preston S. Brooks, and Mr. Wigfall posted Mr. Brooks as a coward generally after the fashion down there. Mr. Bird, a son of the then wife of Mr. Brooks, was to be the second of Brooks, but in ignorance of the difficulty called on Mr. Wigfall, which was in no friendly terms, and told him he was to be his antagonist on the following morning. The two gentlemen were proceeding through the streets together, when Bird opened in question attracted Mr. Bird's attention. Turning at once to Mr. Wigfall, he asked if he was Mr. Wigfall was in author. Mr. W. responded that he was. Mr. Bird then said he could have it down. Mr. Wigfall struck at his peril. Mr. B., however, did it. A shooting affray immediately followed, in which Mr. Bird was killed by Mr. Wigfall. A son of Mr. Brooks, Sen., took up the quarrel and challenged Mr. Wigfall. To this Mr. Wigfall received Mr. Brooks's fire unharmed, and then discharged his pistol in the air. The duel was at this point arrested. Immediately afterward Mr. Wigfall received a second challenge from Preston S. Brooks, and subsequently for his assault on Senator Sumner. This challenge Mr. Wigfall declined to accept. The matter, however, was not allowed to subside, and, to avoid further bloodshed, Mr. Wigfall soon after left the limits of the State and removed to Texas, where he has since resided. From his antecedents there he has now emerged into the Senate of the United States."

TIGHTNESS OF THE MONEY MARKET AT WASHINGTON.

A correspondent of one of the Western papers says: "Washington City is at a dead lock, because there is not a total that no merchant can get $500 from bank here for the very best reason there is not that much money in the treasury. The banks have invested all their money in State Stocks, and there is not a dollar of unemployed money there in Speaker. But that money is scarce here is undeniable every day I hear men who wish to borrow, with the usual difficulty in getting it. It is said that Glentworth, the fugitive ex-Navy Agent, has appropriated the sum of $20,000, expecting to be repaid when the Speaker-ship was secure. But his $20,000 has not helped him, and he shows a blank face and an empty purse to his applicants. But this is one fact and there are thousands of money which may be rewarded as a sign of the times."

FEMALE EXTRAVAGANCE AT NEW YORK.

The New York correspondent of the Boston Traveller writes as follows:

"The attention of my good cousin could during the recession is a pretty good criterion of the state of the money market. To be able to infer, therefore, that New York dollars are well fortified, for certain, it is only necessary to hand over to those fortunate ones the bills left to the present date from at any corresponding period of the year. For example, one firm in Broadway is said to have sold $20,000 worth of fine silks, satins, and velvets, in the month of December, and another $10,000 within the same period mentioned. I have seen one dress pattern of silk in bunch, with its trimmings, cost $1,000. It is of violet color more of the richest quality of purple and purple. There are thousands of dresses of a more moderate character with jupiter of myrtle green, and others of rich with a broad band of black velvet just above the hem. There is a pocket on each side half way between the waist of black velvet, beside which nothing else will do. Hoods of which bang down in graceful folds like drapery. The dress is worn over a petticoat of much silk satin; but the only general effect is elegant and tasteful. Another dress pattern of rich silk, purple in ea of green color, cost $350. It is figured with small bouquets of flowers, and has a rich satin figure flounce, each edged with velvet, but the corsage is the most beautiful feature, ornamented, as it is, with a fichu before the trimmed with black lace. The wife of the former is a Brazilian lady, the former a Philadelphian lawyer; and the latter is said to be the friend of a New York merchant prince to his sister, one of the most beautiful young ladies in Fifth Avenue."

CAUTION TO CHEROOTS.

Rev. A. S. Hudelson, in the Brockport Advertiser, a card of warning to the public, and his brethren, the clergy, in particular, against a woman whom he met the early fall, and who has since deserted and ruined him. He explains how his ruin was accomplished. While conversing with her on the Newport Camp Meeting, a woman, small in stature, wearing specs, of a prepossessing appearance, appeared, passed him in a carriage, told him of her esteem and how much she was worth, and induced him to marry her. He consented, the bond was tied, and she having accomplished his ruin, fled, forsook him, probably to find another victim. Mr. Hudelson tells us that this woman had served two other men out in the same way before—one residing at Bedford, at least, in Wayne, the other in Wisconsin. The Wisconsin victim left a distinctive condition, with three children to provide for. Lest she may inflict similar misery on others of us, we give this remarkable publicity to the statement. Clergymen, who may be single—susceptible as the influence of the sex and the blandishments of fortune—beautiful beware of females small in stature, prepossessing in appearance, wearing specs, pretending to the possession of great wealth, and who pursue men in carriages to effect their ruin.

THE TEMPERANCE DANCE AT WASHINGTON.

An Ohio editor gives his views of several dances which he lately witnessed at a ball in Washington. He says: "The want of variety in this metropolitan dancing was, however, the principal drag upon the pleasure of the waltz and polka. The very obsolescence of the old-fashioned cotillion, and the consequent lack of what is called in question, I are ignored an altogether too cold and formal. The lady for whom I had the honor to escort to the dance, gave me, on his, and the other in his castle, and reel reigns supreme. The old-fashioned jig and reel, the hornpipe, the Virginia reel, which, when first carried by him clod of the floor, go away among the rest of the dances. The gentleman in front throws his head back and his eyes up, like a dying ox; the lady in front of him, with her head on one side, tucks up, swings around, sessons, to all appearance, desires forward, and leaves the ring, to the delight of all present.

PERSONAL.

At the last President's reception Mr. Washington considerable amusement was created during the evening by the rather strange conduct and uniform worn by a gentleman present, who made himself conspicuous by his dress. It was ascertained that he was a stranger from the West, and had just arrived in town. His dress was the worst by some wags, who informed him that he must wear a court dress or military uniform to be admitted to the reception of the President.

The gentleman thus has sufficiently recovered from his attack of pneumoniae catarrh to believe that he will be able to resume his seat in the Senate chamber shortly.

It is rumored that Captain Henry de la Riviere, "the gallant Zouave," is to reduced circumstances in this city, and has offered his services to Mr. Walker, the representative of Lola Montez, has given him a situation as mercantile clerk at a salary of $1,000 with a new suit provided and $40 a month.

Mr. Charles Conor is in a fair way to reap honor and promotion as the hnvest of his speech at the Academy of Music. The Democracy of this city have put him on the ticket for President; and at a meeting of colored citizens in Prince William county, Virginia, resolutions were passed unanimously to a seat on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. Memminger, the Commissioner from South Carolina to Virginia, has been appointed Secretary of the Latter State by the military. He made a speech of four hours' duration, in which he explained the cause of the late efforts, and urged a convention of the Southern States to consider their future relations.

After the close of the Indiana Democratic State Convention at Indianapolis, on Thursday last, Mr. Ben Hill of Georgia, Colonel May and Mr. Denman, had a tete. As Mr. Denman was proceeding to the Bates House in company with Dr. Eddy, Colonel May, who stood on the steps of the Bates House, accosted and struck a blow at Mr. Denman, and he walked to speak to him. Denman struck at May, and the latter fell. Mr. Ben Hill and Colonel "hauled off," and struck a heavy blow at Denman, which was returned. Several gentlemen ran to the rescue on May's forehead, over the eye, which cut a severe gash, requiring several stitches. After the affray passed, those of Mr. Denman doing considerable excitement in the vicinity of the Bates House, and created the combatants. Colonel May was hastily bruised and cut, Mr. Denman escaped with a few slight bruises.

"The Rector Church, in this city, has been under contract from a private letter received in that city from Peterborough, England, that the Rev. Mr. Rector and family of Gerrit Smith has returned home; that his health is fast improving; that Mrs. Rector, who was in a decline, now talks freely on all the great events which have transpired since they left home, and that her memory is fast and shakes every day, but avoids reading and writing; and that her husband is not expected to live, although his case is not yet great. He is, however, round the village as his strength permits, and is able to ride out in a carriage. His temporary alienation of mind his physicians declare to have been caused by the great excitement through which acute dyspepsia was most apparent, and his subsequent restoration to full vigor of mind and body is considered a certainty."

The Secretary of the Interior has applied to the Secretary of War for the loan of a tent, which is to be presented, through the French Minister, to Louis Napoleon. It is a large one, and is intended for the use of the Imperial equipment; sculping-knife, tomahawk, peace-pipe, and other articles of Indian use. The tent, which is of the finest has been spared by way of ornament and decoration.

Kaufbelte, who was shot in Chicago last week, by his partner, Williams, for alienating his affections, is recovering. His life is due, probably, to the fortuitous of his ear, which, when Williams fired at his master, sprang upon him with a ferocity which finally compelled William to make a hasty retreat. The ball cut here for the dog. Williams would most undoubtedly have killed him, as he was completely at his mercy. Kaufbelte has created great regret afterward when informed that the wounded man would recover.

The Philadelphia Press has reason to believe that G. W. Jones intends to resign his seat in the Senate, and the former office of British Consul at Richmond, Virginia.

ENGLAND.

PRESENT POSITION OF THE "GREAT EASTERN."

MR. CAMPBELL, Chairman of the Great Ship Company, has issued a statement of the present position and prospects of the Great Eastern. He points the state of affairs as follows: The directors can represent, in every material way, the present trouble arises from dissension in the Board of Directors. The directors have communicated with the correspondence with the Government, in which the same old ground is covered by the Great Eastern has been created to other vessels under the subsidy system. Mr. Gladstone replied to this intimation by stating that nothing can be done until the Committee on Contracts make their report.

THE LAST ENGLISH ELOPEMENT.

The Scottish Observer of December 31 gives the following particulars of the late English elopement: "We have much pleasure this week to record the elopement of the wife of a gentleman of considerable wealth and landed property, Dr. Ogg at Hunstone, near Maidstone with the Rev. Mr. Green, curate of the Rev. Lewis Hensley, at Hunton. It seems that the painful fact was discovered by Mr. Bannerman on his return from a day's hunting; and his surprise was no doubt that the elopement had been planned many weeks before, and only put off for a favorable opportunity. The guilty people were traced to Gravesend, but they had got four hours' start of their pursuers, and Mr. Bannerman only learned that they had crossed the water in a boat that had been off Gravesend for some days. It is stated that they had been seen with a brace of loaded pistols, as if determined upon extremities in case they had been taken. The eloped, his occasioned the most painful feeling among all classes of the community, and the commiseration for the injured. The curate, Mr. Green, had always been looked upon with respect for his quiet and unobtrusive manner of life, and Canon Moore, the rector of Hunton, had a particularly good opinion of him. He has property of his own right amounting to £100,000." It appears that before four months had elapsed Mr. Green had contrived to make her his wife, but the father refused, and eventually Mrs. Bannerman, who is a rich Dutch merchant.

FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR'S SPEECH ON NEW-YEAR'S DAY.

According to custom the Emperor on New-Year's Day received the members of the diplomatic corps in his suite at the Tuileries. The following is the list of the speech recorded in the Moniteur.

SPEECH OF THE EMPEROR TO THE EMPRESS.

The Papal Nuncio addressed the Emperor as follows:

"SIRE,—In the name of the entire body, which composes the diplomatic body around your Majesty, I have the honor, Sire, to offer you its respectful homages."

REPLY OF THE EMPEROR TO THE AMBASSADOR.

The Emperor replied as follows:

"I thank the diplomatic body for the good wishes it has expressed on the event of the new year; and I am especially happy to be able to have an opportunity of confiding its representatives that since my accession to power, I have never had any other thought than that of preserving peace. He then assured that he counsel of my colleagues, and that I have never had any other wish but to recognize the Central Power of Italy, and to maintain united out of the Emperor and the Duchies, either as an independent kingdom or as part of the Sardinian States, to take our stand on accomplished facts, and leave the Pope and his supporters to their fate.

The Daily News remarks that the projected Congress is not likely to meet soon, and that the last few great appearances indicate that the contemplated European Congress will not be held, and argues that the Government of England in such a case will be so much better. It says: "Lord John Russell has not yet declared that he will shut his mouth and leave it to recognize the Central Power of Italy, and to maintain united out of the Emperor and the Duchies, either as an independent kingdom or as part of the Sardinian States, to take our stand on accomplished facts, and leave the Pope and his supporters to their fate.

The Paris correspondent, writing on the 1st of January, says: "The report from Paris that the Emperor would be confirmed for the end of January, but the exact day was unknown.

A dispatch, dated Rome, January 3, says that the Due de Rauzzano has been commissioned to the Holy See with the pamphlet, "The Pope and the Congress," does not mention the pamphlet, but says that Rouher's explanation produced an excellent effect on the Pope, and it is not hoped that he would not object to be represented at the Congress.

EFFECT OF THE NAPOLEON PAMPHLET.

The Russian Chancellor, Count Kisseleff, has declared to Count Walewski that the pamphlet "Le Pape et le Congrès" represents the views of the Emperor Napoleon in question, with which Russia does not intend to interfere unsuspected by the Emperor in the prospect of a meeting which the Russian Government is founded, and that, consequently, Russia considers the pamphlet as nothing else by that pamphlet.

Advertising in a telegram received by Count Rechberg from Prince Metternich, Count Walewski has declared to the Diplomatic body that the Congress will be the occasion at the head of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, the pamphlet "Le Pape et le Congrès" should not be considered as the programme of the French Ministry.

A DINNER AT COMPIEGNE.

A correspondent of the Morning Post to the Liverpool Journal a description of private imperial life at Compiegne, from a dinner at which he was lately to be present at a "little dinner" with the Emperor and Empress, and a "little dinner" it was:

"The dinner (now my friend in his letter) was most superb. Nine spirits of the old Bourbons must have returned from Elysium to see it. The old plate and glass of the French Court since their day, the eating and drinking is more abundant and augur better; and every thing is in the most splendid style. The way the Emperor is allowed by the nation to rule the roast to entirely, for none could have it in better hands."

THE DINNER.

"After dinner the company adjourned to the salon. My arm was adjudged to Mademoiselle A., who seemed an attractive young lady, with large nose and dress, a specimen of a species yet unknown among us, and limited even French Empire—a blue stocking. The young lady is on the most pleasant terms with the Empress, and is the daughter of a French lady who keeps a most amusing match between them on the terrace of the Chateau. Mademoiselle A. has published a volume of Philippics to that of Menander—which the young lady says, the Empress has translated into English, and having almost wished right through the window of the Chateau, I found myself engaged to the edge of the terrace.

CHAT WITH THE EMPEROR.

"The coffee taking was a very pretty sight, the different groups in various parts of the salon seemingly enchanted over each other's conversation. I was the perfect stranger to them all, stood aloof, looking on, as I thought, unobserved. Suddenly I felt a tall personage at my elbow, leaning the mantle-piece, against which he had been leaning himself, and looking in the same direction across the room in the direction where I stood. His Majesty stood immediately behind me, with a most easy sprung or elasticity in the hips; and I was observing this with a sort of envy, when I felt a touch on my shoulder, and called me by name, in that peculiar voice through the nose which is so well known in England also, so distinct, as from an empty vessel. 'Monsieur de Salete is here.' I was quite taken aback, and turned round, and on and properly: you are very young, and have a grand country before you.' He patted me kindly enough on the left hand, leaving the left corner sticking up, while the right was still in my pocket. I felt very much as I used the gracious compliment, proceeded: 'We have many members of your family in France.' 'Indeed, Sire, Parisians. Are you acquainted with him?' 'No, Sire.' I returned, promptly, for the question displeased me entirely. His Majesty saw the effect, and patted up the right side of his mustache, and again spoke through his nose: 'You are going to leave?' Le Tems en Grenoble, to-night: what is your opinion of that place?' I think it very clever, Sire, but should have thought it rather risque for representation here.' 'Ah, indeed!' His Majesty looked serious, and looked me in the face for the first time. He smiled—a curious, grim, and meaning smile—and, through his nose, once more replied: 'I am quite of your opinion, M. de Sante. Bon soir.' He turned away, and I found myself alone, where he stood alone until the company adjourned to the theatre.

A PROVERB BEFORE THE SUPPER.

"The Queen was in supper, and the merry din-toll of the castle tolled one," when a proverb was proposed by Madame le Comtesse W——, in the performance of which it was announced that the whole company were to join without knowing it. Some two or three ladies, and half a dozen gentlemen then rose and began to jump and dance in the most grotesque manner, laughing the while so heartily as to cause the audience to catch the infection, and the cachinnations became general. Then Madame W—— was asked for a song and standing up, she waved her crimson fan, and sang a French song of a pastoral kind, with such inimitable humor that the whole party was convulsed with laughter. Then, and long after, she kept up her air in amusement to guess the proverb thus illustrated. When Madame Lind-Goldschmidt had concluded with her choir, the Princess M—— was called upon for her contribution; and with a pretty affectation of her position, to be allowed to sing a diplomatic song quite appropriate to the occasion. Would we learn the solution of the proverb? said the company, who prepared to pay the penalty—a forfeit of a kiss. The Princess is quite young, full, and thin, with rather a melancholy cast of countenance. Having heard the proverb sung and judged when she, too, began to jump from side to side, with one hand on her hip, and the other waving, with the other flapping to and fro her coincidence, and bursting forth with the following lamentable ditty:

"Monsieur de Metternich—
Monsieur de Kopernich—
Monsieur de Schwartzenberg—
Des alumettes chimiques—
Sont allee a Zurich—
Sont allee a Zurich, etc., etc.,

and so on for several verses, amidst the new repeats-ess laughter of the company, and the announcement that the performance was over. It was not necessary to inquire further to do them guess the proverb all this wild folly was meant to typify. The Princess was evidently unsuccessful, and at last the originator of the idea was called upon to explain. It was simply this: "Un jour y a de Roux pice or ri," an old English proverb, which may be rendered: "A day of roast pork is a day for the merrier," without its selfish addition of "the fewer the better cheer."

THE END OF CRINOLINE.

The Express correspondent writes: "The race of crinoline appears to be run. The most influential leaders of fashion have given the fashionable female world fair full two years. It was only a question of time to see the end of lapse in the rotundity of the Paris élégantes, and the only cause of wonder is that it has not occurred sooner. Ladies, my friends, The mode has gone out as it came—as the fad of Bloomerism has gone out. The fashionable fragments to be a hint that future additions to the Emperor's family are rather to be expected, and the general knowledge that "amplitude" came into fashion at the identical moment that the Empress Eugenie was anxiously looking for the advent of Napoleon IV."

HOW NEW SILKS BECOME FASHIONABLE.

He said:

"And I can give you an authentic anecdote—which will ensure the immediate and unconditional fate of New York, to open their black, blue, grey, white, and yellow the merit, too, of being short, and very much to the point. A lady, who is the wife of a man of a large business, had, last year, the misfortune to meet with an accident in the street, which broke her left leg, during which the tissue cave out of the dye-house indeed, as an accident of the kind is apt to do, and the dividate test expected. Appearances indicated that the fracture would not heal, and that the amputation of the half-ruined goods; but, like a keen man of business, he came in person to the bed-side of his wife. 'Let me see,' said he, 'this stuff, disturbed a few fracas, and the trick was accomplished. He had the stuff cut up into strips, and trailing down the boulevards, or the Champs Elysées, completely in the fashion. The stuff was found to be reunited among the patronesses of the 'latest style.' And you have seen the result. Every one is wearing the stuff, and courting the fixed gaze of the petrified passer-by—if you have seen a woman in the street, you have only to wait of dress between illegitimate brindle and rusty yellow—that was it!"

ITALY.

THE NEW PILOT OF THE MORTARA CASE.

A dispatch from Modena says that in the discussion of a demand made by the family of the boy Mortara, who had given great offense to the Austrian party, and was ordered by the Reverend Father and Inquisitor Zitelle, the latter had been arrested. Legal proceedings had been instituted.

SPAIN.

THE WAR WITH MOROCCO.

Telegrams dated Madrid, January 1, say: "On Friday evening the Moorish camp was attacked and conquered, but were repulsed with great loss. The Spaniards occupied great loss. The Spaniards occupied their position, but their loss was not considerable. The number of peace having been concluded is altogether false.

Another dated Madrid, January 2, says: After a glorious fight, the Spanish army, commanded by General Prim, stormed the Moorish camp at Tetuan, and advanced as far as Gastilleges. The Moorish executed several heroic charges, but were put to flight.

The Moors were 40,000 strong, and lost at least 1500.

The Spanish loss was 1000 killed. It was the greatest colonisation persists in the army.

The Moors are calling upon the English flag and carrying contraband of war had been brought from Ceuta to Algesiras.

JAPAN.

DEPARTURE OF THE ENVOYS TO THE UNITED STATES.

A letter dated Kanagawa, Japan, October, 11, says: "The United States frigate Powhatan arrived from Jeddo yesterday, with the Japanese Ambassadors aboard. Mr. Wood, our Minister to China, returned to-day by land. It is now determined that the Japanese Government will send Commissioners to America, to start on the 15th of February next, in the Japanese steamer Kanrin, and convey them to Panama, where they will cross the Isthmus to the United States steamer Roanoke, lying in the bay.

"Our Minister was desirous that the Japanese should have in charge of them a vessel of our own Navy, as America in the best season of the year, and also be presented to the Japanese Government. The Powhatan will not start the day of departure. There will be two Commissioners and a suite of about sixty persons in the Embassy.

"Our Minister, Mr. Harris, deserves the greatest praise for the manner in which he conducted affairs. He will establish Law—last Japanese should never leave the island under pain of death—and having Japanese visit America before any other land, although great efforts have been made to induce them to England also.

"Documents posted yesterday by which the departure of the Japanese for the United States will occur to them and remain until February, to protect the interests of the Japanese Government. The Japanese speak in the highest terms of the Japanese, and are told to have been very kind to them.

"Part of the men of the Kanrin Copper have been detailed by the Commander to the Roanoke.

AFRICA.

NEW EXPLORATIONS OF AFRICA.

We learn, on authority which we consider perfectly reliable, that Government has decided upon providing Dr. Livingstone with a new steamer for the purpose of enabling him to carry out his exploration of the Zambesi. In addition to this pleasing evidence of the interest with which the present administration views the efforts for opening up Central Africa to the influences of civilization, Dr. Livingstone has received a further grant from the Royal Geographical Society of £250 to the further exploration of the great Nyanza Lakes of Africa. The details of this latter expedition will be intrusted to Captain Speke.

SKATING ON THE LADIES' SKATING-PO

ND IN THE CENTRAL PARK, NEW YORK.

SKATING ON THE CENTRAL PARK.

We publish on the preceding pages a fine picture of skating on the Ladies' Pond at the Central Park. This agreeable exercise has become very popular since the managers of the Park have organized their arrangements for the season.

There are two, or rather several ponds, which are divided into two heads—the Ladies' Pond, and the Gentlemen's Pond. The latter is a large space, which, when the skating is good, may be seen covered with a couple of thousand people. Here every one may try his skill, and tumble about on the ice as he pleases. The Ladies' Pond is reserved for the fair sex, and no gentlemen are allowed to skate on it unless they are accompanied by ladies. It is kept in good order, and policemen on skates effectually repress all tendencies to rowdyism. Both ponds are flooded from time to time from the reservoir, and thus, however much the ice may be cut up by skaters, every morning presents a clean pleasant surface to visitors—provided the night have been cold enough for the water to freeze.

The scene when ladies are on the pond is attractive in the extreme, and usually draws a large concourse of visitors.

Shakspeare, when he puts into the mouth of Touchstone that celebrated dissertation on the different degrees of removal in a quarrel, is able, it will be remembered, to dispose of his subject within seven heads. It is not so with the degrees of tumbling. This voluminous and most important topic can be done justice to in fewer than eight divisions. A greater degree of condensation, a more merged classification have been attempted, but the result was found to be imperfect, as the reader may depend upon the subjoined analysis as being reduced to the narrowest limits compatible with a conscientious examination of the subject.

There are—to deal with the matter after the Touchstone manner—eight degrees, forms, or modes of tumbling—no more, and no less. The first is, first, the "Flirg utter;" secondly, the "Smash complicated;" thirdly, the "Stagger victorious" fourthly, the "Smash inefficient;" fifthly, the "Drop sudden;" sixthly, the "Fall factious;" seventhly, the "Tumble truculent;" and, eighthly and lastly, the "Crash unresisted."

Let us now examine each, and go into their fearful subject a little more in detail, beginning of the beginning—with the Flirg utter. He who has accomplished the highest possible degree of speed known to the annals of skating, strokes suddenly against some projection of foreign matter which has become embedded in the ice—be it a stone, a frozen twig, or what not—and is then thus checked, finds his feet cut up into the air, and presently his body in such violent contact with the ice that he slides along upon his shoulder and his ear diffuses over before his legs have descended to the same level with the portions of his anatomy just hinted at—this man, we have known, knows what it is to have experienced the Flirg utter. It is a condition of tumbling wholly dependent upon, and inseparable from, a great degree of speed; and although we associated with that phenomenon known to skaters as "the outside edge." This Flirg utter is a pitiless accident, and is frequent and terrible, and can be attended by the following symptoms: a smart tingling in the ears, a sensation as of a rush of blood to the back of the head, a vision before the eyes of numerous black tadpoles ornamented with diamond frontlets or coronets, and floating in the air, a sudden taste of base metal in the mouth, a conviction on the part of the sufferer that his neck has become shorter, that his vertebræ are jammed together, that his heart is between his teeth, that his legs are in his body, that his body is up in his head, that his stomach is collapsed, that his hands are affixed to his ankles and his feet jammed into his wrists. Let us go on to the Smash complicated.

This is an accident strangely connected with peculiar states of the nervous system. You see a man advancing upon you; you have the option to avoid him, but you can't; a hideous fascination draws you on, you meet with a dread concussion, you exchange a mild cuff edge to hand, nose to eye, your hat drops off, so does his; you perform together a frenzied waltz, which brings you to a slide; you stumble; remotely, all the muscles of the sliders descend upon you, and you form the centre of an entangled mass of arms, legs, and bodies, in which no person can identify his own till, the great crash over, the sufferer crawls out of this seething mass of humanity on his hands and knees, and very commonly finds a recess or dimple in his hat, which brings the career of that article of costume to an untimely end. This is a brief history of the Smash complicated; we pass from the number of persons involved in it, and the manner in which all the victims of the accident become mixed up together in one common ruin.

We now come to the Stagger victorious, and the Scramble inefficient. It has doubtless been the lot of most persons who have looked on at the sport of skating to have their attention drawn to the contests of some individual engaged in that pastime, who suddenly, and for some unexplained reason, flings his head and body back, stamps seven times with the heels of his skates, which his arms around, casts his stick into a distant parish, plunges forward, swerves, advances several hurried paces, and then more wildly than before, revolves, clutches at the air, bows himself double, again flings himself back, recovers himself and his balance without any actual fall, and stands perfectly still for several minutes, with his hands supporting the small of his back. This is the Stagger victorious, concerning which it may be said, in one word, that it is a mistake, and that it is better to tumble down at once than to trick the back, strain the abdomen, and dislocate the limbs generally, by the manœuvres just described. But if the Stagger victorious is a mistake, what is the Scramble ineffectual—a performance in which an acrobat goes through the whole of the above-mentioned extravagances, and tumbles down after all?

This is the most disappointing and the most humiliating of all modes of falling: the unhappy victim of the Scramble ineffectual having secured the attention of every body present by the prolonged struggle which precedes his ruin.

Perhaps, however, the most undignified of all tumbles is that which has been characterized as the Drop sudden. It is a very simple transaction, commonly unattended with serious results, and consists, to put the affair in two words, of a sudden (and involuntary) sinking down on the part of the sufferer, who drops, without any apparent cause, upon the ice in a sitting posture, with his legs stretched out straight in front of him. It has been remarked by great observers and profound thinkers that the patient in this case will ordinarily remain in this position for some minutes before attempting to rise; that he is apt to look about him; and that, after picking up his hat, when the Drop sudden is finished off, he will take a handkerchief therefrom, and carefully blow his nose while still in the sitting position. From these observations the profound thinkers aforesaid have drawn the conclusion that the Drop sudden is a less alarming seizure than any other to which skaters are liable.

Let us speak of the Fall factious. The Fall factious is, in its earlier stages, intimately mixed up with the Scramble ineffectual. It is generally preceded by the same resistance and staggering, and even the Fall itself has a distinguishable character of its own. It is in this case a repetition of the tumbler and not of the tumble. He who treats the Fall in the factious manner (which is unknown in every limb) get up with a smiling countenance, joining the laugh against himself, and even sometimes murmuring a few words of complimentary remarks about his own clumsiness, or faintly humming a lively air. Let no person be taken in by this. Instances have been known of skaters driven by the Fall factious have skated for three minutes and a half after their accident just as if nothing had happened, and have then come quietly back around the swift circle in which they have been performing, and, coming to the conclusion that nobody was looking, have quietly taken their secret island, and have been found there, hours afterward, sitting among the water-fowl, and grumbling with anguish.

The Fall factious, though a less candid, is a more amiable view of our subject than that exhibited in the Tumble truculent. In the latter struggle is a man of a somewhat savage but a sincere and open character, who, when he is in a rage and in considerable pain, chooses that it is not to be concealed the fact. It is his habit, as is the case with most dangerous characters, to dine early, and he has come out to skate immediately after his meal. Under these circumstances the shock of a severe fall is no doubt to be considered as a shock to digestion; yet is this no efficient defense of the fury with which the Tumbler truculent turns upon the small boy who has come to skate with him. "Does the devil he is laughing at?" It must not be forgotten that (at least as far as the present writer's knowledge extends) no skater has ever been seen or heard arisen from any fault on the skater's part. He has either been tripped up, or has stumbled over some accident in the ice; and the Tumble truculent, in the ice itself, as the case may be, will at such times come in for certain remarks which are the reverse of complimentary. It is addressed to the display rendered on the ice; and a man will meet with no sympathy who resents his fall as a deadly injury.

We have now got to the consideration of this great subject to the eighth and last division of falls, and the Crash unresisted remains alone for consideration. Perhaps, of all the modes of tumbling, there is none so opposed to this last upon the list as the Scramble ineffectual. Just as the skater in that instance declares himself to be helpless, as in the case of the Crash unresisted, he takes the accident as it comes, makes no resistance, and only defends the last instant when the force of his legs into the air and the descent of his body upon the ice to a rapid act of self-preservation, in so ordering his fall that the freshest portions of his frame, and not the more bony angles, shall sustain the full force of the impending crash. This is perfect wisdom; and, in carrying it out, he will find the advice of Sancho Panza, on the best means of enduring a blanketing a considerable service.

"If such mishaps do come," he says, "there is nothing to be done but to shrug up one's shoulders, hold one's breath, shut one's eyes, and let one's self go whither fortune and the blanket please to toss one."

THE POLICY ON THE "MARY HASTINGS."

It was certainly a most extraordinary circumstance—though of course a little out of the line to do with it—and it made a great sensation at Bristol. I was a girl at the time, and just had my hair put upward.

I remember, as well as if it had only happened yesterday, my papa returning home one evening with the news that "Hyson Dodge" was dead at last. This Hepburn Lodge was quite a joke with us: it had been unoccupied for an age, and was in a sadly dilapidated state.

We were naturally very anxious to learn all we could about the aforesaid mysterious old bachelor's mansion. We young girls were nearly crazy with curiosity.

The dear papa was the first to bring us consolation. He had heard it from a friend, who was told by a lawyer, who knew the surveyor of the repairs, that Doughty was the name of our myth. "If what they tell me is true," added our papa, "he is the son of old Doughty, the Colonial Brewer, and worth fifty thousand at least. Now, girls, put your best looks on and dress to the nines, for he will want a wife, they say, and he might pass his time looking for one." My papa was a very witty man, and though a church-warden, excessively merry.

This Mr. Doughty became the king of Stonyford and Fiddleton. I was much shocked and pained at witnessing the almost rude manner in which the young ladies of those towns openly pursued him. So were my dear sisters—all fine girls —greatly hurt.

For it was soon noised about that Mr. Doughty inclined toward matrimony. He made no secret of his desire to settle. The flocks of Stonyford maidens, from thirty to fifteen, were shaken with trembling hope.

There resided in Bristol a gentleman of the name of Fairlop, a ship-broker, or an underwriter, or something. At any rate, he was engaged among the shipping, and insured voyages against loss at sea; so you will know what he was. He kept up a good establishment, had a carriage, and an only daughter—Clara, if I remember rightly. At this ship-broker's house Mr. Doughty was in the habit of dining two days in the week. He was discovered, by a young lady friend of ours, making desperate love to this Clara—a mere chit, I can assure you, and dressed in short frocks.

This deceitful conduct will be better understood when I tell you that this man Doughty had, by his debauched gambling, thrown away two-thirds of his princely income; and finding it difficult to renounce the grandeur in which he lived, he, with the gentleman's cunning, was answered by a rich marriage to restore his squandered fortune. There's a villain for you! He had learning, somehow or other, picked up five thousand pounds; and the ship-broker had been heard publicly to state that he would double the sum on her marriage-day, provided the money be saved. These pennies amounted to about twenty thousand sovereigns, and every day he lived he was still adding to his gains.

We were always told from the first that Clara Fairlop was to become mistress of this opulent old ogre. Her pa and ma calmly desired her to love Mr. Doughty; and she, like a good girl, answered, "she would do as they bade her." She bought jewelry for her, and she wore it. He had his miniature painted and set as a brooch for her. When people of fashion called and talk, the Fairlops gave a ball, and introduced the future son-in-law to their guests.

We soon discovered that Clara actually had two strings to her bow; for there was a Mr. Orlando Tidd, who, until Mr. Doughty made his appearance, had been a great favorite. Now this unhappy young Tidd was cast aside and discarded. Wretched young man! I have sympathized with Tidds for his wretched lot that she remarked, "If he had any courage in him, he would call out his deceitful rival, and disfigure him for life." And who was this Orlando Tidd, do you think? Why, Mr. Fairlop's managing clerk, and once his pupil. He had been articled to him on an excellent character. He had paid a heavy premium to be trifled with in that manner. He was very modest, nervous, and retiring. He was not poor, for his father left him three thousand pounds.

While Doughty was love-making, a circumstance happened which turned the tables in a manner highly gratifying to many poor girls. The ship Mary Hastings (A 1), homeward bound from India, with a cargo of rice—calculating by her speed on former voyages—two months behind her time. She had not been spoken with, neither had she put into port. Of course the conclusion people could come to was, that she had gone down in the middle of the sea, and all hands had perished. The owners were in consultation, for the cargo was worth more than a hundred thousand pounds. As a last experiment, they tried to effect insurances, at a premium of their loss. Yet, the affair was so hazardous, no underwriter would accept the risk, even with a premium of twenty, thirty, forty per cent, but in vain. It was a rich harvest for a highly speculative man, providing the ship did not sink. Mr. Fairlop was a desperate man at a venture. Forty per cent! He and Tidd made inquiries as to the character of the captain, examined his eye, paper at the owners's offices, and at last accepted insurances to the amount of forty thousand pounds, to be paid in a month's time, if lost—not else. The Bristol merchants said Fairlop was mad, and Orlando Tidd, who had put his three thousand pounds into the venture, a fool. Doughty was the only wise man. They were vulgar, but to the point.

The news of this silly speculation was carefully concealed from the Fairlops; but it was not long before Charles Doughty was enlightened. He had four warning letters, from four different friends, delivered by as many hands; and read them, one after another, while he tried to eat his breakfast. Like many others, he considered his papa-in-law a fanatical man; threw down his cup, knocked over a cup of tea, and spasmodically clutching at his egg, crunched it between his strong fingers. Was he to marry the daughter of a bankrupt? Was he to have 'mamma-in-law writing beggling-letters for his spoonal maintenance? Was he to have a wife who could obtain some post as clerk? Those were not his views at all. He must, somehow or other, send Mr Fairlop to the Bench. But how? What was he to do? That you shall know presently.

This point brings me to the mention of a spirited mine, Fred by name, who allowed himself to be guilty of a very mean action—led on by others, I know—but still nothing could, or shall, excuse his conduct.

One night, about twelve o'clock, Freddy and some upcurious young men, friends of his, greatly excited by hot glasses of spirits and water, were mentioning about, when they caught sight of a tall individual, wrapped up in a heavy cloak, hurrying along the street at a pace which looked like either escaping from justice or fetching a doctor. "I'll watch him and see what he is up to," cause the proposition to him him; or, in other words, rush after the man. They were undecided what to make of him, when they saw the form stop opposite the post-office, and stoop down to examine the opening to the letter-box. He looked about him, this tall man, and then, up the street and down the street. He saw the wild herd of clerks trotting toward him; and hastily pushing his letter into the opening, he darted off just as the hunters came to alarm the street. They would have passed the post-office in their mad chase, if Freddy had not noticed something whitish lying on the pavement. It was the letter. The mysterious stranger, in his alarm, had missed the slit in the shutters, and dropped the note. It was picked up and examined. In justice, it must be said, their first impulse was to slip it back into the box; but while trying to read the address by the gas-lamp, it was discovered the envelope was open. Yes, it was open, and to open it seemed no more than looking in at an open door." It was handed round—every one read the address, "Martin Fairlop, Esq.," and suggested, as the writing was very good and distinct, that it was either a bill or a lawyer's threat. All these young men knew Mr. Fairlop, and the gravest talk the Mary Hastings speculation had occasioned sharpened their curiosity to an edge which was dangerous for such young hands. In short, to make my story, it was thought that the contents of this letter should be made public, vows of secrecy being first enforced, sacredly, naught, and suggested, as the young men—

"SIR,—The interest I take in your welfare, and that of your family, forces me to a step which the world considers unjustifiable, but which I hope, for the good results, if not by its honest intentions, obtain your pardon. As a friend, I write to you, and I hope you will be united to Mr. Charles Doughty. Be warned in time. At any sacrifice save your child from assured misery. A dear friend is a liberties to warn you of a place in your family. You, perhaps, look upon him as a reformed and excellent man. Place no faith in the deceit. But yesterday I heard him boast to his dissolute companions of his intended marriage, and of his return to his debauchories, and had a life which I am sure is quite contrary either to the hopes of your daughter, or to your own peace of mind."

"There's no signature!" cried Fred. "It's an anonymous letter. Here's a go! What a blackguard! eh?"

It would seem that Mr. Orlando Tidd was no favorite among these reckless lads. He did not admire the modesty of getting into the office-night conduct and tastes caused him to be considered a molly-coddling fellow. They did not dare to say as much to his face, owing to high respect for Mr. Fairlop's managing clerk. But they had no opportunity of "paying him out" could not be missed. What a joke it would be to get Mr. Orlando Tidd at the end of this anonymous letter! What a coddling he got! Ha! ha! It was capital! It is the beloved Miss Clara, and Fairlop would be sure to believe his clerk wrote the letter. He might deny it in vain. Who knows Doughty except the city Capital! It is such good fun to see any body cared! Excellent! So an imitation of this poor gentleman's signature was appended to the anonymous warning, and this time the person who posted it, not being in a hurry, placed the letter very carefully in the box.

Can you guess at the writer of this disgusting anonymous epistle?

Mr. Fairlop was in quite trouble enough without Mr. Doughty's interference. The end of the month was drawing unpleasantly near, and yet no Mary Hastings (A 1) made her appearance. He, like every body else, began to look upon himself as a ruined man, and to reckon how many pence should be taken off his offer to pay the forty thousand pounds insurance money. His only hope was that his rich son-in-law might step forward and help him. Unfortunate creature! Even in his office he would call Orlando Tidd into his private room, and, with much sighing and groaning, in care-worn and solemn as fire-work makers, both certain of ruin, they would try to prop up each other's extinguished hopes. "Courage, Tidd! Cheer up, spare your hair, Tidd!" or "Four days may alter matters, Mr. Fairlop!" The unfortunate Orlando was too heart-sick for grief to give much support from such thin expectations, and Fairlop was giddy with alarm.

On the 28th of the adventure with the letter Mr. Fairlop, though he drank more than a bottle of port, scarcely closed his eyes; and when he rose in the morning was as sickened from his bed as not, for his life, shave himself. As he crept down to the breakfast-room, he thought, as he trod on the thick stair-carpet, of the day when he would be hanging out of window with the auction bill fastened on them. As he looked round on the well-furnished rooms, he wondered what his inlaid table or that gilt clock would fetch under the hammer. After hours could not decide all. Then something Miss Clara was happy enough—wretched girl, practicing her piano overhead. "Whatever happens," thought Mr. Fairlop, "she will be left in the way of an honorable man, and tenderly shielded from the effects of my ruin."

While this ship-broker was looking at his breakfast, and wishing it was over and taken away, Mr. Orlando Tidd entered the room. He gave such a smile as he looked at the food as Mr. Fairlop thought it useless to ask if he had any good news. "No, thank you, he wouldn't have any coffee!" he would only take a chair, and a small piece of that, for he sat on one corner, and looked unsteady. Every now and then he took a glance at the beloved maiden behind the urn, and wished Mr. Doughty had never been born. He knew he loved her more than any other man possibly could; he was sure that if, in time, she could accustom herself to his weak eyes and long thin legs, she would become sensible of his enormous affection, and return it with gratitude. She had laughed at him, and called him names, but nothing could drive him away. She had even made him post letters to Mr. Doughty, and consulted him about the future arrangements at Hepburn Lodge; and yet I ever be back at school meeting her, or doing her a kind action, he never missed it. He remembered the night of the ball, when, feeling very courageous after supper, he had stammered out a kind of proposal, and she had told him "her pa" would be so angry if he heard of it, and be sure to turn him away from the office. He had recovered, now, from that cruel, unsentimental, and innocent speech. The common sense of his quiet, steadying courtship might have melted the stiff girl. She was growing tired of being cruel to such a calmly-certain lover. He took her unkindness with cool resignation and humility. Many times the idea crossed her that Orlando would make a much better husband than this Doughty; but papa and mamma were on the side of the Hepburn Lodge marriage, and the clerk was outbalanced.

A servant came with a letter for Mr. Fairlop, need I add, the letter—which the reader has already read?—Mr. Tidd left.

Mr. Doughty was to have breakfasted with his beloved that morning, and Clara was vexed at his breaking his appointment. She was exceedingly arbitrary in her likes, and ruled very strictly during her short reign of courtship. She did not brook delays, but the way she flashed with it on her bread cravings, proved she was in a pet. "I have a great mind not to love him," she thought. To be truthful, she had.

When Mr. Fairlop had read a few lines of his letter, he gave a short sneering laugh. He was annoyed at the loss of any tool likely during interference in his family affairs. "Who the deuce has sent this?" he asked himself, as he turned the page in search of the signature. He did not wish his daughter who the writer was; but she saw his arm fall down, his eyes light up, and his mouth open, as if on the point of saying, "Clara," he said, pushing the letter toward his child, "this concerns you quite as much as it does me." The moment he looked at his child, his tongue ran away with him. "And I have had such faith in that man Tidd. I, who brought him up from a child, you etc." He could not even steer an to his daughter's feelings had he watched her instead of chatbering. Her eyes grew bright as she read such words as he might have been from indignation. Her hand shook at first, perhaps with rage. There was a determined-looking compression—half smile, half scorn—about her little mouth, as if she could shake this Tidd, or that Doughty. She put down the letter after reading it, and then stared vacantly by her over looking right through her father, apparently focused on some object about fifty yards on the other side of the wall. "I did you ever read such an infamous, cowardly attack?" asked papa. Miss did not reply for a second, and then said, "I do not consider it cowardly because he signed it; but, for Mr. Doughty's sake, I hope it is infamous."

"Hope!" cried Fairlop, who was half mad at the bare thought of ever attempting to keep such stuff this marriage. "Hope! why, hasn't the follow the impudence to advise you? Hasn't he the assumption to advise Mr. Doughty his views? Hasn't he . . . ? Hope! why, hasn't the follow impudence to advise you? Hasn't he the assumption to advise Mr. Doughty his views? Hasn't he . . . ? Hope! Hope, indeed!" Miss Fairlop, poor girl, was the footman announcing Mr. Charles Doughty, "Ask him in, directly; he shall see this letter, this pair!"

"Oh! papa! papa! you do not. Suppose they should fight?"

The entrance of Mr. Doughty prevented any reply to this suggestion. Mr. Fairlop looked vindictive and pugnacious. The wretch Doughty, whose connection with the anonymous letter the shrewd reader has already guessed, knew in a moment the cause of this domestic disturbance. "Got the letter," he thought to himself.

He had prepared the counsel himself to set up to and confirm his anonymous warnings. His chin was black with a two-day's beard; his face had been smudged, but washed; the shoulder of his coat were drab with dust, and his shirt collar dropped like a frost-bitten leaf. Altogether he gave Fairlop to think that he had not been to bed, and was still half-tipsy. He seated himself and began to yawn. A very perceptible smell of stale cigar smoke came from the dirty man. The footman had no gave Miss Clara so enraged her that she left the room, and was presently heard overhead consoling herself at the piano.

As Doughty did nothing but yawn, and hold up before his wounded fingers decidedly not rose-tipped, Fairlop began the conversation with "Did you ever, Charles, receive an anonymous letter?" Mr. Charles looked as if they've got mine," and was obliged to hide a smile of delight in a yawn. "No, Sir," he replied, "never! and if ever I do, I shall quietly put it in the waste-paper basket the moment it catches sight of the contains. It is a method of attack I despise, and against which nobody can keep guard."

"If you will promise me to be calm," said the broker, rising, "I'll tell you something that will startle you."

Unfolding the letter, he added, "This is not an anonymous letter; it is signed; but it does not look like merit a caning."

The sudden animation that shot into the rogue's face, the animal-like look, the jerking up of the head and opening of the hands, made a wrong impression upon Mr. Fairlop. He ascribed this emotion to indignation, whereas this Charles was muttering to himself, "Signed! signed! I never could have been such a fool." He took the letter, examined it, and answered, with extraordinary impudence, "No; I can not say I know the handwriting." Then he ran his eye over it, as if he had never seen it before. He was a man of consummate effrontery. When he reached the end of the page, he looked up and said, as if half to himself, "Who could have written this? It is evidently some one who knows me well, or he couldn't betray me." This speech was intended to startle Mr. Fairlop, and it was successful. The father-in-law was going to say something in a great hurry, but words-law stopped him by asking, "Give me the name of this villain—what I do in my own house concerns no man but myself! Give me his name!" Do you see how cunningly he kept on admitting the truth of the letter. Do you think anybody but himself would have told to such a man? He acted his part so well, Mr. Fairlop really felt grateful to Mr. Tidd for warning him in time, and made up his mind to forbid the marriage. He could hardly speak civilly as he said, "if you will turn the page over, the signature is on the other leaf."

"Orlando Tidd!" muttered the startled Mr. Charles, and for several minutes he sat perfectly quiet, wondering how on earth the signature got there. "Have I ever seen this Orlando Tidd?" he asked. "You my word I don't know the fellow!"

He waited for a reply; but Mr. Fairlop was deeply engaged looking out of window, watching a man who, had in hand, was tearing up the street with the speed of a hunted cat. This man was so dangerous as a run-away horse, he sorter quietly lighting his cigar and knocked over as he took his first whiff, and a ladies' school was sent flying into the road like so many sheep. "Good heavens!" cried Fairlop, catching sight of the runner's hat face; "there comes Tidd! Can any thing have happened?" He opened the room, and was fortunate enough to open the street-door in time to prevent his clerk from dashing his brains out against the knocker. The prospect of good news made Mr. Fairlop forget all about the warning letter.

Before the clerk could get breath enough he was trying to speak, and the master doing his utmost to understand him. Nobody else but a man in fear of ruin would have been able to translate the various pants and stutters into these words: "Mary Hastings—seen off the Lizards—late last evening!"

The disgraceful wretch in the parlor was listening intently. He heard Mr. Fairlop, in a half-hysterical voice, say, "Thank God!" and Orlando Tidd congratulated him on the fortune the speculation had brought. Then, turning to Orlando, and, thrusting the letter close to his face, asked savagely if he knew "that handwriting." The clerk—almost recovered from the excitement inlied the calligraphy, admitted it was a very fine, bold hand, but replied he could not recognize it.

Turning the letter, Mr. Fairlop looked at the signature, and shouted, "Will that help you —perhaps you can tell me who wrote that?" If it be cruel, and likely to prove the work of guilt, then Mr. Orlando must have appeared highly criminal; but his reply was, "It is my name, Sir, and, on my honor, I never wrote it." At the broker could say was, "It certainly is a most singular circumstance," but his head was full of the Mary Hastings, and the fortune in the daylight. You slandering rogue, I shall horsewhip you."

We are not going to look upon scenes with chin legs and weak eyes as being noted for bravery; but our rogue, for once, made a mistake. With a great dignity Mr. Fairlop walked from card-case. He was a meek gentleman; but to be so grossly insulted by his rival was beyond his endurance.

It has been already stated that the news of the safe return of the Mary Hastings, A 1, spread over Bristol in four minutes and a half. The extraordinary good luck of the Hepburn Lodge connection was the talk of every office. My nephew, Freddy, who knew the Fairlops well, the moment he heard the thrilling news, ran off to Clara, and, thinking to be the first to congratulate the broker, darted off at a speed which nothing but Mr. Orlando's long legs could have equaled. The latter managed to worm his way into the parlor just as the discussion about the duel was at its height. The moment he saw Mr. Fairlop's face he guessed the man in the long cloak who dropped the letter. On the sofa sat poor Clara, crying; and Freddy, while trying to comfort her, was in a very tender-hearted boy), learned all the particulars of the quarrel, and how Mr. Tidd was going to fight a duel without a letter to anybody to be delivered in case of accident.

There was but one honorable course for Freddy to take; that was to credit, in the first place, the letter was lying on the carpet. He took it up, examined it, knew it directly, and, springing among the disputants, told Mr. Tidd to say, "And I'll take my oath," shouted Freddy, bless him, "that he" (pointing to Doughty) "is the man who dropped the letter. I'd swear to him if he was to dye his face black, and so could four other fellows I know." All the low wretch could stammer out was that he should be very glad for Clara to be insulted, and banging the door to after him, he marched himself off.

Little Miss Clara married Mr. Orlando Tidd, and Mr. Fairlop gave Freddy a present of five guineas.

THE END OF THE WORLD.

THERE are in every generation some presumptuous men eager to penetrate the inscrutable, and to read for us through their narrow spectacles all that has been foreordained by the Divine Wisdom. Their chief occupation is always making an End of the World. They can not foretell whether their mutton will be burned at the next dinner-time, but when the world will be burned up they tell us that they do know to a year, and sometimes almost to an hour. They wish to tell us the date of its end as distinctly as the sage, quoted by Chevreau in his History of the World, had calculated the beginning of it to have been Friday, the 6th of September, at four o'clock in the afternoon, a period which he states in his French idiom to have been "four hours after dinner." Some have fixed the ending of the world will, and some say that it will not, bring about the conversion of the Jews. The belief in the end of the world is not Jewish and Christian only. A doctrine of the final tumbling together of all things into chaos was held by the old heathen philosophers and poets, taught by Empedocles and Heraclitus, sung by Lucretius and Lucan. Seneca wrote in a book of consolation, "When the time comes, and the world, seeking renewal, is destroyed, things will, by their own powers, wound each other, the stars will strike together, and when all matter is kindled, all that now shines will shine now shines in its order will be burned up."

The Stoics were much more informed as of the manner of the world's destruction. It is to be taken to pieces, some have taught, in the order in which, as a mechanism, it was put together. A writer quietly added being first removed. But when the question of destroying all the stars arises, then vain man, unacquainted with them, has to dismiss, and does boldly discuss, the probability of all the worlds that fill the heavens being inhabited like ours, and therefore being inhabitants—if they have any—may run of being destroyed with us for our sins.

Then, again, sections of speculators have decided for themselves whether the world is to be destroyed by natural agencies—as by fire from its centre, or by the stroke of a comet—or by means wholly miraculous. The time to be occupied by the destruction has been also variously settled. Some know that it is a day's work; others have equally sure that as there were six days of creation, so there will be also a gradual process of destruction. Some have taught that the fire which burns our earth were slowly decomposing into their elements, the signs foretold to the prophets would be happening. We are assured now that the signs are happening, and we are often told that men are not so large as they were even.

It was an old Jewish doctrine that the world would last six thousand years: two thousand before the Law, two thousand under the Law, and two thousand under the Gospel. In the Christian Church there has been question whether the heaven and earth would be burned up by any, or whether only all their evil was to be destroyed out of them, and they were to be renewed.

In our own day the most remarkable expounders of the secrets of the Most High dwell especially upon the thousand years that are to come after the end.

These men have taught that the duration of the world was thought to be bound up with that of the Roman Empire. Then every comet, every earthquake, was to be a prophecy, whether of Salone, wrote, in the fourth century, to Saint Augustine, asking him whether it was true that the end of the world was at hand. Saint Augustine replied that a few years of respite would most probably be granted. From year to year the date was set forward in the fourth century, when there was a special expectation and dread, lasting till the year one thousand, which had been definitely fixed as the end of the world. "Whereas the end of the world is approaching." When the thousandth year was reached, and the world, despite there was a new reason why gifts should be made to the clergy. A new lease was granted to mankind, and there followed a new era, a renewal and redecoration of the episcopal churches, monasteries, and chapels, which took place all over Europe. The illustrious Charlemagne, in the reign of Leo the Emperor Basil the Second, was incessantly tormented by men who would predict the very hour and minute of the end of all. This Emperor, who wore monastic dress under his state armor, whom his people cursed and his Church blessed, had cares enough of his own, and he bade rich refuge, and his courtiers and flatterers were busy as ants about him, making galleries under the earth against the day of judgment.

In the year eleven hundred and seventy-nine the Eastern astrologers sent letters all over the world, announcing that on the 20th day of the ninth of September, seven years after date, the end of all things would be brought about by storms of wind. Terrified people surprised when the time came by gentle zephyrs and the mildest autumn weather.

In the year fifteen hundred and twenty-four there was great terror because John Stoffler, a German astrologer, had predicted universal deluge for the month of February. There were many great conjunctions in the constellation of the Fishes, which foreboded a terrible visitation by flood in all lands and among all creatures. Men in France, England, Spain, Italy, and elsewhere, fled from the low grounds to the mountain the hills. A Professor of Divinity at Alcala wrote a book, blaming the great cost incurred in removals, and suggesting that there would be no flood, but counseled to built himself a boat raised on four pillars. Nevertheless, this February, in which all Europe was prepared to see the waters flood, turned out to be "extremely clear and fine." In Hall's contemporary chronicle we read that, in this year, because of the signs, many people victualled themselves and went to high grounds for fear of drowning, and specially one Bolton, who was prior of St. Bartholomew's, in Smithfield" (but the story, true as to many, was a mistake as to Bolton), "builded him a house upon four-score-of-the-Hill, only-for fear of this flood, and thither he went, and made provision for all things necessary within him for the space of two months; but the faithful people put their trust and confidence only in God. And this rain was, by the writers, prognosticated to be in February, wherefore, when it began to rain in February, the people were much afraid, and said, 'Now it beginneth!' but many wise men which thought that the world could not be drowned again, contrary to God's promise, put their trust in Him only, but because they thought that some great rains might fall, by inclinations of the stars, and that water-mills might stand still and not grind, they provided for wind, and yet, God be thanked, there was not a fairer season in many years. And, at the last, the astronomers, for their excuse, said that in their computation they had mistaken and miscounted in their number an hundreth years."

In 1588 the Sieur Andrea announced that in two years the world would come to an end, and that immediately after ward all the powers would fall to pieces, and there would be darkness.

A famous book in the history of Physical Science, "Whiston's Theory of the Earth," professed, on its title-page, to show "the Deluge and the General Conflagration perfectly agreeable to Reason and Philosophy." This reverend gentleman was—in accordance with the scanty knowledge of more than a century and a half ago—the philosophical writer who could prove in the abstract of this earth.

One day the Duchess of Bolton pretending to come to court in a great fright, explained that she had been at Mr. Whiston's, who told her that the world was to be burned up in three years; and that, for her part, she was determined to go to China. Certainly that was a place quite out of the world. Horace Walpole's reflection upon the matter was: "For my own part, I comfort myself with the humane reflection of the Irishman in the play that we can live no less—I am not covetous."

In our day, End of the World cries are to be heard in plenty. We are still also taught by interpretations, quite, able in their ingenuity to tell us who is the Beast. Greek letters represent numbers. The number of the Beast is six hundred and sixty-six. By any man's name written in Greek letters, the numbers represented by the letters are cast up, and if their sum prove to be six hundred and sixty-six, or whatever other number that number may be interpreted to mean, the man is proved to be the Beast. Upon this principle Martin Luther has been denounced, and John Martin Luther, his name being spelled Lauter for this purpose, has been denounced. Napoleon Bonaparte was detected as the Beast, and the last of this series of discoveries, not many months old, proves in a learned book entitled Popery, more than six hundred pages long; if the number of pages had but been six hundred and sixty-six, the book would might have been more conclusive.

We are ashamed that there is need to call attention to the emptiness of all these false pretensions to a kind of knowledge that no man possesses. Another writer of a large look, lately issued from the press, seeing the Scarlet Woman in the Papacy interpreted for us the history of what is yet to come. Rome is yet to place her foot upon the necks of kings before she is swallowed up in the abyss.

A contemporary French wiseacre interprets Scripture for us into the cry of an approaching "End of the World through Spiritualism." The science cracks under its own weight, and is about to fall in utter ruin on our heads. It is no mistake to say that "Science" "See," he says, "what our globe, that immense ocean, with its phosphorous fires, and its fish of both kinds, with its elements so combustible that the volcanoes catch fire at it incessantly, and never go out for want of fuel till the sea shall have been deserted them. See, on the other hand, this chemical product burning in the water, true Greek fire, which will lay open the road to a hundred other discoveries of the same incendiary. And understand how, some day or other, conflagration may be kindled in the world." Fire set to the Thames or Seine or the Rhine or the two great capitals of science, by an unforeseen chemical accident, will spread over the Channel, raise the North Sea and the Atlantic into a mighty blaze, and the more water the more fire. The Pacific will blaze up, the rivers will run flame, and every thing life will be reduced to a cinder.

Wherein are these our contemporary specula tions better than that of the Judas who fixed Anti christ in the thirty-first year of the reign of Constantine? that of Dionysius of Alexandria, who promised him in the days of Valerian, or those who promised that the end of the world should begin when Lady Day fell upon Easter-eve. An old French wiseacre, M. Julien, taught that "Antichristianism was born about the year 1000, and that fifty: it shall die about the year seventeen hundred and ten. This may happen sooner, but I do not see how it can happen later, unless it be seventeen fourteen." And he fixed the beginning of the Millennium for the year seventeen hundred and seventy-seven. Another wiseacre now fixes it for eighteen sixty-seven. Richard Brothers, a presumptuous oracle in the days of the war with the United States, thought that "the very loud and unusual kind of thunder heard in January, seventeen ninety-one, was the voice of the angel mentioned in the ninth chapter of Revelations," and fixed the 15th of August, ninety-three, for the destruction of London. "Write, Sir," said Brothers to a printer, "and publish an old Suffolk woman ninety-four years ago; 'the High Priest, the High Priest shall never have another Christmas dinner!'"

The last, and at this particular moment most notorious, of these would-be prophets is a clergyman, to whom we have already referred, who talks big words empty of wit, and streams incessantly the phosphorescence of foam from all his mouth. He points to the wars and the police reports; tells us, in his own inflated way, that "there is at present an area accumulation and intensity of meteoric agencies in the air which no previous year has witnessed"—did he never hear of the plagues of the Middle Ages?—observes a general "dereliction of moral obligations," and fills for us a windbag of coming tribulation. "I hope," he says, "soon to publish a photographic sketch of the Millennial state, as a companion to this volume." The next step in audacity will, perhaps, be an advertisement of Heaven in the Stereoscope.

THE LATE LORD MACAULAY.

We give herewith an accurate portrait of the late Lord Macaulay, from a photograph by Messrs. Maull and Polyblank, of London. It was taken only a year or two since, and is probably the most recent picture in existence.

Lord Macaulay was fifty-nine at the time of his death, having been born in the first year of the century, at Rothley Temple, Leicestershire, England. He should have been by fair rights a Scotchman, "if a bowls had rowed right," as a zealous nationalist of that appropriating race expressed it, while tracing back the family history of the historian to his grandfather, a parish clergyman of marked ability, minister of Cardross, in Dumbartonshire—a locality which once made a very handsome contribution to the gayety and spirit of the world, in the good gift of the infant Tobias Smollett.

We have seen it stated that the English settlement of the family originated in one of the sons becoming tutor to a young gentleman of wealth in that country—a Mr. Babington. The tutor married his pupil's sister, and thus Thomas Babington Macaulay was born an Englishman. His Scottish origin, and his representation of Edinburgh in Parliament, has often led the world to think of him as a Scotchman; though some of his historical notices of the people of that nation, combated zealously by Scottish writers, may have disabused the public mind of the impression.

The future historian, Thomas Babington, the eldest son, was educated at home, and prepared for the University under a private tutor and the instructions of an English clergyman—a course which left some of the best years of life for the purpose, with his precocious development, free for the accumulation of his extraordinary stores of general knowledge. Macaulay entered Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1818. His University course was a triumph; he obtained the hard-won rewards of a Craven Scholarship and a Fellowship, while his reputation became established in the lighter successes of the Belles-Lettres, and as an extraordinary talker and debater. The year after his entrance his poem "Pompeii" obtained the Chancellor's Medal—an eloquent production according to the standard of those things, but, like most of them, mere rhetoric in rhyme, deficient in the inner graces of poetry. The picture of the Pompeians at a sacrifice, themselves the sportive victims hastening to death, though with strong obligations to Pope's lamb cropping his "flowery food," a type of men's ignorance of the future, is striking:

> "The milk-white monarch of the herd > they lead,
> With gilded horns, at yonder shrine
> to bleed;
> And while the victim crops the bruided plain,
> And frisks and gambols toward the destined fane,
> They little deem that, like himself, they stray
> To death, unconscious, o'er a flowery way;
> Heedless, like him, the impending stroke await,
> And sport and wanton on the brink of fate."

It was an even chance at the outset whether Macaulay would turn out a popular writer of verse or prose. He has solved the problem by success in both departments. His first hit was in rhyme. The two Songs of the Huguenots, "Ivry" and "The Armada," and of the Civil War—"The Cavalier's March to London," and "The Battle of Naseby"—all of which appeared in Knight's Quarterly Magazine in 1824, gave unfailing promise of the "Lays of Rome."

Macaulay wrote for the Quarterly Magazine, besides his ballads, several thoughtful and spirited prose papers—"A Conversation between Cowley and Milton," "Criticisms on Dante and Petrarch," and others—remarkable as exhibiting thus early some of the turns of phrase which have grown into his most profitable mannerisms. Knight's Quarterly was conducted on a kind of club affair, and the contributors are introduced at the outset in the manner of the old essayists. Macaulay is called by his nom de plume. The dialogue which ensues in the examination is a very fair criticism on much of the author to the present day. His reputation for simile was thus early established: "'Tristram Merton, come into court!' There came up a short, manly figure, marvelously upright, with a bad back—like Addison—and one hand in his waistcoat-pocket. Of regular beauty he had little to boast; but in faces where there is an expression of great power, or of great good-humor, or both, you do not regret its absence." Tristram begins to talk of old authors—Aspasia, Pallas, Socrates. The remark which follows, by the master of ceremonies of the magazine, is noticeable: "His tone had just so much earnest that what he said was felt as a compliment, and just so much banter that it was felt as nothing more."

Is a certain hollowness and insincerity inherent in the author's style?

Tristram goes on with a pretty allusion to "the poor prince in the Arabian tales," when he is cut short with "a truce to your similes" and the threatened hard infliction of "silence for an hour," the most intolerable of punishments to a great talker. "A penalty for similes! horrible! Paul of Russia prohibited round hats, and Chilna of China denounced white teeth; but this is atrocious!" "I beseech you, Tristram, if you can, for a moment forget your omniscience!"

This was Macaulay's early social reputation: it is his latest. "Of Macaulay's range of knowledge," says Moore, in his Diary, "any thing may be believed, so wonderful is his memory." Again, at a dinner, "Macaulay wonderful; never, perhaps, was there combined so much talent with so marvelous a memory." Again astonished when Macaulay memorior opened upon him a glib series of old Irish slang ballads, Moore exclaims, "He certainly obeys most wonderfully Eloisa's injunction, 'Do all things but forget.'"

Sydney Smith, who could jest freely about his friends without losing his admiration of them or their admiration of him, joined in the eulogy of one of Macaulay's dinner-table monologues when one quality and another was praised: "Then, too, the occasional flashes of Venice were perfectly delightful!" "There are no limits to his knowledge on small subjects as well as great," said the wit of St. Paul's at another time; he is a book in breeches." This from a rival talker, for Sydney's repeated onsets would hold a room as well or better than Macaulay's continuous siege: "Yes, we both talk a great deal, but I don't believe Macaulay ever did hear my voice. Sometimes, when I have told a good story, I have thought to myself, 'Poor Macaulay! he will be very sorry some day to have missed hearing that!'" Such are the delights and distresses of brilliant conversationalists.

Macaulay started into public life at a bound, impelled by the enthusiasm and triumph of the party of reformers in which he was nurtured. He modestly, it can not be with indifference, left a brother reviewer to tell the story of this devotional and devoted early life. Sir James Stephen, himself the son of a worthy coadjutor of Wilberforce, Sharpe, Zachary Macaulay, and the rest, whom he celebrates as the Clapham Sect, has reproduced, in an article in the Edinburgh, the very atmosphere, glowing with piety and philanthropy, from which emerged, as Minerva from the head of Jupiter, the ready-armed Macaulay.

It is now thirty-six years since Macaulay first burst upon the world in the two-fold character of an orator and a reviewer. His first speech shortly preceded his first article in the Edinburgh. He made a glowing address, in 1824, before a well-disposed audience, at a public meeting. His antithetical periods and picturesque oratory were received as tokens of a wonderful future. He had already written on West Indian Slavery in Knight's Quarterly, and the earliest of his papers which we have traced in the Edinburgh is on the same theme. It is an article on the Negro in the West Indies, in the number for January, 1825. But his first hit in the Review was a paper in August, 1825, on "Milton," on occasion of the first publication of the great poet's treatise on Christian Doctrine. It glowed with youthful heat and enthusiasm; with novel, if not entirely original views of character; and that daring liveliness of expression, argumentative and declamatory, which had gained the reputation of Jeffrey, whose thunder in that field of letters, the Review, were more than renewed by this newly-arrived knight. To the paper of Milton succeeded others whose ardent sentences are familiar to the readers of the present day almost as household words. "Machiavelli," "Dryden," "Byron," "Bacon," "Walpole," "Johnson," "Chatham," "Warren Hastings," and the rest, all sparkling with keen analysis, quick perceptions, stores of reading picturesquely applied in skillful processes of literary art, and a rapid sympathetic imagination; full of liberal, noble views—sometimes to be opposed, seldom at the moment to be successfully resisted.

In 1827 appeared a startling paper in the Edinburgh on the "State of Politics in England." The crisis of the great struggle for the Reform Bill was approaching, and this article was the boldest in its warnings and its denunciations of indifference and opposition to the measure. A vivid picturesque parallel between the then condition of England and France on the edge of her Revolution—was in Macaulay's most fervid style. In his vision of the English aristocracy to be treated as the French aristocracy had been, he insists on touches of humor with the terrors of his description:

> "Have they forgotten how the gallant and luxurious nobleman, sprung from illustrious ancestors, marked out from his cradle for the highest honors of the state and of the army, impatient for control, exquisitely sensible of the slightest affront; with all his high spirit, his polished manners, his voluptuous habits, was reduced to request, with tears in his eyes, credit for half-a-crown to pass day after day in hearing the auxiliary verbs numerized, on the first page of Télémaque misconstrued by petulant boys, who infested him with nicknames and caricatures, who mimicked his foreign accent, and laughed at his thread-bare coat? Have they forgotten all this? God grant that they may never remember it with unavailing self-accusation, when desolation shall have visited wealthier cities and fairer gardens; when Manchester shall be as Lyons and Stowe as Chantilly; when he who owes, in the pride of rank and opulence, sneers at what we have written in the bitter sincerity of our hearts, shall be thankful for a porringer of broth at the door of some Republican convent, or shall implore some Italian money-lender to advance another guinea on his George!"

Several years after these friends were not forgotten. They were reproduced in one of those speeches, abounding in argumentative appeals and bursts of eloquence, which shook the House of Commons on the eve of the popular triumph. The warning was thus repeated:

> "Have they (the Lords) ever visited that neighboring country, which still presents to the eye, even of a passing stranger, the signs of a great dissolution and renovation of society? Have they ever walked by those stately mansions, now sinking into decay and petitioned out into lodging-rooms, which line the silent streets of the Faubourg St. Germain? Have they ever seen the ruins of those castles whose terraces and gardens overhang the Loire? Have they ever heard that from those magnificent hotels, from those ancient castles, an aristocracy as splendid as brave, as proud, as accomplished as ever Europe saw, was driven forth to exile and beggary—to implore the charity of hostile governments and hostile creeds—to cut wood in the back settlements of America—or to teach French in the school-rooms of London? And why were those haughty nobles destroyed with that utter destruction? Why were they scattered over the face of the earth, their titles abolished, their escutcheons defaced, their parks wasted, their palaces dismantled, their heritage given to strangers? Because they had no sympathy with the people—no discernment of the signs of their time—because, in the pride and narrowness of their hearts, they called those whose warnings might have saved them theorists and speculators—because they refused all concession till the time had arrived when no concession would avail."

The Whig leaders, without any extraordinary stretch of political wisdom, had discovered a new champion in Macaulay. He was taken up and employed with a Commissionership of Bankruptcy, and in 1830 brought into Parliament under the auspices of Lord Lansdowne, from "the immaculate and free-voting borough," as the Tory Magazine called it, of Calne.

Macaulay's maiden Parliamentary speech was delivered in April, 1830. It offered a philanthropical support of a measure to relieve the civil disabilities of the Jews, and the orator was complimented at the close by a few earnest words of eulogy from Sir James Mackintosh. The series of reform speeches followed. They were the speaker's great rhetorical triumphs; and the final success of the great measure his borough appointment was exchanged for the large popular representation of Leeds. He rapidly over his secondary political career, which was formally closed by the resignation of his seat in Parliament: in 1834 he was appointed member of the Supreme Council of Calcutta; and during his three years' connection with the Government of India effected improvements in a legislative capacity, particularly in an article of reform equalizing the legal rights of the European and Asiatic subjects of the crown. He returned to England enriched by this lucrative post, and charged with the material of his brilliant sketches in the Edinburgh on Hastings and Clive, and his subsequent Indian Parliamentary speeches. He joined the Melbourne Administration as Secretary of War in 1839, and lost his eloquence to the support of its falling fortunes. The following year he was elected member from Edinburgh, and served as a leader of the Whig opposition against the forces of Peel. When his party gained the ascendancy in 1846 under Lord John Russell, he was appointed Paymaster of the Forces with a seat in the Cabinet. The next year he was thrown out by his constituency for his support of the Maynooth Grant. Five years after, in 1852, he was again elected from Edinburgh, and remained in Parliament, taking no very active part in its affairs.

The public had no reason to regret his indifference to Parliament and retirement from public affairs since it gained the world the splendid series of articles in the Edinburgh and the "History of England." "To take Macaulay out of literature and society," said Sydney Smith, "and put him in the House of Commons, is like taking the chief physician out of London during a pestilence." Literature was undoubtedly his great success; yet his most quiet writings smack strongly of the declaimer and debater. He had essentially a spoken style. It is description, word painting, argument, but always with an eye to a case and for victory. His faults are all forgotten and forgiven in the glowing order of that style which, for the time, sweeps away taste and judgment. What action was to Demosthenes the flow of his period was to Macaulay. He was rather rhetorical than eloquent; picturesque without being poetical; he had rare powers of fanciful association without invention; he was ingenious, but not profoundly speculative. His vast reading and stores of memory perhaps seemed greater to us than they really were, from his attorney's faculty of making up a case. To read Macaulay, with the first shock of surprise and novelty, is an unsurpassed delight. He was the prince of popularity, and may almost leave us in doubt whether his great qualities stoop to the imperfections of common life, or the latter rise to the verge of greatness.

On retiring from public life Macaulay was raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Macaulay. He took his seat in the House of Peers, but never spoke. The latter years of his life were devoted exclusively to the "History of England," of which four volumes have appeared—the work being, like Prescott's "Philip the Second," left incomplete at his death. The work, of which Messrs. Harpers were, by special arrangement with Lord Macaulay, the American publishers, was even more popular in this country than in England; of their several editions they have sold over 100,000 copies.

He died of heart disease, which had troubled him once, in 1852, but over which his constitution was supposed to have triumphed. He was attacked about the middle of December, rallied, and was supposed to be convalescent, but suddenly relapsed and died.

Baron Macaulay was unmarried, and the title dies with him. He has brothers and sisters: one of the former is a citizen of this country.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

CHAPTER IV.

IN WHICH A BOAT IS LAUNCHED, AND COMES TO PORT.

DAY after day did Ernest Beckford sit quietly writing on his high stool in the Cheswick counting-room, while around him the same old ebb and flow of life went on that had been about little Filkins, save that its wave found him a rock, and not an empty keg, or a tangle of driftwood, which could be tossed about at its pleasure. The farthest in the world from that was this young man. And though the riot outside of him was perhaps chafed into a little greater violence by the presence of his silent, thoughtful antagonism, it still evidently felt that it had found an obstacle in him, and one which it would be difficult to surmount. Ernest Beckford was one of those very rarely found men who can pursue their own way through a perfectly unfriendly crowd, not only without dedection, but with an appearance of ease, or even comfort. Where the power to do this is not natural, its acquirement is the greatest possible of triumphs—it is the most brilliant of accomplishments. Both naturally and by self-education Ernest Beckford possessed it.

By-and-by the influence of the young man became observable even upon outsiders. Certainly it was not his office which they began to respect; there was nothing in being a second book-keeper which was especially overpowering, and stimulant to Cheswick admiration. It must have been therefore the young man himself, and the beautiful, easeful way in which he throbbed his office, which made Cheswick say, "I declare I shouldn't wonder if that young fellow came to be partner by-and-by!"

This better state of feeling toward Ernest Beckford, among Cheswickians generally, left him still more at the mercy of his pleasant companions inside the rail, if such a man could with any propriety be called at the mercy of any body. To all of them he was a continual eyesore. He was not offensive of himself, made no pretension to being judge, mentor, reprover of any sort; but the very look and bearing of the man, necessarily from his mode of life when he was not paying the slightest attention to them, was a continual institution of odious comparisons.

For the first few days after he came to Cheswick these agreeable companions of his seem themselves to revenge the displacement of little Filkins, and to assert their own utter uselessness of the new-comer by a series of talk at him which was intended to be satirical. Frequent reference was made to the salubrious characteristics of Cheswick, and many partners to spend the summer in, and extreme pain expressed lest the New York House should go down, robbed as it was of such companionship. To all of which Beckford paid as much attention as belonged to it.

Before the expiration of the second week of his residence there the young man had proved himself so very calm and immovable a surface to these attacks that the misdirected force of hanging their tactics suggested itself to them. There was no doing any thing against Beckford; perhaps something might be done with him. He could not be snubbed, overlooked, sent to Coventry in any way; that would secure the reserve of his prevented them appearing to banish him, for how can one be uncivil to a man who gives him no chance to be civil? He was very gentlemanly, but mixed with them no more than water with oil.

They would allure him, therefore. He might not be such a dem'd disagreeable fellow after all. Todds had known a man who opened up very much like this Beckford. Perhaps they have thought he had a tongue in his head, by Jove! and every body said that all he did was to read Tract Society publications and drink his black tea; but dem Todds if he didn't turn out a splendid chap after all, and when they last parted they had a devilish good time—three bottles apiece—broke one of the waiter's heads with a boat of snipe gravy, threw an arm-chair out of the window, and had a devilish fine time that they never knew how they got home—deyuk it on it—ha, ha, by Jove! I wonder how this Beckford would turn out? It was certainly worth while to try him.

It must be confessed that, even with all his self-possession, Ernest Beckford felt a certain degree of surprise, and unusual slightly when, one day after the Bank was shut, and he was making home to his lodgings, he felt an arm suddenly thrust through his own in the most familiar fashion, and turned to discover that his friend was no other than Todds, cashier. "We're not very well acquainted yet," was the remark of that distinguished bank-officer.

"HE HELD IT UP IN THE SUNLIGHT," ETC.

"That's true," replied Beckford, in a tone of dry courtesy.

"But we ought to know one another better," continued Mr. Todds.

The young man bowed politely, with a somewhat questioning elevation of the eyebrows.

"Yes," said the cashier. "So I think. So the fellows think. In fact, we're all of that opinion. Oh! de-cidedly. It's not at all the thing, you see, for a set of splendid men like us—all of us here together—to be distant and cold to one another. You know what I mean—to come the sublime indifference dodge, you know. If we any of us have been cold to you, you mustn't mind it. It's our way at first."

The idea that any indifference which Mr. Todds might have shown had taken an aspect of sublimity, was so amusing to Ernest Beckford that he could scarcely refrain from laughing in Todds to set his mind at rest upon that point would have become a hearty laugh had there been any sympathetic person there to enjoy it with him.

"Know us, and you'll like us," pursued the cashier. "I'm sure I shall Mr. Filkins, and he liked us. Why? Because he knew us, of course. Well, you can do the same thing, and every thing will go on swimmingly. Oh, by-the-way, I've a little proposal to make. I have some friends at my rooms to-night in a quiet sort of way—just a rubber or two of whist and a glass of punch, and I'm sure we can make it pleasant for you. Come in. Say nine o'clock or thereabouts. Shall we expect you?"

The young man thought for a moment—so short a moment that his hesitation was not perceived by the cashier—and then replied:

"If I am not with you by nine o'clock you need not expect me. Thank you for the invitation at any rate."

This answer was not prompted by any fear of officials, but by one with a prompt denial. Strange as it may seem, Ernest Beckford was not quite sure but he would like to accept the invitation. He could see one phase of the life of these associates of his—the business life—and there was a sort of strange fascination even to him in that, because they were out of business hours; very much such fascination as would be to a human-nature philosopher in seeing the Queen of the Fejees in dishabille, or being admitted to the bosom of a cannibal family.

With a little persuasion to be sure and come, Mr. Todds remembered that he had already gone past a place where he must attend to some business, pressing, and, slipping his arm out of Beckford's, trotted away. A few moments and Ernest Beckford reached his lodgings and gave the little bow in which he had taken rooms was as near an approach to graceful retirement as can be procured in a country town. There was the old-fashioned office of which dormer windows rising from the roof, whose weather-boards were all green and moss-brown in motley with lichen and decay. But by no means a tumble-down old house—merely one that had "a respectable look," a square prim style, all luscious with pleasant home-like associations, and having always an agreeable sunniness about it like a Hessian fly-trap placed directly down the almost perpendicular rocky bank of the little stream, here at its broadest, which gave Cheswick its name, and to the possession of water scenery. Two of the second story windows which opened on the sight and sound of this pleasant, rustling, running sweet singer belonged to the parlor of Ernest Beckford. In the summer they were always open, by the immemorial custom of the family who kept the house; and it was not the young man's mood to close them even in the coldest season, when they opened upon such sweet intimacies with all glad fresh wood odors and music from water and trees about them.

It was at one of these windows that Ernest Beckford, coming in from his talk with Mr. Todds, found himself sitting down with a careless abandonment on the little settee which was his favorite resting-place.

There was a slight shade on the forehead of Ernest Beckford to-day as he sat looking out of that breezy window, with his cheek rested on his left hand, which seemed to see deeper than the sheen of the rippling stream below; farther than the gold and purple cloud-banks which, long before sunset, were making ready for the coming of the sundown. Plainly, had one been there who knew him, who trusted, one whose spiritual key made an exact chord with his own, Ernest Beckford might have had a secret to impart whose weight would have none the less because it was borne with a half-defiant, manly bravery, a half-smiling earnestness rather than with utter Byronic dejection. But at last the wind—that loving, cajoling, coaxing wind—kissed the secret out of him. With a sigh which he banished instantly by shutting his lips upon it, as if he would not even admit it to himself, the young man arose, and lifting the cover of a small rose-wood desk which stood upon the bureau near him, brought out in succession a miniature, a packet of letters, and a sunny lock of woman's hair. Returning to the window, he laid them all upon the seat beside him and again sat down. There was just the slightest dust visible upon the raised golden circlet and glass which held in the portrait, and this the young man rather kissed than breathed away with a lip so tender and so trembling that one would have scarcely believed it the same whose strong lines but a moment before gave such firm denial to the sigh. Then wiping it carefully, he gazed, and gazed, and gazed worshipfully, and as if his eyes could never drink their fill.

Had the human confidant whose presence we just supposed been looking over the shoulder of Ernest Beckford, he would have had but little difficulty in giving name and personality to the portrait's original. It was a lady in the middle time of life. Her hair still glossy brown, of that peculiar tint which the sun is ever turning to gold, had still here and there flecked with silver by that speechless care and earnest, long-suffering tenderness to which her watchful eyes and more sympathetic mouth bore witness, to her child-like trust and gladness was a calmer shadow, such as they only know who have been both tried and victorious. The remaining features, even to the last, were Beckford's, save that the mouth had a womanly loving peacefulness which the mouth of few men ever arrive at without becoming effeminate, and which the young man's was yet too new to the play of passion to have learned. And what a noble line of his parted next, after they had pressed one long kiss upon the beautiful face before him, the artist had escaped them were "Mother!" and "Gone! gone!"

Then taking that rich brown tress which had been torn in his hand as reverently as a pilgrim carries his relic, he held it up in the sunlight and let it lie engolomed, till the light seemed to make it live again, and the soft air seemed fanning not it only but the dear cheek whereon which it had played long ago. And strangely there floated into his mind, and melted in with this reverie of the departed, another face; a still more precious, over which love fell also a shadow and a sunniness mingled of like soft brown hair; and strangely, too, came a deep peace into his heart, for she who had gone seemed smiling down upon him to light the way to his breast of one who was coming. And as if with a sudden inspiration he wrote with his pencil on a little scrap of paper lying near him,

"All the life of the young man is but a pilgrimage from one sweet woman's breast to one other. From the bosom out of whose life he came he goes voyaging wearily, painfully, and rest he hath none, until he comes to the bosom with whose life he is to be one for evermore."

A moment more and half unconsciously he had written two names side by side beneath this sentence. He hardly thought what he did till the feeling how well they looked together flushed his cheek. What other could those names have been but these, "Beckford—Nora?"

The hand that held the paper dropped again to his side, and the two frank blue eyes of the so lately called Ernest looked out again still more intensely across the stream, the field, the distant margin of the hills, and far into the heaven beyond, through which, as to all of us sometimes happens, he seemed to see a whole past life repass before him.

He beheld a young manhood whose mantle of earnestness had fallen on him prematurely; whose eye had been made forbidding, longing quest ful at a time when most eyes are lavish and limited to the present. He beheld a young man, who, with all the greatest capacity for loving and growing in his love, for being made the better and more clear-aimed hard worker in the world, had hitherto gone through through the world for that well of another's pure affection which many men had without the asking; which some of them valued only because as they looked down it mirrored their own selfish face; which others beholded with their feet and passed carelessly away. He saw this young man successful in many things—praised, trusted, what the world calls well off, meaning in the coffer, not in the soul. But he saw him sitting often at neighbors' fireside; still oftener in the gloom of a companionship beneath which a stranger had warmed for hire, and one by one, even to his frank, glad, brave eye, the once lighted coals of a better hope went out and became ashes. And from his heart he pitied this young man; for he perceived that none else could pity, even if he could ask them; unable as they were to know how many a good and bright expectation may have faded out already to the man of twenty-four, however brave he be, and how old, in some respects, such a young man may have become through strange life-leadings.

Just where the cloud of this sight became darkest, and where light was least expected, a faint gleam shot through of a sudden; it waxed brighter, and the clear eyes of Ernest Beckford fell back upon the paper in his hand.

"Ernest—Nora."

"Is it possible? Will it be? In my life I have learned the lesson to work on because the work is right; because all great and good is on the side of work, wherever hope may stand. Dare I hope that all is well at work? Dare I seek the great happiness of a life, and believe in that as I used to—as I have, since my mother died, believed in labor only?"

Thus soliloquizing the young man stood thoughtfully at the window for a moment, then with a clouded brow and gloomy lip, threw back the pane containing the sentence and the names into the rude form of a bust, and dropped it with a thoughtless playfulness on the depths of the stream below the window, saying as it fell,

"Be my emblem! Thou shalt float away out of my sight, but not out of God's: even so I trust myself to the current, hoping to open for my own way: but He knows whither I shall go, what end reach. All my life I have dreaded to be a lonely soul; but now I will try to have such love from her as I can give her. Float away, little bust."

So it drifted out of his sight. But not—not, as he said, out of God's. And he turned from the window full of faith and peace.

But not as much so as he might have been had he seen a certain thing. But how could he know that ever since he had been sitting at the window a pair of curious pair of eyes had been looking up at him all bright with admiration, and a lovely face been flushing last he should see it from its peeping place behind the willows, on the farther brookside. How could Ernest know that any lady—as much less—made that stream and the bar afternoon rambling, reading, and musing place, for a reason which she had never even admitted to herself. And how—how in the world could he tell who it was that, when the little boat had drifted quite out of his sight, drew it slower eagerly from the eddy by which it was made prisoner; at first to kiss it and keep it simply because it was any thing which might be a memorial of him; but unrolling it and reading it, felt first the blood rush to her temples, then back to her heart, and hastened homeward not knowing whether she walked or dreamed, in a calm ecstasy whose spell she feared to break by speaking. How would Ernest Beckford know?

But the little boat was better out of his sight, but it was in God's and hers.

CHRISTMAS AT NETTLECROP.

TEN years ago there was a great commotion in the village of Nettlecrop. The whole place was together by the ears as the saying is: and here was Christmas almost at hand, with little or no prospect of its bringing peace and good-will, as far as the fields of Nettlecrop were concerned.

Mrs. Pradgeman had as good as told Mr. Fines, the farrier, that his wife dressed; and Mrs. Fines had said that Mrs. Pradgeman was a drunken gossiping at the door of her husband's forge again, she would n't have such a bit of her mind; and there were the Knaggses and the Penthwhistles at daggers drawn; and the Slys didn't speak to the Knaggses; and Mr. Knaggs and the Slys, and the Penthwhistles, were all of them deadly foes of the Dingleberrys; who, in their turn, held the Saunderses in bitter hatred; and the Saunderses weren't at all in favor among the Nettlecrop folks generally; but, in particular, were loathed by the Haslecrofts, who used to be such very intimate friends of theirs; and Little Lucy Saunders, aged eight years and a quarter, had informed her eldest sweetheart, Willy Haslecroft, aged eleven, that if they ever met again—which was not improbable, seeing that they lived on the same side of the Green, and only three doors from each other—it must be as people of the world; and, in short, Nettlecrop was in a state of internecine war, and the feud of the Montagues and the Capulets was a joke to it. A pretty condition of things, this, among Christians and at Christmas!

Of course Christmas, till it was all but come; and not a soul in Nettlecrop had wished that it might in a single case to his neighbor. The Slys, and the Knaggses, and the Penthwhistles, and the Dingleberrys, and the Saunderses, and the Haslecrofts, had their own compliment of the seasons to give one to another; and Mrs. Fines had sent all the way to Stoneybatter for her plums and currants rather than have the Christmas pudding compounded of any materials which had come out of Mrs. Pradgeman's general shop.

For the credit of Nettlecrop and humanity, I trust that there were hearts which yearned to open themselves to other hearts, and hands which would have gladly clasped other hands, had there been some excuse for the renewal of pacific relations. But nobody liked to be the first. There was Clay Haslecroft, by name, who wanted to be friends with all Nettlecrop and all creation. But he was only a boy, and could not have undertaken upon the part of the grown-up community to accept his offices as peace-maker. So nobody said "Merry Christmas" to anybody; and, though another night had gone, and the day itself had dawned which was the day before Christmas-day.

It had dawned brightly, too, though the snow lay deep, and the cold was intense. Tom Haslecroft free, as was his wont, before the little household was awake, and rallied forth into the keen fresh air. Into the open country, ankledeep in snow, he went, and sang for joy of the life that rushed through his young limbs. Across the village green, and through the turn-stile, and down the lane by the old church-yard, and over Farmer Jarvey's gate at a bound, and good-day to the pinched-up laborer who was stacking fagots in the shed, and good-day to you, boy, Merry Tom, and a Merry Christmas! It was the first that Tom had had bidden him that blessed season, and his heart swelled up, forcing the tears from his eyes. Knee deep now he went at times; and more than once turned back to find some sort of path. Take care, Tom Haslecroft, take care! It was in a drift a little further on—there, by the willows—that a man was nearly lost yesterday, just after dusk. Take care, Tom!

I was at Nettlecrop on that 24th of December. The window was curtained close, and the candles were lit, and the parlor was warm, and the fire burned bright and cosy, and the first glass of afternoon sherry was on the table for me, when the landlord himself entered the room, with a long face and an apology for troubling me with bad news.

"Why, is there any matter?" I asked, setting down the wine untasted.

"I hope nothing's really the matter, Sir," he answered; "but it looks like it. Mr. Hales, the Haslecroft, the wheel-wright on the green, has not been heard of since daybreak this morning, when he was seen by one of Farmer Jarvey's men going past the willows. The man says he watched him over the most dangerous part, where a traveler was nearly buried in the snow last night, and that he had kept his way in the direction of Cragsfoot Bottom, as if he meant to go through the copse. Indeed, they've found him right through the copse, near as far as Bramleigh Wood, where the wind has drifted the snow clean over the poor boy's footprints. Lord send that it hasn't covered him!"

Not another word did I say, or the landlord either, till we were standing in the porch, round which about twenty persons had gathered with lanterns.

"Heaven preserve us!" the landlord then exclaimed, breaking our silence; "but I fear we shall have another heavy fall o' snow." The flakes were coming down thickly enough. Tom had been the men's hats were already touched with white.

We set off in a body, taking our way first to Haslecroft's, where the wheel-wright's wife reached the house, whether Tom had been found. Alive or dead he was missing still; and those who had been searching for him had returned for more lanterns or torches, and for more help, were now on the point of starting again. The boy's father was among them, and distracted enough—more than been of the party also, but that she was held back with kind hands, and soothing voices, and many aids and tears. "They'll find him, my dear, they'll be sure to find him," said poor Mrs. Saunders, who was more agitated than any body beside; and had the greatest difficulty in keeping herself from being broken down altogether. "Don't give way so, there's a love! Oh, do take comfort, pray!" Rosanna was aggravating the affliction, which Mrs. Saunders felt on behalf of her long-slighted friend.

Our party now numbered at least a score; and as we crossed the green it was more than doubled by accessions from the village. All the main branches of the Slys, and the Knaggses, and the Dingleberrys, and the Penthwhistles were there; and as we turned into the lane which led to the copse, I should run up to us in a panting state, and lay vivient hands on Mr. Fines, but Mrs. Pradgeman?

"Take care, Sir, I'm a Christian man as has a flat stone bottle, of pint capacity or thereabouts" "Is—it's cordial! God's help go with you all! Oh, Dr. Carboy, Sir, I'm a Christian man as well with 'em! And Mr. Hales as well! Oh, gentlemen, don't, don't, don't come back without him!"

We left the poor woman to her hysterics and calling out encouraging words and earnest prayers for our success, by the end of the old church wall. We passed through the gate in the corner of the field, boy had vaulted gayly that morning; we took our course, guided by a shepherd who knew every foot of the land for miles round, till we had struck right down again into the hollow, and through the copse, and so onward to Bramleigh Wood, where our search began.

The snow fell fast and faster, now tumbling in a fitful, irregular way, and now descending in the form of a steady, persevering rain, as if it were being pressed downward to the muffled earth. Masses fell every now and then from the branches of the trees. The hoops we had brought with us into the wood was gradually covered as the objects were covered which at first stood forth from the snow.

A cry from the rear brought every body running to one spot. Was he found? Alas, no! But a little girl who had followed us had been overpowered by some stragglers of the band. It was Tom's cried sweet-heart, Lucy Saunders. There was faint hope now that any more would ever meet again, even as people of the world.

Faint hope and failure, as the snow came ceaselessly, silently, pitilessly, white as a shroud, to look up at it against the leaden sky, black as we saw it against the shrouded slopes and underwood, or between us and the lights of our wandering lanterns. Lucy Saunders, in spite of protests urged with piteous tears, had been sent back in charge of two people, who were to take her home, as she had been but quitted unobserved.

So was Christmas-eve spent by us in that dreary winter wood; and so did it give place to Christmas-day. Our party had been relieved by the rest of the village people. New lights had been searching the wood all night went house to sleep. But not long past noon they were all in Nettlecrop Church-yard, and the whole village at the village. Mr. Hales, the deservedly popular young clergyman of Nettlecrop, had dismissed his female congregation with a few sympathetic words, after the church service, telling them that he was impatient to join the working party in the wood; and in half an hour he was with us bodily, as he had been all that Christmas morning in the spirit.

The day wore on till two o'clock, when a man here down upon our main body, which was now assembled to consider whether it might not be advisable to search the fields of the neighborhood. It was from the further boundary—that is to say, from the side opposite to that by which we had come—that the man approached. He called out, as soon as he was well within hearing,

"Hallos, there! What's all this piece of work about a boy that's got lost?"

"Can you tell us any thing about him?" asked a dozen voices at once.

"Yes, I can. He's all right enough!"

"Where is he?"

"Well, he's in Billbury lock-up—that's where he is."

"What for?" was the next question on the part of the clamorous by this time consisted of the entire Nettlecrop corps.

"Why, for trespass, to be sure. Didn't my chap Joe take him prisoner from the constable to the boy's father yesterday morning? No? Well, I suppose he got drunk as usual and forgot it. You see, I count the young scamp on Squire Jacob's land, and took him right off to the Billbury constable. We sin't going to stand any more o' them trespassing about here. I can tell you it's if you want to get the boy out you'd better come along some of you afore the Squire."

Joy was wrestling with indignation in the breasts of the good people from Nettlecrop. They didn't murder the man. They did not fall upon him and beat him to death upon the spot. They didn't hang him up by his neck, or by his heels, or by his ears, or by his hair, or by his toes, or by his thumbs, or by his teeth, to the nearest tree; they didn't even bow-bail him. DrCarboy said he was a scoundrel; and being reminded by the Nettlecrop lawyer that this language was actionable, Dr. Carboy amended it by saying that the man was a most unmitigated and atrocious villain, who deserved, for every hour that the boy had passed in imprisonment, to suffer a year's solitary confinement—a sentence which was loudly cheered by every body who heard it uttered. The Reverend Mr. Hales, with a remarkably fine pectoral development, and the voice of a blacksmith, told the man that he ought to have a sound thrashing, and that if it had not been Christmas-day he (Mr. Hales) would have given him the one. The end of it was, that Mr. Hales, Dr. Carboy, the lawyer, and one or two more went as a deputation to the Squire, "to lay before him the talent view of the case," and gave his magisterial order for the release of the culprit. Tempted by the sight of a magnificent chestnut horse, Tom had broken into the Squire's ground, where he was surprised and captured as the keeper has already told us.

Next to the safe recovery of Tom Haslecroft on whose manly breast the fair Lucy flung herself in passionate joy when he was brought in triumph by Mr. Hales, the happiest result of this affair was the perfect reconciliation of every body in Nettlecrop to every body else. From that day forth all the ill-feeling of the Slys was transferred to the shoulders of the Squire and his men. Not a drop of ale was left for home consumption.

Mrs. Pradgeman went and made it up with Mrs. Fines, after which she sent her respectful duty to Mrs. Baxter in Billbury Jugg, with the contribute indefinite assurances that "it was all a mistake." The Slys, and the Knaggses, and the Penthwhistles, and the Dingleberrys have become united by matrimonial ties; in spite of which they remain the best friends that ever were. There is a talk of marriage on foot between the Haslecroft and Saunders families; but, for my part, I hope Tom Haslecroft will not think of marrying just yet.

AN IMPERTINENT QUESTION

IF was a most impertinent question. And it was answered in a way not rather hurled at me—by my Thought, as I sat coolly last evening by my fire.

I have had questions of the same genre quietly put to me before in the solitude of my chamber, but never with such a flash, such a clatter-effect, bringing the thing "down to a point" fashion.

At any time the question would have startled me; but, coming as it did, on the top of—as a agonizing, romances-pulling-down climax—half a dozen happy, sanguine schemings for the Future, it was terrible—I fairly staggered me.

The question was this:

WHERE shall I die?

I instinctively took a look at the bed wherein I have snored in my bachelor apartments for over the last three years.

Not a month ago a great pet of mine, the daughter of my landlady, died on that same bed. The room in which the little invalid lay suffering was the best, by much by inch—the Destroyer gradually creeping up, cat-like, from her feet till it clutched her—the last of life, for it was "the room" by the throat. I left then. I have heard that strange final exhaustion of the air, commonly known as "closeness," once, years ago, would be much gold, more than I ever coveted, to buy me to listen to it again. My landlady's wife at a strange table: it is a nervous, foolish, fidgety unpleasant one. The reader probably has his.

Therefore, unless Fortune were some day to shower her blessings very plentifully upon me, enabling me to adopt some other course of life—indeed, almost rendering it imperative that I should at all events live in a cooler apartment—I don't suppose I shall change. Or, if I do change, it will be as it is, I am pecuniarily in a position to occupy a more sumptuous apartment, and still I remain perfectly satisfied with the comfort around me. I couldn't have truer friends "drop in" than I have now, whatever were my surroundings. In fact, I doubt if any circumstances except the possession of the means to carry out a strong desire to travel could induce me to make a change.

The chances therefore are that, barring out-door accidents, I shall die on that bed.

In has this advantage: it is a practiced bed—the last one went so gently to Kingdom Come in. But the little one was about two feet eight inches high, whereas my length is five feet eleven and a half. I have never measured the bed, but cold winter nights have sunnyingly convinced me that that was the length. "Shorter"—can not assuredly be over five feet ten. The reader will at once perceive the utter absurdity of for a moment contemplating "cutting off" with any degree of comfort under the circumstances.

I shall to-morrow undertake (nasty word, but never appropriately a stricter measurement of all the bedsteads in the house, and if I discover that any shorter gentleman than myself is luxuriating on unnecessary longitude of mattress, more suitable to myself than him—after, of course, making all generous allowance for the usual "stretching" to overwhile in the contingency under consideration—why, I can only say that a sudden exchange will be effected, and him neither the wiser nor the worse for it.

Reader! as you make your bed, so shall you die on it. Look to this!

LIFE IN SPAIN:

PAST AND PRESENT.

By Walter Thornbury.

With Illustrations.

12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

Picturesque and very lively. * * * Gay, with effective drawing and bright color.—London Examiner.

A good book—a noteworthy book—a rare book. Jotted down, as the author says, on cigarette papers, with inch-made of orange-juice and Spanish liquorice, it has all the fame and dry acetic fervor, all the color, the warmth, the passion, and the burning sun of modern Spain; it is no dull effort of imagination, where the lines are out of drawing and the paints too gross or too faded—it is a masterpiece of the longest and on a single sitting—but it is actual living truth: the thing seen rendered in natural colors, bright and brilliant; the theme played translated through all its variations rich and clear. We have seldom met with more vivid word-painting. The dry, hot, burning air, with its floods of blinding sunshine resting on the dusty leaves and the parched ground, the lean brown Spaniard, with his keen eye and grave courtesy, his ready knife and his unwilling activity; the red water-jar standing like a mockery of comfort, every drop drained by the hot thirsty wretch who went panting by: the luscious melons, hanging like globes of fresco matter in their entangled network of leaves; the cool sparkling in its mountain cleft with its only the fierce sun waking overhead—we see, feel, know, are conscious of all, so vividly does the traveller bring his sensations before us.—Athenæum.

BY ED. C. W. MATSELL.
Now Ready.

The National Police Gazette.

ALL OF OUR READERS MUST HAVE HEARD of the Chief of Police of New York, and that he kept a diary of the important events that transpired during his official career. For many years this diary has been heretofore been a SEALED BOOK, and now, for the first time, he has opened it to the public. We have been able to catch a glimpse of the real and truthful MYSTERIES of NEW YORK, and the RUINS of NEW YORK CITY LIFE.

The sketches being founded on facts, and the prominent actors being in many instances among the leaders of high life at the present time, they must become the chief topics of conversation in all circles of society; and no person will be considered well read in the events of the day who has not read these productions.

Remember that the

is the only paper in which these intensely interesting dramas of life can be published.

Subscription price $1 a year. All letters should be addressed to GEO. W. MATSELL & CO.,

The Publishers of Harper's Magazine have the pleasure to announce that they have made arrangements with the Author, by which they are to receive the Monthly Parts of Thackeray's New Novel, "Lovel the Widower," in advance of its publication in England. The First Part appears in the present Number of the Magazine, the Two will constitute the Eight Parts, one of which with the original Illustrations, will be published in each successive Number.

Anthony Trollope, the Author of the brilliant Novels, "Dr. Thorne" and "The Bertrams," will write, exclusively for Harper's Magazine, a Series of Stories under the general title of "Tales of Many Lands." The First Tale of this Series is contained in the present Number. The others will appear at short intervals during the year.

The Publishers renew the assurances which they have so often made, that Harper's Magazine will continue to maintain the high character which it has attained. They do not underrvalue the importance of the occasional ties that exist between the different sections and parties of the country. Each of these has organs especially devoted to its interests and opinions. The Publishers of Harper's Magazine deem it of paramount importance that there should be a periodical which, leaving the discussion of these vexed questions to their own essentially advocates, shall consecrate its pages to those principles and set forth those opinions only in which wise and patriotic men of every section can heartily concur. Their Magazine will be, as heretofore, the organ and the party in political literature; but a National work, drawing materials and welcoming contributions from every quarter. The Contributors whose pages appear in its pages, residing in every section of the country and differing widely in opinion, are unanimous upon the existing questions of the day. What these private views are, on the subjects expressed, beyond the pages of the Magazine, the Publishers think it out of their province to inquire. They only require the most watchful care that nothing shall find place in any department of the Magazine which shall render it an unwelcome visitor in any household.

Further from England.

DOVER, Eng., June 8, 1859. Messrs. Perry Davis & Son: Sirs—I have very great pleasure in recommending your medicine. I was suffering a few weeks since with a complaint called Bronchitis, and could scarcely take any food. I was recommended to try your Pain Killer, and after taking a few doses, I was completely cured. Yours respectfully,
THOMAS WILKINSON.

P. S. I have recommended the same medicine to many of my friends for different complaints, and in every instance it has had the desired effect. T. W.

MANCHESTER, Eng., May 31, 1859.

Having tested the medicine called PAIN KILLER, manufactured by PERRY DAVIS & SON, of Providence, in the United States, I have much pleasure in speaking of its great efficacy and usefulness. Two years ago I was suddenly afflicted with a painful internal disease, when a friend of mine, (who had just returned from the States) seeing my anguish, gave me a small quantity of Pain Killer which he had brought with him, and which I took internally, as he directed. The relief was immediate, and so satisfied was I of its value as a medicine, that I immediately sent over to New York for half a dozen of the large bottles, and I am thankful to say it has proved to my family, and to others who have used it, of inestimable value, and relief to almost all kinds of suffering and pain. Yours truly, H. D. MEAD.

A WIFE.

THE wife sat thoughtfully turning over
A book inscribed with the school-girl's name;
A tear—one tear—fell hot on the cover
She quickly closed when her husband came.

He came, and he went away—it was nothing—
With cold calm words upon either side;
But, just at the sound of the room-door shutting,
A dreadful door in her soul stood wide.

Love, she had read of in sweet romances—
Love that could sorrow, but never fail,
Built her own palace of noble fancies,
All the wide world a fairy tale.

Bleak and bitter, and utterly doleful,
Spreads to this woman her map of life;
Hour after hour she looks in her soul, full
Of deep dismay and turbulent strife.

Face in both hands, she knelt on the carpet;
The black cloud loosen'd, the storm-rain fell:
Oh! life has so much to wilder and warp it—
One poor heart's day what poet could tell?

CHAPTER V.

IN WHICH A SINGULAR WAY IS DISCLOSED OF MAKING THE BEST USE OF ONE'S TIME.

THE question to what extent a man may be engaged in the handling of pitch without defiling himself thereby—how far a gentleman may go on the road with a rogue without becoming a companion of knaves—is one of perhaps more speculative than practical value. For the person who does not like to be defiled by pitch, and who is not, therefore, virtually defiled already, will have just as little to do with that disagreeable article as necessity compels him to; and the gentleman will take a branch road, or a path through the fields, as soon as it is practicable, unless he has a taste for some slight smack of knavery already, and is therefore really very good company for the rogue. So that in neither case is a solution of the question of much practical importance.

But there are now and then occasions, especially in the young man's life, when the pitch business appears to be a long habitual necessity; a work of livelihood, from which there is no visible escape; when the road is straight, highwalled at the side, branches nowhere; and the rogue is a mighty familiar, pleasant knave, who edges over to your side of the way, and rubs his elbow in your side with a leer, saying, "Kiss me, sweet ox!" In which case the problem does arise whether to knock him down or walk along with him arm in arm, possible, keeping his fingers out of your pockets; and if there be any hope for him, giving him good advice not to get hanged.

"FACE IN BOTH HANDS, SHE KNELT ON THE CARPET."—[BY MILLAIS.]

At Cheswick Ernest Beckford found himself for the first time in this position when Mr. Todds had extended to him that ultimate honor and gratification conceivable by the youthful mind of the Bank, of inviting him to his rooms to white and whisky punch.

During the whole working day, at any rate, Ernest Beckford was holden of necessity to stay among these—well, just what they were. The question now arose, what effect would it have upon the comfortableness and the usefulness of this involuntary association with them, to go a little farther on their way with them, and operate with whatever influence he might have for good on the more susceptible, the private portion of their lives?

In just such a train of thought and self-questioning as this subject would be apt to suggest he sat by the open window after the little boat had floated away out of his sight, until the sun went down. Whether to go to Mr. Todds's or not?—that was the question. But it certainly would not have been worthy of so much consideration—it would have been answered much sooner, had not one other and most important element entered into the decision. What this was will be developed by our progress. But the question was deemed to be settled, at the present time, in the greatest possible haste.

For as Ernest sat thinking there, there sounded a heavy double rap at the door, and, almost before the words "Come in!" were out of his mouth, there flounced into the room as singular a little figure as is very often seen outside of the costume department of theatres, or the rubbish closet of curiosity-shops.

Fancy an exceedingly fat person, made much shorter in appearance by this fact than his real stature gave him right to be, and with a comical duck-waddle replacing the human walk, of which years had robbed nature. A perfectly white beard covered his face and descended to his girdle, a gigantic pair of smoked-glass dust goggles shielded his eyes, and over his whole body hung, in dusty folds, such a long, rusty, camlet cloak as operatic tradition assigns to Don Basilio in the Barber. On the head of the queer object was a very broad-rimmed, soft felt hat was set in a straight, determined manner, and the woolen gloved and pudgy little hand closed over a knotty hickory cudgel. And upon invitation this somewhat remarkable conglomeration seated itself, and opened conversation with,

"You don't know who I am?"

Mr. Beckford readily assented to the proposition, at the same time requesting to be informed upon the subject on which he was in the dark, and drawing his own seat near enough to bestow the scrutiny which his visitor's opening remark had challenged.

"I know you don't. It wasn't to be expected. Nobody would unless I told them, which is unlikely. I fancy that my own mother wouldn't. I flatter myself that she would have no idea. Where are your matches, if you please? Oh! here they are, thank you; smoke doesn't trouble you? Ah! not at all? I'm glad to hear it. I'll light up then. As I was saying, I have taken every precaution in dress, just as requested, to prevent me from being recognized, and I am too cute, I can assure you, to let any thing in my behavior betray to any body that I am—"

"Mr. Filkins;" so Ernest quietly completed the sentence.

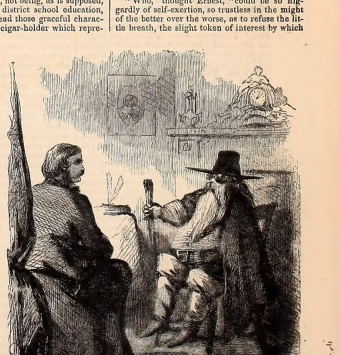
"I'll be hanged!" was the explosive reply of the stranger as he started to his feet. "Beckford, I believe you can see as sharp as a lynx!"

"Oh, sharper!" said Ernest, "considerably sharper; for the lynx, not being, as is supposed, blessed with even a district school education, would be unable to read those graceful characters marked on that cigar-holder which represent your name."

"Well! I'm flummixed—you'll excuse the phrase," answered little Filkins, in a dejected manner (for it was he). "Really, I did my best. At the request of the partners I came here in strict incog., as I thought. They told me not to make myself known to a soul till I had seen you; and now, I've gone and done it. Oh, it's mighty pretty of me, but it's just my way. Every thing's kicked over, I suppose, by that cursed holder."

"Oh no; I guess not. You mustn't be desponding about that. Nobody has seen it but me. What possessed you to come in this way, though?"

"Well, you see, I've got a cousin, a theatre costumer, up in Broome Street, and when the old gentleman, Mr. Jas. Clingham, told me he had a secret mission to send me on to you, and he wanted me to get a modest and appropriate disguise, I went up to Broome Street, and says I to Augustus, what would be nice and proper? We consulted between ourselves, and for a while I was uncertain in my mind if I wouldn't be a Cavalier of Madrid of the 15th century or the 15th somewhere along there, something with a five in it any way. My! wouldn't I have had a blessed looking pair of legs! Boots you could have out a leaf of bread in, and spurs on 'em, red thighs, and a ruff like a door-mat, with no end to cloak. And a hat—Low, such a hat, and such feathers! But Augustus said he'd agreed to let a man have that for a fancy-ball, and he would be along for it about dinner-time. So I had to take what I could get. He gave me my pick out of the rest, so I took Falstaff's stomach, hair, beard, and breeches; and as to hat, cloak, and boots, why, I'm an Italian murderer, you see. Rich, ain't it? but hot—awful hot, for June, I can tell you! I almost wish I hadn't taken any stomach. But I'm here now, thank fortune, and I don't think I'm found out. Can I stop?"



Mr. Beckford gave the voluble youth the permission he asked, as any one not unusually destitute of the emotion of compassion would have been constrained to do, seeing that it was June, as he said—and not cool for that month either—and then said:

"But your errand, Mr. Filkins? You told me, I believe, that the partner sent you. Excuse my haste, but I'm anxious to know the message that has caused so much labor on your part."

Little Filkins had by this time divested himself of all of his disguise but the ponderous stomach; and while there was still enough in his general appearance that was very ludicrous, the desire to laugh at the little man and his deep sense of responsibility (sense of responsibility is killingly funny in a little man), was checked in Ernest by his perceiving, with sincerest gladness, how much evidence of a new life there was in that now rosy, healthy face of his, which had shortly ago been so mottled and haggard; and how deep a pleasure it afforded him to have had his reformation noticed, to have had a trust committed to him by the partners.

"Thank Heaven!" thought Ernest Beckford, as he stood looking at the beaming, excited little man, "he has kept his word—he will be something—yes, even a good deal perhaps, after all." And when on this wide, vexatious, but still somewhat worth-living-on-after-all earth of ours did there ever cease to be hopes of a man who could be kindled genially out of his smoulder by a brother's saying, "I trust you?"

"Why," thought Ernest, "could be so niggardly of self-exertion, so trustless in the might of the better over the worse, as to refuse the little breath, the slight token of interest by which

"YOU DON'T KNOW WHO I AM?"

I was so happy as to give this little creature his first lift out of the mire? And what an ample reward for ten-fold more pains is it to see this small Eilkins raised utterly out of his smallness by having even some little thing to do, and being so anxious to do it as well as possible? Probably few men would have labored more assiduously to make themselves worthy of their office down to the last particular of dress, had they been sent on a special embassage to the moon."

"You ask me what is my errand to you?" said little Filkins, dropping his tone into the very abyss of awful mystery. "Are you sure, Tom, and let in the same voice, "that the inhabitants of this house are perfectly to be trusted? No children who get under beds? Little boys who hide themselves into closets? Girls that listen at keyholes? Then grant me your ear for a moment, while I speak my burden.

The most irresistibly comic stage sublimity, learned from some popular actor of dc- clarates the story and particular school, characterized little Filkins's manners as he drew Ernest into the farther corner from the window, and stared in a hoarse whisper, glancing at the same time cautiously over his shoulder, the words,

"Make the best of your time. Things here are ripening fast!"

"There," added little Filkins, resuming his natural tone, "now I feel comfortable. For the first time since I left New York I experience the emotion of hunge:. At the half-way station I arose and momentarily feasted on the stowed oysters c. a ham sandwich. But I shuddered at the idea. Can you eat when there's any great trouble on your mind? Let you eat! Responsibility is such a weight! All the way up I kept saying to myself, now I mustn't write it on paper. I mustn't breath it to my soul; I must keep it in my head. If I get to mapping I shall talk in my sleep to the man in front of me; dust coat by my side on the seat and let it out. By-and-by the car wheels seemed to say it; they kept grinding it out in their hoarse, gruff way all cut into lengths, "Make the—best of your—time," etc., and I actually got scared. Isn't it dreadful sentences, though? It's not just as if it was taken bodily right out of the dramatic version of Nobb's Six-Barrelled-Revolver-Maker of Rome! How Forrest would roll it off, heh? You're the pit, I'm Forrest—listen! I come up through a hole in the floor; a preparatory peal of thunder and green lights about my head, and speaking in a low voice .hat is almost audible silence say:

"Make the best of your time. Things he-r-r-r-e a-r-r-e r-r-r-ripening fa-ssssst!" Lord! what an opening to roll the r's for a man that had the genius! That e-so-like the knell of doom. Now just fancy who composed that! It was old Clingham, the head of the firm. I knew he had letters on discounts, was great on interest, had views of his own on tariff, but, by Jupiter! didn't know he had such a genius for tragedy! He came to me and repeated that sentence to me till I learned it; and when he said he didn't trust it on paper, I could fairly keep from saying to him, 'You err; put it on paper, with some more like it, and fame is yours!'"

"Do you know what it means?" asked Bedford, with a good-humored smile.

"No indeed! How should I?" was the voluble reply of the enthusiastic little Filkins. "I don't care to know! I'm in possession of these facts: First, that I have a trust bestowed upon me—that involves responsibility; second, that it is confidential from the head of our firm—that demands silence, unquestioning silence; third, that it is in the language of sublime tragedy—that is the all-satisfying; this calls forth the spontaneous admiration of the soul. Make the best use of what time! Don't know. What's ripening here? I hope you know. I haven't the slightest idea. All I care to know is that it shows a tragic genius that would have made Kean, Booth, Ham a second Shakspeare, and I bow to genius. That's all. But I tell you, responsibility is a weight! Can I put this stomach under the bed?"

"Oh, certainly. Sit down and rest you, and read some of the books on the table there by you, and excuse me for a moment while I look over some business I must attend to. I shall only be as you're kind enough to hope, what your message means, and I'm very much obliged to you for it. Excuse me just at the slight—"

It will perhaps somewhat appall sober and well-balanced minds to learn that just at the very moment that this most solemn and important admonition of time-preserving fell upon the ear of Ernest Beckford he settled the question, pro Todds or contra Todds, by finally resolving to accept that eminent person's invitation. Whisky and lemons are universally perceived as more particularly conservative of themselves, or other vegetable products, than either of time or equilibrium. Yet here was a young man who could think of no better way of economizing one whole mortal evening than by devoting it to the companionship of gentlemen who knew no other possible pickle for their hours of leisure. And it is not to be wondered at if the staid and well-behaved should openly express themselves in view of this decision somewhat thus: "I wouldn't have thought that of you, Beckford!" But this queer choice did occur, in spite of that fresh, almost yet echoing message from the partners, "Make the best use of your time."

Mr. Filkins having disposed of his beard, and no longer feigning a stomach when he had it not, waxed more and more comfortable over the thought of his discharged responsibility, and stretched himself over several chairs. With a pictorial London Almanac in his hand, and a smile of satisfaction upon his face, he seemed on the border of falling asleep, as was natural after such exhausting exercise as much travel, talking, and, above all, responsibility had afforded him.

In the mean time Ernest Beckford, unlocked the door of his secretary and took out a broad quarto, marked on the back "Letters." He turned over page after page of the MSS., and at last, settling on the particular copy that he wanted, he read—it was the letter he had sent by little Filkins to Clingham & Co.—as follows:

"If there be ever any message you wish to send to me, please intrust it to this young man to bring it—and let the trust which you repose in him be marked and flattering. He has valuable qualities in which he is faithful at heart—he needs only to be encouraged. Let him be made to feel your responsibility."

And as he looked furtively over at Filkins, and beheld how this little paragraph had been well-got—how, if one may speak of paragraphs agriculturally, it had already grown up and blossomed into the first chapter of a new life—all the gay romance of its circumstances fell off like a disturbing mist from little Filkins under the sun of that eye of kindness, and he sat there, looked at by Ernest, the human expression of much Heavenly reward to faithful-hearted labor —the non only, though the little one, and in no wise the thing to be laughed at, sneered at, or unloved. For as Herr Teufelsdröck has illustrated to us, there is a great and godlike philosophy in tatsey which altogether shines through clothes and comes at souls.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1860.

A NEW SERIAL STORY OF AMERICAN LIFE.

WE shall commence in an early number of Harper's Weekly a new Serial Tale of American Life, by a native author. This Tale will be illustrated by WINSLOW HOMER, Esq.

Harper's Weekly now circulates between 90,000 and 100,000 Copies

probably as many as all the other illustrated newspapers in the country together.

Advertisements in Harper's Weekly, 50 cents a line. For terms to clubs, etc., see page 79.

RAILWAY MORTGAGES.

EVENTS point to some new understanding on the subject of railway mortgages. Mortgages on the best roads in the country are failing due, and can not be paid. In such cases the creditors talk of foreclosure; in most they are content to stand aside, and see what their debtors propose to do with their lost property. Both creditors and debtors seem to expect that some new principle on the subject of railway mortgages will be presently proposed, and are ready to discuss it.

The subject lies in a nut-shell. During the railway-building era—which may be said to have commenced in 1845, and to have culminated in 1856—every railroad company in the country borrowed money, and gave its bonds—secured by a mortgage on the road—in return for the loan. These bonds were defective in two respects. They were almost invariably made payable within five, ten, fifteen, or twenty years; and they were issued with reasonable looseness. Still, at the time they were made, such was the general confidence in the railway system, and such the public desire to become possessed of what they bought, on the one hand, all sorts of people bought mortgage bonds on railroads, without ever inquiring into their legality and validity; and railroad companies issued bonds maturing within a few years, without ever asking themselves how they were to be paid. It is only now that we are reaping the fruit of that error.

Last year the second mortgage bonds of the Erie Railroad fell due. This year (1860) $21,200,000 of the bonds issued on railroad by this section of the country mature. Next year (1861) the amount of bonds maturing in our section is $14,700,000. None of these bonds can be paid. None of the holders of them have the money enough to pay their bonded debt out of their earnings. If any of their managers ever expected they would earn money enough to do so they knew very little about railroads. Experience has proved that, when a well-situated and well-managed railroad in this part of the country has paid its working expenses, the construction and repairs account, the interest on its debt, and a fair return to its stockholders, it can not expect to have any thing left. Very few of our roads, in fact, can do as well as this. As to paying off mortgage debts out of earnings, the thing is out of the question, save in the rare cases of the Panama, the Cleveland, Columbus, and Cincinnati, and one or two other roads, which started with a very small debt and a very large and increasing revenue.

The practical question now before the public is—How is this difficulty to be met? The various railroad companies of the North and West have issued promises to pay which they can not redeem at maturity. What course should be pursued by the creditors? What by the debtors?

There are examples before us. The late President of the Erie Railroad, finding it impossible to pay off his second mortgage bonds at maturity, issued new sheets of coupons payable in five years, which have been accepted by most of the bond-holders. The Directors of the Hudson River propose to give their second mortgage bondholders, whose bonds mature this year, new bonds, bearing a second mortgage, secured by a sinking fund, and irredeemable. The Directors of the Michigan Southern offer the holders of their first mortgage bonds, maturing in November next, new bonds with some twenty-five years to run; likewise secured by a sinking fund and first general mortgage. Other similar schemes are proposed by other railroads in the like predicament.

In discussing these plans it is safe to start with the proposition that if the railroads can be made to pay their bonds, they should at once be used for the amount. Forbearance, in such a case, would be folly. But can the railroads be made to pay?

There is one plan by which the various railroad companies whose bonds are now maturing could voluntarily raise money to meet them; and that is by the sale of new bonds. But, in the first place, railroad property has fallen into such disrepute that very few railroad bonds are salable at all. Undoubted bonds, guaranteed by the State of Missouri, bearing seven per cent. interest, and as binding on the State as the regular State issues, can not be sold at a discount of 25 cents on the dollar. The public, in fact, has had enough of railway bonds, and don't want any more. Even if new railway bonds could be sold, they could only be disposed of at a sacrifice which would infallibly involve the company which made it in trouble, if not in ruin. No railroad company in this section of the country can afford to incur every three or four hundred thousand dollars in a negotiation of bonds without risking a receivership. Better default on the bonds at once than attempt to renew them at such a cost. In a word, it is impossible for railroad companies, whose bonds are now maturing, to meet them either out of their earnings or out of the proceeds of sales of new bonds.

The only resource left, under the law, is for the creditors to proceed by foreclosure. It is competent to any mortgage creditor to foreclose his mortgage, and to have the road sold under the forms of law. Whether this be an advisable course in the present crisis, No prudent man will embark in doubtful litigation if he can possibly avoid it. And we are bound to say that, of all the lawsuits which may seem to involve doubt and uncertainty, a suit for the foreclosure of a railway mortgage bond, drawn ten years ago, is the most doubtful and uncertain. Every one of the railway bonds of that date are, on the face of them, null and void by reason of looseness and informality. Others are open to grave cavil, and if opposed by shrewd lawyers might be found void after years. It is, in fact, only within a very brief period that legal accuracy has been introduced into these instruments; and the numerous and very unsettled questions on the decision of which the validity of bonds commanding high prices in our market wholly depends. Some railway mortgages in the West have ten years to run, yet, and the creditors, who have never touched a cent of interest since the foreclosure, are as far from obtaining their money as ever. In the West it is far worse. Some States have enacted laws apparently with the sole view of enabling debtors to cheat their creditors; to foreclose a mortgage and collect no money. Wisconsin, Ohio, or Iowa is the next easiest thing to damming up Niagara with a broomstick. In a word, a railway bondholder, if he could be harassed, and who seeks to recover the amount from the company by legal process, must make up his mind to many years of litigation at a cost which must be enormous, and with a prospect which at best is doubtful and uncertain.

Reverting, then, to the question above put—how are the bonds to be made to pay their maturing bonds?—we find that they can not do so voluntarily, and that they can not be compelled to pay against their will without a course of litigation which no prudent men will encounter. What is the next best thing to tried?

Several of the roads ask nothing but delay. The Erie paid every cent up in 1854 bonds which it can not pay in 1859 or 1860. The Michigan Southern asks a few years more; so do other roads. But what prospect is there that these bonds will be better able to pay then than now? Evidently none at all. The practice in the United States has been to build railroads for the sake of developing the country—hence three roads have been built where there was hardly business for one. That practice will not be abandoned. As soon as the present depression has been overcome, railroad building will again be revived, and every town, county, and village in the country will have a railroad running through it. Channels of communication will increase in the ratio of the square of the increase of population and settlement. The most that can be hoped is that second dividend-paying roads will continue to be profitable, and that some companies now temporarily depressed will recover themselves and resume their old place among dividend-paying concerns. But to expect that railroad companies which can not begin to pay their bonded debts now will be better able to do so five or ten or fifteen years hence, is to shut one's eyes to the inevitable tendency of our habits, and to the irresistible progress of enterprise.

We are thus driven to conclude that the most available and least troublesome course for railways and their bonded creditors to pursue, is to postpone indefinitely the redemption of their bonds. In principle, it must be admitted that this plan is wrong. Engagements, whether made by individuals or by corporations, should be fulfilled at all hazards. But in practice, the renewal, for an indefinite period, of railway bonds, presents fewer difficulties than any other course of dealing with them. This is the method usually adopted with mortgages on real estate, which, though invariably limited for a term of years, are seldom redeemed at maturity. Nor is this plan intrinsically unjust to the bona fide holder of railway bonds. Speculators often buy bonds with a view to making a profit on their redemption at par. But the public, when they buy them, take them as investments. Their object is not to make a profit by an advance on their original cost, but to secure a permanent income. The longer the bond, the better it suits them. They don't want the principal; and to them a term would merely put them to the trouble of seeking re-investment and running fresh risks. So long as the stipulated income is paid, their object is attained, and practically they have no demand for capital.

We are inclined to think that the great body of railway creditors will eventually acquiesce in the expediency of this course. Litigious persons and speculators will, of course, spend money in foreclosures; but, unless we are much mistaken, experience will not justify the wisdom of these parties. As a general rule, all these creditors will fare best who, looking merely to the practical point—the annual income—make no complaint so long as that is regularly forthcoming, and allow their bonds to remain, in all practical intents and purposes, irredeemable.

THE TERRITORY OF ARIZONA.

We hear that the Mexican Governor of Sonora has made suitable explanations to our representatives on the Pacific, and that the blockade of Guaymas has been raised. So far as it goes this is satisfactory. Sonora is the natural sea-port of Arizona, and for the sake of the Arizonians it should be kept open.

It will be well to observe the fact that, as matters stand, our fellow-citizens residing in the territory of Arizona are practically dependent upon the good-will of a guerrilla chief for their only communication with the outside world. We call the Governor of Sonora a guerrilla chief; he acknowledges no dependence on any Mexican government, and is practically powerful and unquestionably a guerrilla. We call the Guaymas port the only exit from Arizona; there is another, it is true, via Texas, but as it involves a month's journey across the desert, it does not deserve to be considered a natural outlet for Arizona, any more than the ports on Hudson's Bay are outlets for New York or the natural ports of Canada is Guaymas, and for permission to use that our countrymen are indebted, as we said above, to the good-will of a guerrilla chief.

By the recently concluded between the representative of the United States and the Juarez Government in Mexico, a perpetual right of transit between Arizona and Guaymas is secured to the United States. That treaty, however, has not, in the first place, been ratified by the United States Senate, and there is reason to believe that the Republican Senators will oppose it on party grounds, lest the Democrats should derive benefit from its ratification; and, in the second place, until the United States interfere openly with arms in the affairs of Mexico, the Juarez Government can grant no valid rights in that country. Every promise what it pleases, but it can not fulfill nothing.

The condition of our fellow-citizens in Arizona reflects no credit on the Government of the United States.

THE LOUNGER.

MACAULAY.

How fast our celebrated men have been dropping from our sight! Hamilton Gibson lately was old men, and in the order of nature calmly passed away; but Macaulay was not old; he was of an age when we expect to see a man who has not abused his powers giving us the fruits of his ripened experience and digested knowledge. Macaulay, indeed, was doing it, and in the best and most characteristic way. For his power was that of a dramatic historian—an annalist. His best essays are his historic essays; and the best part of his purely literary sketches of famous books and people is his account of the times in which they lived and their position in them, with a general estimate of character.

Thus his famous but early review of Milton is as poor a piece of literary criticism, as such, as we shall easily find; but it is a masterly sketch of the circumstances of the time in which the poet lived. The same is true of the article on Bacon. For Macaulay can only be called a great thinker, and no one who is not can be a great critic of thought. Compare, for instance, Carlyle's "Reviews," as they are called, with Macaulay's. Read the papers of the former upon Burns, Scott, Goethe, Richter, and Johnson, and place them by Macaulay's Milton, Bacon, Addison, and Miss Burney. The latter are purely personal sketches, single figures projected against the times in which they lived, which also live under the descriptive touch of the writer; but the former are estimates of intellectual power and significance. Enough of the times is stated to give interest and color; but it is a matter of philosophical analysis, not of historical description.

Macaulay's finest passages all show the bent of his mind. Probably the trial scene in the "Warren Hastings" is the most famous and successful illustration of his peculiar literary power. And it is this gift—an instinct for history, so to speak, developed by a remarkably trained, powerful and judicial memory and faculty of acquirement, and expressing itself in a curiously elaborate, antithetical, and luminous style—which makes Macaulay pre-eminently the popular English historian. Probably he was as impartial as historians ever can be, for that ideal impartiality, which is very often supposed to be the highest excellence of a historian, is simply impossible. A man's sympathies are not under his control, and they necessarily color what he ever they touch. He need not take a side in obsolete quarrels; but if he write honestly he can not help, directly or indirectly, expressing or implying judicial memory and faculty of acquirement, and expressing itself in a curiously elaborate, antithetical, and luminous style—which makes Macaulay pre-eminently the popular English historian. Probably he was as impartial as historians ever can be, for that ideal impartiality, which is very often supposed to be the highest excellence of a historian, is simply impossible. A man's sympathies are not under his control, and they necessarily color what he ever they touch. He need not take a side in obsolete quarrels; but if he write honestly he can not help, directly or indirectly, expressing or implying

Yet Macaulay's style, which is so praised and has been so much imitated, in a word, is one we hardly be called one of the great, original, English styles, like Taylor's, and Sir Thomas Brown's, Bacon's, Milton's, Addison's, Johnson's, Goldsmith's, Lamb's, and Carlyle's. It is more popular and intelligible, perhaps, than any of these; and indeed Macaulay will stand among English prose writers much as Pope does among the poets. Every boy will concede how clear and adequate and finished his work is—and that is, perhaps, enough just now.

BARBARIC.

One of the inconveniences of a newly-settled country like ours is the loss or oversight of individuality. It also shows itself among us in very different and very amusing ways—sometimes also in ways not so amusing. Our vast living—our pecuniferous style of comfort and luxury—of which the inmates are a population swarming all over the stairs, through the halls, and in the various offices —bustling, jostling, crowding, hurrying—busy as bees in a hive, and as little individual. A guest arrives, is ushered, is recorded—has his name on his candle, and leaves his name in pledge at the office. He is no longer Smith, or even Jones; he is number ten, number seven hundred and fortynine.

So at table, at the great ordinary, he suits himself, and the national fried beefsteak, swimming in grease—the national mud-slop called coffee, and the national "saxe" are swiftly and noisily "dumped" before him. Solemnly he swallows and silently gulps—solemnly he draws to himself the national pie and silently bolts; and having made sure of a good dyspepsia, in the shortest possible time, he rises and departs.

This comes, of course, from the neighborhood of Indians and wage life. And if you have any doubt of it listen to that frightful crash which at each fire-bell startles the whole house, with its five hundred inhabitants, and neutralizes for a awful shock any benefit they may have derived from sleep. Hear the sing-song—all inarticulate—semibrutalical, and immediately prefiguring that gnashing of teeth which some of us may have good reason for even thinking to think of. Now hear the gong is Chinese. Suppose it is, are the Chinese civilized? How about the feet of Ah Sing? Their extreme knowledge of things is not civilization. Do we not know that the sloppy mud which does duty upon our tables as coffee is abominable? Why do we not drink it ourselves? Do you call that civilization? Knowledge turned to improvement is civilization, as when, having once been swindled by a gong, you devise a bell on the head of the next man who strikes a gong while you are sleeping shall pay the penalty. That is civilization in its enlarged and generous sense.

Have we sufficiently reflected what an outrage this crashing of gongs is? Fancy any one of the cases of which there are sure to be a score in any large hotel. First, there are those who are acutely ill, and to whom sudden and loud noises are fatal risks. Then there are the chronically nervous people to whom such a hideous tumult is a cruel pang. Of course people ought not to have nerves—but they do have them; and you may be sure gongs will not cure them. Then there are the people who are watched and waited on, who are not composed to sleep until a late hour of the night or an early one of the morning. Then the arrivals by the late boat or the midnight train, who after they be startled and confounded in their very first nap? Is there no mercy left? Suppose gongs are Chinese, we ask—we are American; and one of the indefeasible rights of man is to have his nap out.

It springs, of course, from the same want of individual respect that leads people in cars deliberately to swear against you—to go to sleep, if they can, on your shoulders, and in hotels to slam their doors, and sing and whistle and shout at all hours in the passages—to fling their boots down at the doors of their rooms, as if nobody else had any rights of quiet and comfort because you have arrived and have taken a room.

Now, since the gong is determined to have us all up, why may we not turn to and put it down that we may turn in in peace? People wake themselves up at home, or are quietly called—why may not the same thing be true of the hotels? In prisons, where offenders against the public peace are sent for punishment, you may, with some show of justice, add the severity of a universal waking by the gong. But even there it is questionable whether an action might not lie for cruel and unusual punishment.

WHOSE FAULT?

It is decided apparently that the building fell because one iron pillar was not strong enough. Rather the contrary jar, or the vibration, from not the weakness of the walls or the quicksand beneath—overcame the resistance of one fatal column, and the whole came down.

Of course in the first moments of such a horrible catastrophe there is a loud cry, first for the occasion, then for the responsible man. Whose fault was it? Who ought to have known the weak spots and guarded against them? Now there is a wave of indignation mingled with that of sympathy and horror. "The owners are responsible, or the builders, or the architect, or somebody." Surely somebody must have known, or heard, or suspected. Great buildings do not come down on the run, and nobody in the world know any thing about it. There is foul play somewhere. Concealment itself is foul play. Ignorance is crime, in such a matter. Nobody has a right to be ignorant any thing. Carnal is always criminal. Great manufacturers are great assuming. Every mill is a possible lecturetomb. Let's have the owners, the architects, and builders straightway hung for murder."

It is natural. It is often enough reasonable; but it is not always so. There is a limit to human prevision and the possibilities of caution. We have no particular right in this country, where we do not do so cheap a thing, or to insist upon it very strongly, but it is still true. There may be a weakness of material perfectly hidden from any practical action. That weakness may be very accurately computed. But sometimes the calculation may fail because of some imperfection in the material—a certain jar incessantly or periodically continued, may, probably will, produce certain results. But it may be a very delicate experiment to know whether the particular piece of metal has had the dangerous amount of jar.

The point is that we have no right to impute criminality or criminal negligence too impetuously. If, for instance, any body seriously interested in the Pemberton Mill had known that last summer in the least suspicion that they could not stand, it is not one of the cases in which he would have run for bail, because that is not the way to avoid losses, and at any moment. He would have insisted upon a thorough examination, a thing which every day takes place. If, on the other hand, the fact is there had been any such insinuation, freely circulated, it would not have come to the ears of those sufficiently interested to have had the matter on the facts. That there were some people who did say that the building was weak, who complained that the walls were weak, etc., etc., may be very true. But the walls are not known to have been settling gradually strong (at least up to this moment of writing), and the foundations seem to be unshaken still. It is the iron columns which have failed.

Moreover, suspicions of large new buildings are universal. Scarcely a hall is built any where that heads are not shaken. It is the fashion of every new some day. There is to be some fatal night when we shall see what we shall see; and a great many worthy people avoid the hall until time has proved its stability.

If any body thinks a building is weak, he has no right to say it to the public at all to and his collocutor by telling the owner or the tenant that he thinks so. It is not a private but a public matter. If a great building, such as a hall, a factory, a hotel, a railway depôt, is suspected, it is something in which we are all interested; and the worthy people avoid it. But the owner of such a building likely to tumble down is the worst kind of nuisance; and a man should have no glory who cried formally to the public that his building perhaps scores of human beings, shaking his head wisely, and saying, "Exactly—I told you so. I knew all about it." I see that the doctor was all sand, and the timber rotten, and that it was bound to come all in a heap, some bright day.

If you did know all this, Sir, and held your tongue, you are the responsible man we are looking for. And if knowing it you have been interested persons, they did not attend to you, why did you not go to the authorities and complain?

"It was none of my business."

Why, what is the business of any citizen but the public safety? What man would not be anxious, merely as a matter of self-interest, to know if a store he has built should be sealed by official authority as secure. It is not so difficult or incessant a thing to have a few pieces of building well tested, especially when they are in course of erection, and then, if ever, the suspicion arises. The reports that come from the public must prove either too much or nothing; that is, they show that they were not really believed by the persons who told them, because if they were they would be savages if they held their tongues, or they show that the persons conceived that they might be savages and yet honest citizens.

Of course, if it shall be established at Lawrence that the mills were built of rotten timber, and that the guilt must lie upon those who had the knowledge; and upon them the punishment also should fall.

OFF THE TRACK.

The rule is exactly the same in railway accidents. Some must be accounted unavoidable. For instance, when a piece of iron that has been tested suddenly cracks, snaps, and throws the train over, it can not be said indeed that lives need be lost, because, if the train had been proceeding at the rate of a mile an hour, life would not have been lost although the iron did not snap. But there are certain chances—certain risks, and all we can justly insist upon is the most stringent care.

Such care, for instance, as was most distinctly not shown in either of the late accidents upon the Hudson or Harlem roads. A train goes into a tunnel, stops for a moment, and another train goes in, and, in the obscurity, dashes directly upon the first train. It is as criminally careless as to let a child fall out of a window. No train any where should be allowed to run so closely to another that a man might not have time to go back a mile to give warning. The question does not admit of debate. The person who arranged the time-table are as clearly responsible as men can be for any event; because, according to the statement, there was not time to stop the following train even had it been attempted.

On the Hudson road the same kind of carelessness caused the recent fatal smash. Apparently there was time to warn the following train, but nobody thought it a matter of vital importance. The flagman saw the coming train, says, "I ought, I suppose, have gone faster: I might have gone to the curve." The conductor, it appears, had sent him, and probably he was attending to his work. But every traveler by railway ought to remember that, if he be in danger when the train is moving, he is in danger also when it stops out of place. And every conductor ought certainly to inform the passengers what causes the detention, and to forbid to them that they are much safer out of the cars than in them. Half—perhaps nine-tenths of all the railway accidents are avoidable; and it is a matter of public interest and congratulation that Mr. W. J. A. Fuller, who was one of the victims of the recent smash upon the last summer, is steadily pushing his criminal suit against the Company.

There has been a real improvement in this matter within a few years. The Norwalk tragedy was a culmination of horrors, and greater care has doubtless been exercised since. In the event upon the Hudson road shows how useless the strictest care of the superior authorities may be. The Company, we will suppose, has done its utmost to secure safety at all hazards. The train is stopped on the way, and the conductor orders the flagman to signal the approaching train. He signals the next flagman—or thinks he does—or means to—or doesn't. The next flagman does or does not see; but in either case the result is the same. Is the Company to be blamed—or the conductor? Surely not. It is a most melancholy result of indifference, or worse than indifference, neither very, and neither could be responsible. There must be subordinates. The subordinates must have certain latitude of action and the immediate inspection of the conductor. They may be thoughtless, reckless, and in such cases

Undoubtedly such carelessness ought to be made penal in the severest manner. At such a moment the flagman is responsible for the entire care of the lives of all the passengers, and his penalty should be in the degree of the responsibility.

However, we are inclined to allow that, when we consider the thousands of persons who are travelling by rail at almost all hours of the day and night, the accidents are really very small, notwithstanding the terrible computation of the Professor who reduced to statistical tables the average chances of railway travel. Scarcely a train goes without an express agent, and that unhappy man owes, by the laws of statistics, his life, arm, and limb to the consideration of the doctrine of chances. Yet there is also the chance that you and not he may happen to be the victim. And, on the whole, it is a branch of statistics particularly well worth studying.

PUBLIC HALLS OVERHAULED.

Is there a public hall in your town? Is it sometimes crowded at concerts, fairs, Sunday-school festivals, lectures, and other assemblies? If it takes fire, how many will be burned to death? When the audience retires in the most orderly manner, does it take ten or twenty minutes, or more, to empty the room? In case of panic, how soon would it be emptied, do you think? Or do halls never burn in your town?

A lawyer once said that the world looking and meditating can not help seeing a great many halls of the kind that would secure the destruction of the audience in the event of a panic or a fire. How is it in New Bedford? . How in New London? How in Troy? in Auburn? in Rochester, even, with the Corinthian Athenæum Hall? How in Providence? in Salem? in Philadelphia? in Buffalo? Where, in fact, is the public hall that is not really a trap? The first necessity of a theatre is an adequate egress, because a theatre is considered, and most likely expects, and because the panic, in case of alarm, is certain. But the chances in almost any theatre, even without such precautions as those in the New York and Boston houses, are more favorable to the safety of the audience than in most halls. Suppose, for instance, that a fire were to occur in the pit—as before his "Washington." The hall will be packed as full as possible. You and your wife, your aunt, your cousin Mary, and your wife's uncle, are all there. You have secured capital seats in the middle of the hall; you are all attention; the orator is all eloquence; when suddenly, suddenly, suddenly, "Fire! fire!" Think of it! Is it certainly very possible; and you remember that the only egress for all that mass of people is by the broad door and staircase at the end of the hall. What is the chance that your wife will escape to enjoy the proceeds of the insurance upon your life?

This is all very possible, without any foolish apprehensions at all; and why do you "stand it?" Why do you and your neighbors and the whole town consent to run this terrible risk, when it might be so easily avoided? Suppose the catastrophe occurs; who is to blame? It is not to be put off upon proprietors, and builders, and other people in general. You went with a full knowledge of the dangerous risk; you took your family with you. You knew that if any thing happened you would suffer; your remonstrance and that of your neighbors could have prevented it, and upon you and them the responsibility falls and must remain.

Such a hall is as much a nuisance as a shaky building, and ought to be indicted. You ought to be willing to serve a year in the town council that you may introduce a bill requiring certain facilities of egress from every large room designed to be used as a place of public assembly. Such a hall ought to be allowed to be upon the third floor, for instance, or so situated that only two or three small doors at the ends are possible. And if no private person would put up a hall under such restrictions as these, some means indicates to be necessary for the public security. Let it be erected by the town. No hall is very valuable property, and it ought to be given to a public object. The proper chances of safety can be secured in no other way.

In the city of Hudson, where there is a large and handsome hall for various purposes, the exposure of life is so clearly perceived that measures are to be taken to remedy the difficulty. And yet the hall in Hudson is no worse than dozens than the halls in scores of other cities. But the people in that city are going to lock the door before the fire is stolen, and they are not satisfied out of their resolution by hearing that the horse is not to be stolen. That is perfectly easy to say before the theft.

REAL PEOPLE IN NOVELS.

One of the most celebrated of living novelists once wrote an exquisite paper in the style of the "Tatler," and the essayist upon a lady whom he honestly esteemed. Her portrait was drawn with a quaint grace, with no offensive personality or allusion, and with the perfect honesty of admiration of which any woman might have been proud. In his amazement she was indignant—her husband was indignant—her friends were indignant—the circle of friends was indignant—and the unfortunate novelist was left—to smile at the absurdity of mankind.

Another famous novelist, Mr. Dickens, has been incessantly accused of "showing up" various people. We have just published Nicholas Nickleby, half a hundred schoolmasters in Yorkshire indignantly declared that they had been satirized and maligned by Mr. Dickens! "Was, did make work'st thou in the ground so fast?" When "Bleak House" was published, it was currently reported that Mr. Dickens had libeled Lord Chief Kaimpole. A kind of airy confusion of moral distinctions, and a merry magic by which fumes of wine become overwhelming consciousness of selfishness which masked as boyish ignorance and romantic sentiment—a knavish subtlety, in fact, were said to be recognizable as those of the Lord Hunt. It was so cruel and incredible that it could not be true. Charles Dickens—the pet of the Anglo-Saxon world, the easy chief of the popular literature, and the great successor of Walter Scott, in the art which has given fame and fortune, and success, could so meanly malign the man who had grown old in literature, admired and loved by his critics, whom he was by every one loved, always poor, yet always loyal in life and lovely in nature—then Charles Dickens was not the man the world had thought him.

To state the case was to decide it. It was not so. How, or why, or what it was would sometime appear; and at last it does appear, and in a late number of All the Year Round Mr. Charles Dickens says:

"Four or five years ago the writer of these lines was much pained by accidentally encountering a printed statement that Leigh Hunt was the original of Harold Skimpole in 'Bleak House.' The writer of these lines is the author of that book. The statement came from America. It is unexpected to that country, in which the writer has, perhaps, as many friends and as many readers as any man that lives, gratuitously to state the fact that he has, now and then, been the subject of paragraphs in transatlantic newspapers more astonishing destitute of all foundation in fact than the wildest delusions of the wildest lunatics. For nobody could have known better than the writer. But since Mr. Leigh Hunt's death the statement has been received in England. His delicacy and generosity refrained in its revival are for the rather late consideration of its revivers. The fact is this: Exactly three graces and three virtues were found assembled in the man the world we have quoted were remembered by the author of the words of Harold Skimpole as affording the character in question. Above all other things, that 'sort of gay sadness' which is so frequently found in the sufferings of a soldier which had many a time delighted him, and impressed him as being unspeakably whimsical and attractive, was found by no quality so marked for the man in question. Partly for this reason, and partly (he has since often grieved to think) for the pleasure it afforded him, the writer of that delightful manner responding itself under his hand, he seized the idea, and, without any malice, invited the character speak like his old friend. He no more thought, God forgive him! that the animated original would be enraged than he thought the imaginary views of the fictitious Archdeacon Grantly would make an Archdeacon Grantly mad when set for Iago's leg in the picture. And he was the more occasional manner he assumed to be so cautious and conscientious that he privately referred the passage in the first number of that book to two intimate literary friends of Leigh Hunt (both still living), and altered the whole of that part of the text accordingly, before they so strong a resemblance to 'his ways.'

"He can not see the sun by this wreath on the fire, and he can not see him in the character of ever thinking that the present words might have righted the author's memory and his own. Nevertheless, he can and know that his own son may have to explain his father when folly or malice can wound his heart no more, and have this task undone."

So is it constantly in novel-writing. Some traits—some facts, perhaps—some humorous or characteristic points are considered to be woven into entirely fictitious characters, and straightway every incident, and the whole character, are declared to have been drawn from life, and to be "showings up" of certain people.

Shall painters, therefore, draw legs without models?

HON. JOHN HICKMAN, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

JOHN HICKMAN, the representative in Congress from the sixth Congressional District of Pennsylvania, was born on the 11th of September, 1810, in the Township of West Bradford, five miles west from the Borough of West Chester, the seat of justice for the old and populous County of Chester. He springs from a family of the same name long settled in the two counties composing his district, and principally distinguished as enterprising and successful agriculturists. In the year 1831 Mr. Hickman married the daughter of the Hon. Townsend Haines, now President-Judge of the Fifteenth Judicial District of Pennsylvania; and after prosecuting his studies for the prescribed period, was admitted to the bar on the 9th of April, 1833. He entered political life before his majority, casting his first vote with the Democratic party in 1831; supporting General Jackson in 1832; and adhering to the Democracy in all the national campaigns up to the present time. He was chosen a delegate to the Baltimore Convention which nominated James K. Polk, in 1844. Public attention was first drawn to him in this Convention as an eloquent and logical debater, and he is mentioned historically by Colonel Benton, in his work, "Thirty Years in the United States Senate," in connection with the proceedings of the National Convention held at Baltimore in 1844.

After the nomination of Mr. Polk Mr. Hickman returned to his district, and entered into the struggle with enthusiasm. During the canvass he spoke on more than one hundred occasions. He received the Democratic nomination for Congress of his district in 1844, but party lines were then too closely drawn either for himself or friends to hope for an election—the district at that time being generally carried by the old Whig party, with a majority ranging from fifteen to eighteen hundred. In the early part of the year 1845 he was appointed by the Hon. John K. Kane Prosecuting Attorney for Chester County, a position he held with great distinction.

He entered into all the succeeding State and National campaigns with great vigor and earnestness. He labored energetically for the election of General Cass in 1848; and in 1852 equally so for General Pierce. In 1854 he was nominated by the Democracy of his district for Congress. The first impression was very decidedly against his election, because of the heavy opposition majority; but his opponent becoming entangled in a difficulty with a portion of his own party, the disaffected—many of whom were personal friends and admirers of Mr. Hickman—threw their votes for him, and elected him to Congress by a majority reaching very nearly to three thousand!

When the Kansas-Nebraska legislation—which included the repeal of the Missouri Compromise—was before the country, Mr. Hickman was opposed to it. He had at all times said if he had been in Congress he would have voted against that legislation, but before his election he took decided ground in opposition to the "restoration" of the Missouri line. He would have favored the extension of the Missouri line to the Pacific, but after its abrogation he accepted the doctrine of Popular Sovereignty as originally held by its advocates.

Mr. Hickman defended his old friend, Hon. A. H. Reeder, when his contested election came before the House of Representatives. Being a member of the Committee of Elections in the thirty-fourth Congress, the case of Governor Reeder was committed principally to his charge by the majority of that Committee. It was he who, on behalf of the Committee, asked for power to send for persons and papers, so as to lay bare to the country all the facts in regard to the frauds charged in the elections in Kansas; whence mainly came the voluminous report showing that the alleged frauds in that Territory were true in nearly every particular. Mr. Hickman was again renominated by the Democracy of his district, and re-elected to Congress in 1856.

While Mr. Buchanan was absent at the Court of St. James, Mr. Hickman declared in favor of him as the Democratic nominee for the next President, maintained this position until his nomination was secured at Cincinnati, in 1856, and entered into the canvass with enthusiasm.

It is well known that he has since had the misfortune, in common with many other members of the Democratic party, to disagree with Mr. Buchanan in regard to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton Constitution. He took positive grounds against the Lecompton Constitution, opposed the English bill, and threw himself into direct antagonism to the National Administration. He came home to his constituents in 1858; was renominated for Congress in the autumn of that year by the Anti-Lecompton Democrats, and afterward by a portion of the Republican party. Both of the great parties in the district were rent in twain by his popularity. Three candidates were in the field, and Mr. Hickman, in a contest of unexampled bitterness, where every salient point was attacked, came forth successful from the encounter.

Mr. Hickman has fine social qualities, and is never happier than when in the midst of his associates. Public life is not his choice. Once out of his present prominent position he would never return to it voluntarily. He is recognized at home as a man of unquestioned courage, courteous toward his adversary, but unwilling to make a single concession by which the truth would fail to be vindicated. His powers as an orator, combined with close analytical and logical reasoning faculties, are freely admitted where he is best known.

LUMLEIGH HOUSE.

November 27.—My forebodings are realized. The marriage is fixed for the twenty-third of December.

The day after we left for Polesdean Lodge, Sir Percival wrote, it seems, to Mr. Fairlie, to say that the necessary repairs and alterations in his house in Hampshire would occupy a much longer time in completion than he had originally anticipated. The proper estimates were to be submitted to him as soon as possible; and it would greatly facilitate his entering into definite arrangements with the workpeople if he could be informed of the exact period at which the wedding ceremony might be expected to take place. He could then make all his calculations in reference to time, besides writing the necessary apologies to friends who had been engaged to visit him that winter, and who could not, of course, be received when the house was in the hands of the workmen.

To this letter Mr. Fairlie had replied by requesting Sir Percival himself to suggest a day for the marriage, subject to Miss Fairlie's approval, which her guardian willingly undertook to do his best to obtain. Sir Percival wrote back by the next post, and proposed (in accordance with his own views and wishes from the first) the latter part of December—perhaps the twenty-third or twenty-fourth, or any other day that the lady and her guardian might prefer. The lady not being at hand to speak for herself, her guardian had decided, in her absence, on the earliest day mentioned—the twenty-third of December—and had written to recall us to Limmeridge in consequence.

After explaining these particulars to me at a private interview, yesterday, Mr. Fairlie suggested, in his most amiable manner, that I should open the necessary negotiations to-day. Feeling that resistance was useless, unless I could first obtain Laura's authority to make it, I consented to speak to her, but declared, at the same time, that I would on no consideration undertake to gain her consent to Sir Percival's wishes. Mr. Fairlie complimented me on my "excellent conscience," much as he would have complimented me, if we had been out walking, on my "excellent constitution," and seemed perfectly satisfied, so far, with having simply shifted one family responsibility from his own shoulders to mine.

This morning I spoke to Laura as I had promised. The composure—I may almost say, the insensibility—which she has so strangely and so resolutely maintained ever since Sir Percival left us, was not proof against the shock of the news I had to tell her. She turned pale, and trembled violently.

"Not so soon!" she pleaded. "Oh, Marian, not so soon!"

The slightest hint she could give was enough for me. I rose to leave the room, and fight her battle for her own way. But Laura stopped me.

Just as my hand was on the door she caught fast hold of my dress, and stopped me.

"Let me go!" I said. "My tongue burns to tell your uncle that he and Sir Percival are not to have it all their own way."

She sighed bitterly, and still held my dress.

"No!" she said, faintly. "Too late, Marian—too late!"

"Not a minute too late," I retorted. "The question of time is our question—and trust me, Laura, to take a woman's full advantage of it."

I unclasped her hand from my gown while I spoke; but she slipped both her arms round my waist at the same moment, and held me more effectually than ever.

"It will only involve us in more trouble and more confusion," she said. "It will set you and my uncle at variance, and bring Sir Percival here again with fresh causes of complaint—"

"So much the better!" I cried out, passionately. "Who cares for his causes of complaint? Are you to break your heart to set his mind at ease? No man under heaven deserves these sacrifices from us women. Men! They are the enemies of our innocence and our peace—they drag us away from our parents' love and our sisters' friendship—they take us body and soul to themselves, and fasten our helpless lives to theirs as they chain up a dog to his kennel. And what does the best of them give us in return? Let me go, Laura—I'm mad when I think of it!"

The tears — miserable, weak women's tears of vexation and rage—started to my eyes. She smiled sadly, and put her handkerchief over my face, to hide for me the betrayal of my own weakness—the weakness of all others which she knew that I most despised.

"Oh, Marian!" she said. "You crying! Think what you would say to me if the places were changed, and if those tears were mine. All your love and courage and devotion will not alter what must happen, sooner or later. Let my uncle have his way. Let us have no more troubles and heartburnings that any sacrifice of mine can prevent. Say you will live with me, Marian, when I am married—and say no more."

But I did say more. I forced back the contemptible tears that were no relief to me, and that only distressed her; and reasoned and pleaded as calmly as I could. It was of no avail. She made me twice repeat the promise to live with her when she was married, and then suddenly asked a question which turned my sorrow and my sympathy for her into a new direction.

"While we were at Polesdean," she said, "you had a letter, Marian—"

Her altered tone; the abrupt manner in which she looked away from me, and hid her face on my shoulder; the hesitation which silenced her before she had completed her question, all told me but too plainly to whom the half-expressed inquiry pointed.

"I thought, Laura, that you and I were never to refer to him again," I said, gently.

"You had a letter from him?" she persisted.

"Yes," I replied, "if you must know it."

"Do you mean to write to him again?"

I hesitated. I had been afraid to tell her of his absence from England, or of the manner in which my exertions to serve his new hopes and projects had connected me with his departure. What answer could I make? He was gone where no letters could follow with the chance of reaching him for months, perhaps for years, to come.

"Suppose I do mean to write to him again," I said, at last. "What then, Laura?"

Her cheek grew burning hot against my neck, and her arms trembled and tightened round me.

"Don't tell him about the twenty-third," she whispered. "Promise, Marian—pray promise you will not even mention my name to him when you write next."

I gave the promise—no words can say how sorrowfully I gave it. She instantly took her arm from my waist, walked away to the window, and stood looking out, with her back to me. After a moment she spoke once more, but without turning round, without allowing me to catch the smallest glimpse of her face.

"Are you going to my uncle's room?" she asked. "Will you say that I consent to whatever arrangement he may think best? Nevermind leaving me, Marian. I shall be better alone for a little while."

I went out. If, as soon as I got into the passage, I could have transported Mr. Fairlie and Sir Percival Glyde to the uttermost ends of the earth, by lifting one of my fingers, that finger would have been raised without an instant's hesitation. For once, my unhappy temper now stood my friend. I should have behaved rudely altogether and burst into a violent fit of crying, if my tears had not been all burned up in the heat of my anger. As it was, I dashed into Mr. Fairlie's room—called to him as harshly as possible, that Laura consents to the twenty-mile journey—and dashed out again without waiting for a word of answer. I banged the door after me; and I kept it shuttered Mr. Fairlie's nervous system for the rest of the day.

28th.—This morning I read poor Hartright's farewell letter over again; a doubt having crossed my mind since yesterday whether I am acting wisely in concealing the fact of his departure from Laura.

On reflection, I still think I am right. The allusions in his letter to the preparations made for the expedition to Central America all show that the leaders of it know it to be dangerous. If the discovery of this makes me uneasy, what would it make her? It is bad enough to feel that the departure has deprived us of the friend of all others to whose devotion we could trust in the hour of need, if ever that hour comes and finds us helpless. But it is far worse to know that he has gone from us to face the perils of a bad climate, a wild country, and a disturbed population. Surely it would be a cruel candor to tell Laura this, without a pressing and a positive necessity for it?

I almost doubt whether I ought not to go a step further, and burn the letter at once, for fear of its one day falling into wrong hands. It not only refers to Laura in terms which ought to remain a secret forever between the writer and me, but it reiterates his suspicion—so obstinate, so unaccountable, and so alarming —that he has been secretly watched since he left Limmeridge. He declares that he saw the faces of the two strange men who followed him about the streets of London watching him among the crowd which gathered at Liverpool to see the expedition embark; and he positively asserts that he heard the name of Anne Catherick pronounced behind him as he got into the boat. His own words are, "These events have a meaning—these events must lead to a result. The mystery of Anne Catherick is not cleared up yet. She may never cross my path again; but if ever she crosses yours make better use of the opportunity, Miss Halcombe, than I made of it. I speak on strong conviction; I entreat you to remember what I say." These are his own expressions. There is no danger of my forgetting them—my memory is only too ready to dwell on any words of Hartright's that refer to Anne Catherick. But there is danger in my keeping the letter. The merest accident might place it at the mercy of strangers. I may fall ill; I may die; better to burn it at once, and have one anxiety the less by knowing that it has been destroyed.

It is burned! The ashes of his farewell letter are the last he may ever write to me—lie in a few black fragments on the hearth. Is this the end to all that sad story? Oh, not the end—surely, surely not the end already!

29th.—The preparations for the marriage have begun. The dress-maker has come to receive her orders. Laura is perfectly impassive, perfectly careless about the question of all others in which a woman's personal interests are most closely bound up. She has left it all to the dress-maker and to me. If poor Hartright had been the betrothed, and the husband of her father's choice, how differently she would have behaved! How anxious and capricious she would have been; and what a hard task the best of dressmakers would have found it to please her!

30th.—We hear every day from Sir Percival. The last news is that the alterations in his house will occupy from four to six months before they can be properly completed. If painters, paper-hangers, and upholsterers could make happiness as well as splendor, I should be interested about their proceedings in Laura's future home. As it is, the only part of Sir Percival's last letter which does not leave me as it found me—perfectly indifferent to all his plans and projects—is the part which refers to the wedding-tour. He proposes, as Laura is delicate, and as the winter threatens to be unusually severe, to take her to Rome, and to remain in Italy until the early part of next summer. If this plan should not be approved, he is equally ready, although he has no establishment of his own in town, to spend the season in London, in the most suitable furnished house that can be obtained for the purpose.

Putting myself and my own feelings entirely out of the question (which is my duty to do, and which I have done), I, for one, have no doubt of the propriety of adopting the first of these proposals. In either case, a separation between Laura and me is inevitable. It will be a longer separation, in the event of their going abroad, than it would be in the event of my remaining in London; but we must set against this disadvantage the benefit to Laura, on the other side, of passing the winter in a milder climate; and, more than that, the immense assistance in existing her spirits and occupying her time when our existence, which the mere wonder and excitement of traveling for the first time in her life in the most interesting quarters of the world must surely afford. She is not of a disposition to find resources in the conventional gayeties and excitements of London. It seems so cold and so unfeeling to be looking at the future already in this cruelly composed way. But what other way is possible, now that the time is drawing so near? Before another month is over our heads we will be his husband and wife mine! His Laura! I am as little able to realize the idea which those two words convey—my mind feels almost as confused and giddy as if I were the rival of her marriage were like writing of her death.

December 1.—A sad, sad day; a day that I have no heart to describe at any length. After weakly putting it off last night, I was obliged to speak to her this morning of Sir Percival's proposal about the wedding-tour.

In the full conviction that I should be with her wherever she went, the kind, devoted—for a child she is still in many things—was almost happy at the prospect of seeing the wonders of Florence and Rome once more. The next moment broke my heart to dispel her delusion, and to bring her face to face with the hard truth. I was obliged to tell her that Sir Percival was a rival—not even a woman-rival—in his wife's affections, which, be the reason, whatever he may do afterward. I was obliged to make sure that my chance of living with her permanently, under her own roof, depended entirely on my not arousing Sir Percival's jealousy and distrust by standing between them at the beginning of their married life, in the position of the chosen depository of his wife's closest secrets. Drop by drop I poured the profaning bitterness of this horrible revelation into the cup of my sister's innocent mind, while every higher and better feeling within me recoiled from my miserable task. Drop by drop, during the whole of it, I suffered the inevitable lesson. The simple illusions of her girlhood are gone, and my hand has stripped them off. Better mine than his—that is all my consolation—better mine than his!

When the first proposal is the proposal accepted. They are to go to Italy; and I am to arrange, with Sir Percival's permission, for meeting them and staying with them when they return to England. In other words, I am to ask a personal favor, for the first time in my life, and to ask it of the man of all others to whom I least desire to owe a serious obligation of my kind. Well! I think I could do even more than that for Laura's sake.

2d.—On looking back, I find myself always referring to Sir Percival as a single person or term. In the turn affairs have now taken I must and will root out my prejudices against him. I can not think fairly at first glances of any friend. It certainly never existed in former times.

Is it Laura's reluctance to become his wife that has set me against him? Have Hartright's perfectly intelligible prejudices infected me without my suspecting their influence? Does that letter of Anne Catherick's still leave a lurking distrust in my mind, in spite of Sir Percival's explanation, and of the light in my possession of the truth of it? I can not account for the state of my own feelings: the one thing I am certain of is, that it is my duty—doubly my duty now—not to wrong Sir Percival by unjustly distrusting him. If it has got to be a habit with me always to write of him in the same unfavorable manner, I must and will break myself of this unworthy tendency, even though the effort should force me to close the pages of my journal till the marriage is over! I am seriously dissatisfied with myself—I will write no more to-day.

* * * * * * *

December 16.—A whole fortnight has passed, and I have not once opened these pages. I have been long enough away from my journal to come back to it with a healthier and better mind, I hope, so far as Sir Percival is concerned.

There is not much to record of the past two weeks. The dresses are almost all finished, and the new traveling-trunks have been sent here from London. Poor dear Laura hardly leaves me for a moment all day; and last night, when neither of us could sleep, she came and crept into my bed to talk to me there. "I shall lose you so soon, Marian," she said; "I must make the most of you while I can."

They are to be married at Limmeridge Church, and, thank Heaven! not one of the neighbors is to be invited to the ceremony. The only visitor will be our old friend, Mr. Arnold, who is to come from Polesdean to give Laura away—the uncle having far too delicate to trust himself outside the door in such inclement weather as we now have. If I were not determined, from this day forth, to allow nothing but the bright side of our prospects, the melancholy absence of any male relative of Laura's, at the most important moment of her life, would make me very gloomy and very distrustful of the future. But I have done with gloom and distrust—that is to say, I have done with writing about either the one or the other in this journal.

Sir Percival is to arrive to-morrow. He often, I believe, is so wishful to treat him on terms of rigid etiquette, to write and ask our clergyman to grant him the hospitality of the rectory during the period of his sojourn at Limmeridge before the marriage. Under the circumstances, neither Mr. Fairlie nor I thought it at all necessary to put to trouble ourselves about attending to trifling forms and ceremonies. In our wild moorland country, and in this great lonely house, they will claim to be beyond the reach of the trivial conventionalities which hamper people in other places. I wrote to Sir Percival to thank him for his polite offer, and to beg that he would occupy his old rooms, just as usual, at Limmeridge House.

17th.—He arrived to-day, looking, as I thought, a little worn and anxious, but still talking and laughing like a man in the best possible spirits. He brought with him some really beautiful presents, in jewelry, which Laura received with her best grace, and, outwardly at least, with perfect self-possession. The only sign I can detect of the struggle it must cost her to preserve appearances at this trying time, expresses itself in a sudden unwillingness, on her part, ever to be left alone. She is afraid of retreating to her own room, as usual, she seems to dread going there. When I went up stairs to-day, after lunch, to put on my bonnet for a walk, she volunteered to join me; and, again, before dinner, she threw the door open between our two rooms, so that we might talk to each other while we were dressing. "Keep me always doing something," she said; "leave me no time to think about myself or anybody. Don't let me think—that is all I ask now, Marian—don't let me think."

This sad state of mind not only increases her attractions for Sir Percival. He interprets it, I can see, to his own advantage. There is a feverish flush in Laura's cheek, and a feverish brightness in her eyes, which he welcomes as the return of her beauty and the recovery of her spirits. She talked to him at dinner with a gayety and carelessness so false, so shockingly out of her character, that I secretly longed to silence her and take her away. Sir Percival's delight and surprise appeared to be beyond all expression. The anxiety which I had noticed on his face when he arrived totally disappeared from it; and he looked, even to my eyes, a good ten years younger than

He really is.

There can be no doubt—though some strange reason prevents me from seeing it myself—that there can be no doubt that Laura's future husband is a very handsome man. Regular features form a personal advantage to begin with — and he has them. Bright brown eyes, either in man or woman, are a great attraction—and he has them. Baldness, when it is only baldness over the forehead (as in his case), is rather becoming than not in a man, for it heightens the head and adds to the intelligence of the face. Grace and ease of movement; a pleasant good breeding; ready, pliant, conversational powers—all these are unquestionable merits, and all these he certainly possesses. Surely Mr. Gilmore, ignorant as he is of Laura's secret, was not to blame for feeling surprised that she should repent of her marriage engagement? Any one else in his place would have shared our good old friend's opinion. If I were asked, at this moment, to say plainly what defects I have discovered in Sir Percival, I could only point out two. One, his incessant restlessness and excitability—which may be caused, naturally enough, by unusual energy of character. The other, his short, sharp, contemptuous manner of speaking to the servants—which may be only a bad habit, after all. No: I can not dispute it, and I will not dispute it—Sir Percival is a very handsome and a very agreeable man. There! I have written it down at last, and I am glad it's over.

* * * * * * *

18th.—Feeling weary and depressed this morning, I left Laura with Mrs. Vesey, and went out alone for one of my brisk mid-day walks, which I have discontinued too much of late. I took the dry, airy road over the moor that leads to Todd's Corner. After having been out half an hour, I was excessively surprised to see Sir Percival approaching me from the direction of the farm. He was walking rapidly, swinging his stick; his head erect as usual, and his shooting-jacket flying open in the wind. When we met he did not wait for me to ask any questions—he told me, at once, that he had been to the farm in search of Mr. and Mrs. Todd had received any tidings, since his last visit to Limmeridge, of Anne Catherick.

"You found, of course, that they had heard nothing?" I said.

"Nothing whatever," he replied. "I begin to be seriously afraid that we have lost her. Do you happen to know," he continued, looking me in the face very attentively, "if the artist—Mr. Hartright—is in a position to give us any further information?"

"He has neither heard of her, nor seen her, since he left Cumberland," I answered.

"Very sad," said Sir Percival, speaking like a man who was disappointed, and yet, oddly enough, looking, at the same time, like a man who was relieved. "It is impossible to say what misfortunes may not have happened to the miserable creature. I am inexpressibly annoyed at the failure of all my efforts to restore her to the care and protection which she so urgently needs."

This time he really looked annoyed. I said a few sympathizing words, and we then talked of other subjects on our way back to the house. Surely an chance meeting with him on the moor has disclosed another favorable trait in his character? Surely it was singularly considerate and unselfish of him to think of Anne Catherick on the eve of his marriage, and to go all the way to Todd's Corner to make inquiries about her, when he might have left all the time so much more agreeably in Laura's society? Considering that he can only have acted from motives of pure charity, his conduct, under the circumstances, shows unusual good feeling, and deserves extraordinary praise. Well! I give him extraordinary praise—and there's an end of it.

19th.—More discoveries in the inexhaustible mine of Sir Percival's virtues.

To-day I approached the subject of my proposed separation under his wife's roof when he brings her back to England. I had hardly dropped my first hint in this direction before he caught me warmly by the hand, and said I had made the very offer to him which he had been on his side most anxious to make to me. I was the companion of all others whom he most sincerely longed to secure for his wife; and he begged me to believe that I had conferred a lasting favor on him by making the proposal to live with Laura after her marriage exactly as I had always lived with her before it.

"JUST AS MY HAND WAS ON THE DOOR SHE CAUGHT FAST HOLD OF MY DRESS, AND STOPPED ME."

When I had thanked him, in her name and in mine, for his considerate kindness to both of us, we passed next to the subject of his wedding tour, and began to talk of the English society in Rome to which Laura was to be introduced. He ran over the names of several friends whom he expected to meet abroad this winter. They were all English, as well as I can remember, with one exception. The one exception was Count Fosco.

The moment I heard the Count's name, and the discovery that he and his wife are likely to meet the bride and bridegroom on the Continent, put the whole marriage, for the first time, in a distinctly favorable light. It is likely to be the means of doing a family feud. Hitherto Madame Fosco has chosen to forget her obligations as Laura's aunt out of sheer spite against the late Mr. Fairlie for his conduct in the affair of the legacy. Now, however, she can persist in this course of conduct no longer. Sir Percival and Madame Fosco are old and fast friends, and their wives will have no choice but to meet on civil terms. Madame Fosco, in her maiden days, was one of the most unsurprising women I ever met with—capricious, exacting, and vain to the last degree of absurdity. If her husband has succeeded in bringing her to her senses he deserves the gratitude of every member of the family—and he may have mine to begin with.

I am becoming anxious to know the Count. He is the nearest friend of Laura's future husband, and in that capacity he excites my strongest interest. Neither Laura nor I have ever seen him. All I know of him is that his accidental presence, years ago, on the steps of the Trinita dei Monte at Rome, assisted Sir Percival's escape from a dagger-and-assassination, at the critical moment when he was wounded in the hand, and might, the next instant, have been wounded in the heart. I remember also that, at the time of the late Mr. Fairlie's absurd objections to his sister's marriage, the Count wrote the most appropriate and sensible letter on the subject, which, I am ashamed to say, remained unanswered. This is all I know of the Count, and I wonder if he will ever come to England? I wonder if I shall like him?

My pen is running away into mere speculation. Let me return to sober matter of fact. It is certain that Laura and I have entered on a venturesome proposal to live with his wife was more than kind—it was almost affectionate. I am sure Laura will like her, and I am sure I have to complain of me if I can only go on as I have begun. I have already declared him to be handsome. I have now to add a good feeling toward the unfortunate, and full of affectionate kindness toward me. Really I hardly know myself again in the new character of Sir Percival's warmest friend.

20th.—I have hit Sir Percival! I flatly deny his good looks; I consider him to be eminently disagreeable, and totally wanting in kindness and good feeling. He has made me hate him for the married couple were sent home. Laura opened the packet, and saw her husband's name in print for the first time. Sir Percival looked over her shoulder familiarly at the new card which had dropped into the basket! Miss Fairlie into Lady Glyde—smiled with the most odious self-complacency—and whispered something in her ear. I don't know what it was—Laura has refused to tell me—but I saw her face turn to such a deadly whiteness that I thought she would faint under the first sudden notice of the change: he seemed to be barbarously unconscious that he had said any thing to pain her. All my old feelings of hatred toward him revived on the instant; and all the hours that have passed since have done nothing to dissipate them. I have been unreasonable and more unjust than ever. In three words—how glibly my pen writes them!—in three words, I hate him.

21st.—Have the anxieties of this anxious time shaken me a little at last? I have been writing, for the last few days, in a tone of levity which, I feel now, has in fact enough from my heart, and which it has rather shocked me to discover on looking back at the entries in my journal.

Perhaps I may have caught the feverish excitement of Laura's spirits for the last week. If so, the fit has now passed away from me, and has left me in a very strange state of mind. A persistent idea has been forcing itself on my attention, ever since last night, that something will yet happen to prevent the marriage. What has produced this singular fancy? Is it the indirect result of the forebodings for Laura's future? Or has it been unconsciously suggested to me by the increasing restlessness and agitation which I have plainly observed in Sir Percival's manner as the wedding day draws nearer and nearer? Impossible to say. I know that I have the idea—verify the wildest ideas, under the circumstances, that ever entered a woman's head—and I can only say as I may, I can not trace it back to its source.

22d.—Such a day of confusion and wretchedness as I hope never to see again.

Kind Mrs. Vesey, whom we have all too much overlooked and forgotten of late, impudently caused us a sad morning to begin with. She has been, for months past, secretly making a warm Shetland shawl for her dear pupil—a most beautiful and surprising piece of work to be done by a woman at her age and with her habits. The gift was presented this morning; and poor warm-hearted Laura completely broke down when the shawl was put proudly on her shoulders by the loving old friend and guardian of her motherless childhood. I was hardly allowed time to quiet them both, or even to dry my own eyes, when Laura sent for by Mr. Fairlie, to be favored by a long recital of his arrangements for the preservation of his own tranquillity on the wedding-day.

"Dear Laura" was to receive his present—a shabby ring, with her affectionate aunt's hair for an ornament, instead of a precious stone, and with a heartless French inscription, inside, about congenial sentiments and eternal friendship—"dear Laura" was to receive this tender tribute from my hands immediately, so that she might have plenty of time to recover from the agitation produced by the gift, before she appeared in Mr. Fairlie's presence. "Dear Laura" was to pay him a little visit that evening, and to be kind enough not to make a scene. "Dear Laura" was to say how much she liked his visit in her wedding dress that morning, and to be kind enough, again, not to make a scene. "Dear Laura" was to look in once more, for the last time, before going away, but without harrowing his feelings by saying unless she was going away, and without tearing "in the name of pity, in the name of everything, dear Marian, that is most affectionate and most domestic and most delightful, don't distress me with self-composure without tears!" I was so exasperated by this miserable selfish trifling at such a time, that I should certainly have shocked Mr. Fairlie by some of the hardest and rudest truths he has ever heard in his life, if the arrival of Mr. Gilmore, from Chancery Lane, called me away, at the right moment, to new duties down stairs.

The rest of the day is indescribable. I believe no one in the house really knew how it passed. The confusion of small events, all hidden together, was worse than the confusion of every one. There were dresses sent home that had been forgotten; there were trunks to be packed and not packed; there were keys lost; there were presents from friends far and near, friendship and love. We were all needlessly hurried; all nervously excited, all in the wrong. Sir Percival, especially, was too restless now to remain five minutes together in the same place. That silent, sharp-eyed man in his troubled hits more than ever. He was in and out of the house all day long; and he appeared to give no inquisitive, on a sudden, that he questioned the very strangers who came on small errands to the house. Only this, of all this, now surprised thought, in Laura's mind and mine, that we were to part the next day, and the bunning casual, unexpected gift of a few days, not yet ever present to both, that this deplorable marriage might prove to be the one fatal error of her life that she or I could ever have to regret. For the first time in all the years of our close and happy intercourse we almost avoided looking each other in the face, and we both shrank from common consent, from speaking together in private, through the whole evening. I can dwell on it no longer. I dread what the next day may be in store for me, I shall always look back on this twenty-second of December as the most confused and most miserable day of my life.

I am writing these lines in the solitude of my own room, long after midnight; having just come back from my room, where I left Laura, pretty little white bed—the bed she has occupied since her childhood. She is asleep.

There she lay, unconscious that I was looking at her—quiet, more quiet than I had dared to hope, but not altogether in the repose of the night-light showed me that her eyes were only partially closed: the traces of tears glittered between her dark lashes. She had cried—only a brooch—lay on the table at her bedside, with her prayer-book, and the miniature portrait of her father inside, which she takes with her wherever she goes! I waited a moment, looking at her from behind her pillow, as she lay beneath me, with one arm and hand resting on the outside, the white coverlet, so still, so quietly breathing, that the frill on her night-dress never moved—I waited looking at her, as I have often waited thousands of times, as I shall never see her again—and then stole back to my room. My own love! she is all your wealth, all your beauty, how friendless you are! The one man who would give his heart's life to serve you, is far away, pursuing this stormy night, on the road of vile. Who else is left to you? No father, no brother—no living creature but Hartright, whose name the man who writes these sad lines, and watches by you for the morning, in sorrow that she can not compose, in fear that she can not conquer. Oh, what a trust is to be placed in that man's hands to-morrow! If ever he forgets it; if ever he injures a hair of her head—!

THE TWENTY-THIRD OF DECEMBER.—Seven o'clock. A wild unsettled morning. She has just risen—better and calmer, now that the time has come, than she was yesterday.

* * * * *

Ten o'clock. She is dressed. We have kissed each other; we have promised each other not to lose courage. I am sawy for a moment in my own room. In the whirl and confusion of my thoughts, I can detect that strange fancy of some terrible misfortune happening to stop the marriage still hanging about my mind. Is it longing about his mind, too? I see him from the window, moving about restlessly and uneasily among the carriages at the door.—How can I write such folly! The marriage is a certainty. In less than half an hour we start for the church.

Eleven o'clock. It is all over. They are married.

* * * * *

Three o'clock. They are gone! I am blind with crying—I can write no more—

LITERARY.

HARPER & BROTHERS have published a large number of valuable works within the past month.

Captain Macy's Prairie Traveler is a small book, but one of great importance and value. It is the confession of the California overland emigrant, and as well of every one who proposes to go west of the line of civilization. It is also a book of curious interest to the stayer-at-home, informing him of all the hardships and adventures to which the prairie traveler is subjected, and the ingenious ways and means of meeting or overcoming them. We need not say that it is unique, and its contents can not be found in any other book.

The Diary of a Samaritan, also from the press of Harper & Brothers, is a book such as we rarely meet with. It is the record of experience of a minister in the Howard Association of New Orleans, and takes us to the beauties of the sick and dying, unveiling scenes of thrilling interest that surpass all powers of romance to excel. Here life in its moments of confession—those frank, unguarded moments that preach death or accompany the expectation of dissolution—stands before us. It is a book to read that men may know what stuff they are made of.

We have a beautiful edition of Goethe's Correspondence with a Child, from Ticknor & Reids; and a new and cheap edition of Irely's illustrated edition of Tom Brown's School-days. This last book is a capital present to a boy. The illustrations, in the present issues, are most admirable; and the book every one knows to be capital.

John Neal's novel, True Womanhood, published by Ticknor & Co., is worth every one's reading. Our brief space forbids a long notice. The scene of the story is during the period of greatest interest in the late revival and prayer-meetings. The plot hangs on a certain lot of forged Bank of England notes, which had come into the hands of a holder who was innocent, but who is arrested on a charge of crime. Some points of law and of fact might be improved in the story; but, as a whole, the novel is not only curious and readable, but is full of deep interest.

We mention also, from Ticknor & Co., a new volume of Kingsley's Miscellanies.

Derby & Jackson have issued the old novel of Burke's, The Fool of Quality, with a preface by Kingsley. Here is an old-fashioned novel that once did good service in its day, and may do service for their fellow-men, and may do as much again.

Rudd & Carleton publish a little book, being neither more nor less than Mother Goose's melodies, interpreted with a commentary in very good melodies of later date for grown folks. The wise sayings of old nurse Goose are texts for brief and very excellent as well as very beautiful discourses by the author of this Christmas Reading of Mother Goose.

Life's Morning is a very elegant and a very popular book by the author of "Life's Evening."—Boston: Tilton & Co.

We should be glad of more space to notice a splendid Shakspeare, Mayhew and Baker, of Boston, being The King of the Golden River, by John Ruskin, M.A. It is a graceful little story for the young, and a book for the old to read, and that ought to make the volume, small as it is, an inexhaustible study for artists, young and old.

Avotaynu is a collection of poems by Paul H. Hayne. We find in them the true ring, the poet's warm heart and free hand. The volume is one of the best contributions to American or English poetry.

Crosby, Nichols, & Co. send us Frank Wildman's adventures among the Carstacker's quaint and adventurous tales, illustrated finely.

Of fine books for children, about these holiday times, we have received from White Dove Nest Chuck and Pictures from the History of the Swiss, two exquisitely colored books from Brown, Taggard, & Chase; Lee & Carleton Series, from Sheldon & Co.; Ernest Bracebridge, from Ticknor & Co.; Guy Carlton, from Howe & Ferry; and others that have before referred to.

The Queen of Hearts, by Wilkie Collins, is a story including several stories, all well told, and the main object very touching and refreshing. There old men combine to keep a young girl waiting ten years, while they amuse her with stories of their own lives; and at last the son of one of them and the nephew of the others arrives at home to win the queen of hearts, and to keep her with them forever. This is the frame of the work, and the filling in is very rich.

We can not pass the last volume of Alison's History without reminding our readers that Harper & Brothers have now published the two entire concluding volumes. The last volume brings us down to the accession of Louis Napoleon. These books should be in the library of every young American citizen.

A book from Richardson, the proprietor of the Historical Magazine, and prepared by John Jay Smith, of Philadelphia, is a museum of historical antiquities. It is a quarto volume, filled with fac-similes of autographs, original letters of the fathers of the Republic, and Revolutionary posters, quaint relics of the past of all sorts, bringing more forcibly home to us the days of our great ancestors than many a more dignified historic page. There is a very pretty journal of a patriotic young Quaker lady of Philadelphia, who fled from the city in 1776 —a beautiful native flower plucked from the harsh field of war and political strife. There are several Arnold papers and drawings of particular interest, and a few rich gleanings from the Washington curiosity shop. The title of Mr. Richardson's publication is, American Historical and Literary Curiosities.

Inaugural Address, delivered at the opening of the Southern University, Greensborough, Alabama. By the Rev. W. M. Wightman, D.D., LL.D., President of the University. Published by request of the Trustees.

In this able inaugural address Dr. Wightman lays out clearly the course of study and manner of instruction by which it is intended to make the "Southern University" truly what its name implies—an establishment for the proper and thorough teaching of the most important branches of knowledge.

The New York Spirit of the Times, of which Colonel T. B. Thorpe is one of the editors, enters upon its thirtieth volume on the 11th of February. This is now one of the oldest weekly papers published in New York city.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, January 23d, in the Senate, after the adoption of the usual resolutions offered by Senator Hale (N. H.), calling for the names and salaries of the persons employed in the Treasury Department whose appointments have not been confirmed by the Senate, Senator Douglas's (Ill.) resolution, directing the Judiciary Committee to report a Statute of the Union from external invasion, was taken up, and Senator Douglas proceeded to sustain the resolution. He charged the Republican party with the responsibility of the John Brown invasion. Senator Fessenden (Me.) replied in defense of that party, and Senator Douglas rejoined, when the Senate adjourned.——In the House, speeches on the ruling topic and on the organization of the Committee of Thirty-three, by Messrs. Burlingame (Mass.) and Corwin (Ohio).

On Tuesday, 24th, in the Senate, Senator Sumner (Mass.) introduced a bill to secure wages to seamen in case of wreck. Senator Brown (Miss.), a bill to provide for the public printing. Senator Rice (Minnesota) moved that a bill be reported from the Committee of the Territory of Nebraska, which was laid over. Senator King's (N. Y.) resolution relative to the time for the public printing was adopted. Senator Iverson (Ga.) offered a joint resolution relative to the pay of the retired and decrepit officers of the Navy, which was adopted. The President sent in the information relative to the bill for the Purchase of Senator Douglas's (Ill.) resolution was then taken up, and Senator Douglas (Ill.), Senator Cobb (Conn.), Mallory (Fla.), and Benjamin (La.) spoke on it, when the resolution was postponed.——In the House, a motion was made that the House adjourned.——In the House, a personal matter was discussed, growing out of a letter, relative to Gerrit Smith, Democracy of Illinois, by Messrs. M'Clernand (Ill.), Farnsworth (Ill.), and Logan (Ill.), when Mr. Corwin (Ohio) presented his remarks commenced yesterday, and speaking on the Speakership. House adjourned without a vote for Speaker.

On Wednesday, 25th, in the Senate, Senator Lane (Oregon) presented the proceedings of the Union meeting held in Jacksonville, Oregon City, with a few remarks. Senator Hale (N. H.) opposed their reception. Mr. Lane (Oregon) replied, and the matter was finally postponed. Adjourned.——In the House, a personal matter was discussed, growing out of the Speaker's letter, by Messrs. Hammond (Ga.), Farnsworth (Ill.), and Logan (Ill.), when Mr. Corwin (Ohio) resumed his remarks commenced yesterday, and speaking on the Speakership. House adjourned without a vote for Speaker.

On Friday, 27th, the Senate not being in session, at the usual hour, according to previous understanding, the House commenced to ballot. Mr. William N. H. Smith, of North Carolina, a Whig and Clay Whig, who has heretofore acted with the Southern Opposition party, and who has never voted for the American Know Nothing order, was formally put in nomination, and received the votes of six Pennsylvania and two Kentucky members who have heretofore voted with the Republicans. On the fifteenth vote, Banks received the highest votes of his own party. It was apparent that he was gaining, and that his discovery was made by the six Republicans who had voted for Mr. Smith changed their votes, and scattered their votes for Banks, when Mr. Smith threw votes short of the necessary number. There were 234 votes cast for Mr. Smith received 112, Mr. Sherman, 106; Mr. Corwin, 4; and the balance scattering. The House then adjourned to Saturday.

THE MEXICAN TREATY.

The Herald correspondent telegraphs:

"The Mexican treaty negotiations now making, that there will be a severe onslaught made upon the Mexican treaty as soon as it is printed. Part of the Senators think they see a nigger in it.

"The Washington Union has received additional intelligence from Mexico, giving accounts of recent outrages perpetrated by the American citizens and others, during business in that country. They are of the most shocking character, and will excite indignation throughout the country. The object of the Constitutional Government in signing the treaty was to put a stop to these outrages, and the Government is determined, and unless Congress gives the President the power asked for nothing can be done for them."

RELIEF SHIPMENT OF THE TRAVELING AND POOR DATA LAWS.

On 25th, in the State Assembly at Albany, Mr. Conkling presented an address and remonstrance from all the principal owners of steamships and sailing vessels in the harbor of New York, against the passage of the passage of a pro rata freight law, or a law telling railroads, as railroads and not as to the commerce of the State of New State of New York, by driving the shipping off the lakes. Mr. Conkling is a lawyer of standing in Philadelphia. The remonstrance is signed by the members of every large line of steamers, as well as by all the principal owners of shipping and commercial men in the city. The remonstrance is one of the signatures were read by Mr. Conkling.

THE KANSAS AND NEBRASKA LEGISLATURES.

The Territorial Legislature reassembled at Lecompton on Friday last, in conformity with the special proclamation of Governor Medary, and immediately passed a joint resolution requesting Governor Denver, to which Governor Denver returned this resolution with his veto, on Saturday. The resolution was again passed over his veto, by a vote of nine to three in the Council, and twenty-two to eight in the House.

The Legislature of Nebraska adjourned on Friday night, the 13th, at 12 o'clock. There was not sufficient strength in either House to pass the Slavery Bill over Governor Black's veto, and it was not again brought up for consideration.

LEGISLATIVE COURTESIES.

The members of the Kentucky and Tennessee Legislatures reached Columbus at three o'clock on January 26, and were conducted to the Hall of the House of Representatives, where the General Assembly, in Joint Convention assembled and heartily welcomed them, in an address by Governor Dennison. Governor Magoffin of Kentucky reopened, returning grateful thanks, in the name of the people of his State, for their most cordial welcome. He was followed by the welcome from the people of Ohio, but was entirely unprepared for the greeting which had been given them. He would tell it to the people of Kentucky, and tell them, too, that all we have to do to keep the Government intact is to see each other oftener, and know each other better. Governor Magoffin then introduced Governor Morehead of the Kentucky Legislature, who responded on behalf of his State. He said that while Louisiana and Mississippi, Ohio, Tennessee, and Kentucky can meet and greet each other as brethren, the Government and the Constitution are safe. The speech was received with great applause. After the adjournment of the Governors, the party was entertained, at which numerous speeches were made, the best of feeling and great enthusiasm prevailing.

DINNERS AT WASHINGTON.

The Washington correspondent of the Charleston Mercury has a long account of the dinners given by the Japanese of Washington. Hear him

"A stranger, on entering the property recommended, dines one day with a Foreign Minister, the next with a Southern Senator, and with a Northern Representative, and the fourth with a metropolitan resident. The dining-rooms are all large and well, and furnished in different styles; different gentlemen and ladies occupy the positions of host and hostess; and very likely there will be different circles of guests. But the same servants are in attendance, the wonderful and tasteful furniture is the same at each house; and there is a stereotype bill of fare.

"The day I was there there were fifteen dishes, or, Soyer go mad, had it been attributed to their cuisine. A half-dozen meats, soup, salmon, brought in the case from New Brunswick; and half a dozen entrees, relishing in Japanese sauces, not very questionable in appearance, and so flavored as to defy detection. A pastry-cook's dessert followed, and the meal was ended by greatly pickled, and for beverages, there are badly-iced champagne, Madeira, and Burgundy. Dutchess and others brew sherry. Every thing is dull, proxy, stupid, and indigestible.

"How different was it in the olden time! Then, a gentleman in some sense was a member of Congress, or of the Cabinet, would bring his servants and his silver, while Madame would be provided with table-cloths, pickles, and preserves. The magnates of the land would be seen with a fine display at the market, and the breakfast table they would have the good cheer always to be found there. The salads, cysters, shad from the Potomac and Chesapeake Bay, with the fine beef and mutton from the valley of Virginia, and a home-cured ham, would be prepared as to make luxuries unequaled at the Trois Freres in the palmiest days of Paris. As for the wines, the simple announcement that the Madeiras and the clarets came from Jefferson's, Madison's, Monroe's cellars, and the Champagnes from New York, was a guarantee of their goodness.

"The best repasts given here now—miserable dicta—are dear and poor, and nothing short of sight, by those epicures, the subjects of King Rum. Well-supplied tables, cheap, and well-cooked, are necessary, now many a pigeon to be plucked, and well plucked at that. When the Navy Retiring Board was organized, after the protracted contest for the Spokeship, which resulted in the election of Captain Dulany, a number of a noted dining-house held orders for the pay of seven members during the session of the Board. It is whispered that not all the members of the present House have been equally unfortunate."

DEATH OF A MISER.

Michael Baird, who lived near Little York, Pennsylvania, was a miser. His father left a valuable farm of five hundred acres in the vicinity of York, with some money and other valuables. Michael was left with a number of years—married, and raised four children. He accumulated a large property, which he reserved so tenaciously that he never afforded a dollar for the education of his children. He never would part with a single dollar in cash for any article he might be in need of; he would either barter it off, or find some person who would barter for something which he could not conveniently sell to him. He farmed largely and carried on large distillery, which he supplied entirely with his own grain. His last trip to Philadelphia was to sell a distillery-loading boat sufficient for the pay of seven members during the session. It is whispered that not all the members of the present House have been equally unfortunate."

ARRIVAL OF HOGS AT CINCINNATI.

JOURNEY TO THE SLAUGHTER-HOUSE.

THE HOG TRADE OF CINCINNATI.

To a New Yorker visiting Cincinnati during the spring or summer months nothing will occasion greater surprise than the absence of every suggestion or indication of the staple business to which so large a portion of its capital is annually devoted. Having heard much of its extensive hog trade, and its princely pig merchants, the traveler enters the city expecting to recognize on every hand the evidence of this leading element of its prosperity, and to be perpetually reminded of what he regards as the chief occupation, and most familiar characteristic of the place and its inhabitants. His imagination glows with visions of vagabond droves of strolling pigs, and squads of greasy butchers. He fancies pork to be the principal food of the people, listens at every turn for the shrill shriek of slaughter, and is disappointed that the gutters do not every where run blood. In truth, all his expectations in this regard are subjected to marked disappointment. He finds nothing of all this. Nothing at all to remind him of a vast centralized and systematically established trade, that gives employment to millions of dollars annually, and affords regular occupation to thousands of thrifty hands. He sees only a handsome, substantially built city, overflowing with an active population, whose occupation seems to the summer visitor to have no connection with the especial staple to which their prosperity has been so long and consistently attributed.

The experience of the winter visitor is altogether another affair. To him the reputation of the city for its hog statistics is quite appreciated. He sees and hears all around him the indications of this extensive branch of its industrial enterprise, and can readily believe that to the pig and his manifold products the city is largely indebted for its extraordinary growth and the rapidly accumulated wealth of its inhabitants. He understands why it is called Porkopolis. He comprehends its relation to and dependence upon the pig. The statement of the commercial reporters, that about 400,000 hogs are annually slaughtered by the city butchers, and distributed among the nations of the earth, does not surprise him; and he is prepared to admit the economical importance and staple value of the business, as a leading and profitable branch of American industry. 450,000 hogs, of good solid weight, and in plump greasy condition, are converted into pork and lard, in all their numerous forms, in the space of about four months; it being necessary, for packing purposes, that the pork be subjected to the hardening, solidifying effects of cold weather. Hogs are killed in the city for daily market consumption all the year round; and the number demanded for this purpose is not included in the aggregate of 450,000—the number varies a few thousand with different years—given as the average amount yearly consumed in the regular packing and shipping trade. An important branch of this trade, and the one indeed for which the city is justly celebrated throughout the Gentile world, is the manufacture of hams; of which, including the shoulders, nearly two millions are made every year. And a Cincinnati ham is an article, it must be acknowledged, that merits its reputation. But, as the Jewish proverb says, all are not of Israel that are in Israel. A very poor thing may be done up in yellow canvas and branded Cincinnati. There is an eclecticism to be observed with regard to hams as with regard to every other product of human art and invention. Cincinnati hams are like Jeremiah's figs, of blessed memory; the good are very good indeed, the bad are naught; not fit for the pigs whence they came.

Who would the choice of hams secure,
Must take this course to make it sure:
You buy your hams of ——, and then—

How near we have come to committing a grand indiscretion! What would Bacon, Bristle, & Co. have said of us, or done to us, if we had left the name, which, on wiser second thoughts, we have displaced with a dash, standing in the line as we had hastily written it. As it is, each reader may fill the blank as his better experience shall justify. For ourselves, nous autres journalistes, nous n'en avons pas absolument rien à dire.

The hog—the term is a harsh one, but this is really what every pig makes of himself, sooner or later, in those wild backwood regions—the hog is not a native of Cincinnati. He originates in the provinces, on the farms and prairies of the great valley of the Ohio. The Queen City is the bleeding of his reluctant pilgrimage; the final goal of his pious ambition. To be born a pig and not die the death of a hog in Cincinnati were an ignominy that none but the most groveling and debased swine could endure. The litter sort will not submit to it. The stall-fed, corn-fattened hog, contemplates the purpose of his life from a higher point of view. He is actuated by a nobler motive. He realizes the aspiration and enthusiasm of the enraptured poet; he must see Cincinnati, and die. This is to him the grand consummation of his earthly existence; the complete triumph of his hopes, the sure guarantee of his not having lived in vain; the very seal and promise of his immortality.

The hog is raised, as the term is in that part of the world, all over the Western States; though there are many, in several convenient localities, who make the business a specialty, and breed the animal in large quantities. In some places they run at large in the woods, feeding abundantly, and fattening rapidly, on "mast," the beech-nuts, hickory-nuts, and acorns that abound in the forests of the luxuriant West. Thousands are confined in pens and yards and fed on fodder and corn; and immense numbers crowd the pens attached to the larger distilleries, fattening and corrupting, as is too often the case, on the warm slops from the stills and mash-tubs. Having attained the required bulk and weight, by some such course of treatment, the hogs are gathered into droves of varying sizes, and are either carried or driven to the city, as may be most convenient to their owners, from all parts of the States of Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. Some go by steamboat, some by flat-boat; some travel on foot, and some are transported by railroad in crates especially constructed for the purpose. The last mode of transportation is the one now most generally adopted. The arrival at one of the principal dépôts of one of these hog-trains, as they are appropriately called, is the signal for the commencement of a scene of uproar and confusion as interesting and peculiar as one would wish to see. From the crates, the pigs, as a temporary disposition, are driven into pens, arranged, with convenient gateways, along the side of the track. They are still far from the end of their journey. The slaughter-houses, upon whose slippery floors their unoffending blood must flow, are situated in the upper part of the city, two miles from these intermediary pens into which they are now so hastily huddled.

The next move is their transit across the city to these slaughter-houses; a difficult portion of their journey, which they are forced to accomplish on their own feet. The direction and management of this transit is undertaken by drovers experienced in the business, who engage for the occasion the assistance of a suitable number of boys; scores of whom, of every age, color, and nation, are generally collected about the dépôt when a hog-train is expected, clamorous for an engagement. Whoever succeeds in securing the job by contract with the owner of the hogs is instantly beset by dozens of these boys, vociferously eager to be employed in the enterprise. The shouting and screaming of the boys, grabbing in several languages at every the quarreling and tussling of the unruly among them, the angry and peremptory exclamations of the men, combined with the squalling of the hungry pigs, produces an exciting scene of tumult and contention which is only quieted by the final departure of the pigs to that bourne where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary shall be finally at rest.

These droves vary in size, numbering generally from two or three hundred to a thousand. They are driven, by dint of considerable urging and whipping, and a great deal of shouting and hooting, through the main thoroughfares of the town; and their complexity and devious passage through the otherwise well-thronged streets affords, from its picturesque effect, more interest and amusement to the stranger than the most elaborate and good-nature to the inhabitants. A drove once started on its journey is bound, at all hazards and against all obstacles, to go through. No obstruction or inconvenience it may prove to vehicles in the street, or the crowd of passers upon the sidewalk, is a consideration that troubles in the degree the heads of the contractor and his yelling and slashing gang of vagabonds. You may be splashed and run into, delayed and otherwise offended, upset, it may be. You may quietly endure, dispassionately remonstrate, or desperately and resolutely resist, a score pro. To this proposition, backed up with a club, with his boot-tops over his pantaloons, a coon-skin cap on his head, red flannel sleeves on his long arms, and a cowhide whip in his hand, it is all one. He will beat you not at all. The main business of this fellow in this crowded, mark you, is to "hand those pigs on the other side of Jordan;" and, as that little begrimed, yelping ragamuffin there, with a long-eared dog at his heels, answers you in the slightest intimation that you take any interest in the subject, "You may bet yer life, old cock, he'll do it."

Arrived at the slaughter-houses, the way-worn pigs, with wallet backs and bleeding feet, are deposited in pens of the most filthy and repulsive condition. These pens are, in most cases, connected with the killing-sheds by inclined plank ways, up which the pigs are driven to the death-stroke by a mallet in the butchers. They are admitted, through a sort of trap-gate, upon an inclined platform, in charge of a stout fellow who stands, armed with an immense sledge-hammer. When the platform is sufficiently full to prevent the pigs running about, he commences the work of death by giving each one a stunning blow upon the head; which done, he is immediately seized by the butchers' hands, and stabbed, bled, scalded, scraped, and cleaned out before he has a very distinct or satisfactory impression of what has happened to him. He is converted into pork in about three minutes from the time his tail glides unsuspectingly beneath the insidious jaw of the butcher at last between him and the trials and comforts of the outer world forever.

As may be seen by our illustration, the next process is to carry the newly-slaughtered pig into another apartment, spacious and well-ventilated, where he is received by a man who lays by his lard in cool and dry. After hanging sufficiently long to become cold and stiff, the pigs are taken down and hauled off to the cutting-up room by four stout horses, to the packing-houses, situated in another part of the city. These establishments are on a vast scale, and give employment, through about four months of the year, to thousands of hands. Any one of these presents, in the busy season, a scene of activity curious and interesting in the extreme. The work is divided into several branches, each demanding the undivided attention of workmen. Here are seen large blocks and tables, upon which the hogs are cut up into hams, shoulders, sides, and what not, as said fancy or purchase demands all purposes of the market. Here, also, the packing pieces are salted and barreled, and the hams are trimmed and prepared for smoking; and in an adjoining apartment are the lard vats, connected by an apparently intricate arrangement of pipes and tubing with the boiling-houses, placed in the basement—the steam process being the one usually adopted for trying out the lard. Is is worth remarking that in this, as in all animal, economically considered, is lost or wasted. Every scrap, even the apparently most worthless, is saved and turned to account, either as an article of food or for use in the arts. Its flesh is converted into hams and pickled pork; its fat into lard; its sausage meat, and its fat scraps and scrapings into lard, stearine candles, and lard oil; its head is made into jowls and head-cheese; its tongue is smoked and pickled; its feet are soused; its blood and offal are turned into Prussian blue; of its bristles brushes are made; its hair is used for mattresses and comforters; and its bones are burned for the sugar-refineries and blacking-makers. And thus the entire animal is, in one way or another, consumed and converted, to the continued advantage and profit of innumerable economical and flourishing trades; each one of which employs a considerable amount of capital, skill, and labor for its successful prosecution, and each one of which gives unmistakable evidence of thrift and activity.

MAN IN!

IT was fourteen or fifteen years ago at least, and I was then an eager skater: a student of the higher walks (or rather strokes) of the art of skating: a diligent cultivator of that mystery which is at the root of all advancement in this exercise, the mystic "outside edge."

I was in London. The Round Pond was crowded to inconvenience. The Round Pond is just in front of Kensington Palace; it is rumored that it was once a gravel pit, and that in consequence its waters are in some parts of very great depth. The number of skaters on this piece of water on the day in question was so great, that there was scarcely a possibility of carrying out a single stroke to completeness. So constant were the collisions between the skaters, and so completely was one's attention absorbed by the necessity of steering clear of other people, that it was hardly possible to enjoy the amusement; I was on the point of giving the thing up and taking off my skates, when it occurred to me that there was one part of the pond on the opposite side which I had not tried, and which seemed to be less covered with skaters than the other portions of the ice.

Distance is a thing very soon disposed of in skating, and an approach to this more deserted region was the affair of very few moments. As I drew nearer, I found that my first impression was not an incorrect one; there were fewer people here. Fewer people and more room to cut figures on the pond, and just out there where poet Ince inscribed "Dangerous" had tumbled over on its side, there was no one. Why? Was it dangerous? Not I, for one, afraid? Why, the frost has lasted a fortnight, and any one with eyes in his head would see that that "dangerous" was but a mere notice simply because the proper authorities have forgotten to take it away.

Arrested and balked at every stroke as I had been all the morning, the sight of the clear place, where I could practice unmolested, was inconceivably attractive. I was going in for more than sixteen or seventeen, and my taming days had not begun. Here was good ice in front, and nobody to knock up against me. I struck out and left and a crowd of skaters. Pooh! No danger! That board has been there a fortnight, and what of it.

Most people who have had any thing to do with ice will be aware that that substance is subject to several difficulties. It cracks in the night in the melodious, ringing, wholesome crack, which ice of any strength is liable to, and which is not indicative of danger; then it is liable to certain forms of thin ice, which certainly does show mischief at hand, but which is not perfectly inconsistent with security; and, lastly, there is that sort which he who hears will know by instinct to be a cry of warning, but one which is uttered generally just too late.

I had not philosophized much on cracks, or, indeed, on any thing else, at the time I am writing about. I had my mind's eye on the centre of a sheet of ice, and I knew that the frost which was making my fingers tingle was from a torrighti. Ah, Mark Antony! So black, and so bitter. A few more strokes, and what a sweep I shall have over its polished surface! Ah! there's the bell. Is that man with the life bell on calling out to me? Yes. What's that!

A cruel sense as if I had never heard before, and which sent the knowledge—not the apprehension, but the certainty—into my soul that I was going through the ice. There were a few seconds of time between the crack and the time when the ice gave way under me and I was in the water. The crack, remembrance has told me since, I did not tell to with my hands, gave with every touch, and made the space which I had broken away so large, that what was all around me seemed to rise in sharp ice which I held, but held gently, seeing the thinness of the edge against which my breast was pressing, and knowing that if I struck with the slightest might go too, and then I must inevitably sink—I know not how far: there was no ground beneath my feet.

How difficult, too, to keep still: the excessive cold of the water making my chest move convulsively, and causing me to gasp for breath. How difficult to keep still, with the wicked water sucking at me and trying to get underneath—to be called a "man." I had so often writhed under the insult of being called a "boy" by my elders, that this cry of "Man in!" had in its way a sort of compliment to me. As I lay in the water with my arms stretched out over the piece of ice on which my life depended, I made the best preparations which were going on for my rescue, with an eagerness which none can know but those who have been in a similar position. There was no one near me. The machinery of the Humane Society was at all the stations, but the man with the bell was skating alone when I dropped through, and had no friend upon the ice.

Still that bell-sound, the cracking action of the water beneath me—pulling and drawing at me always. The man with the life-belt, with the long ice-hook for on which to fix the belt—a hook at the end of it, and a drag fastened to the side, is hastening toward me from the other side. Can I hold on till he comes? The cold seems actually to enter my life within me. Am I going to die? My young life —is it at an end already? O God! why did I ever do any thing wrong? The man with the ice-ladder on wheels has broken in at fifty yards' distance, and can not get any nearer to me—the ice is rotten all around. No one can come to me to help me? A circle, far, far off, of frightened people gazing at me—I can not see their faces—they are looking upon me as a boy. (I understand); they are calling out to me, but I can not hear. And what would they do? Look at home if they could see me now? Would the mourning for my sister-in-law be for them—I lied about them, and said I had no help—I shall die—and the crowd—and that snow figure which the boys have built up is like the clown I saw last night in the pantomime —and they are all screaming over this piece of ice, and my arms are wet—and the ice will be under soon—and the men with the strange machinery are standing aloof, and can not get to me, and some are running round the bank, and they have ropes —and one has got a drag—but I am sinking now, my hair is wet, and the water pouring down my collar—and when we were at Naples, my father asked me to go out with him one day and to stay with him as little as possible—and a dog would have gone—but I had some plan of my own, and would go—and he sighed—and I shall die—the men with the ropes on the bank, and with a ladder—it is tied to the ropes—it is pushed along the ice toward me—and a man is crawling along the ladder —but too late, for surely this is death—the voices on the bank—what do they say? The man is not far off—he is coming—I can not hear—I can not hold—I can not see—or hear—or feel—and I shall —die—

Not then. Saved, to write these words some fifteen years afterward, and to pause from time to time as I do so, to see how long those years have passed. Saved, to remember this rescue for an hour after it happened, and then to go back into the water, plunging it forever, to pass through other dangers and to escape other perils; but never, perhaps, to be at such close quarters with death.

I have no distinct recollection of never and ever —of how I was got out of the water. I remember something of crouching beside the man on the ladder, a huddled mass, and of freezing water, the ladder being swiftly drawn ashore by the ropes which were attached to it, and bread in one piece or twice in its progress over the surface of the ice. I remember the horror of each of these new accidents.

I remember being carried by (as I could suppose) on each side by an iceman, from the Round Pond to the receiving-house of the Humane Society. I remember being undressed, and then sent on to order the warm-bath, which I found ready on my arrival. I remember how difficult it was to get my wet clothes off. I remember how the shaking that my stockings were not the pair which were darned so much at the knee, and which would have been discreditable; and I remember seeing the water poured out of my watch—it was a silver one, but a good performer—on the ground; and then I remember feeling very much like the superintendent of the place—a man of some forty years of age, with a black face and great bushy whiskers—kept throwing the water from a very wet chest with his hands as I lay in the bath and thought how warm it felt, and how strange it was that this water should be the first thing resorted to to repair the mischief which water had done.

Is misfortune good for us, that it makes us feel so happy afterward? I shall never forget the peace of that time. I shall never forget how, looking up at the face of the man who sat beside the bath, I thought I had never seen any one who looked so good and so benevolent. He was a man who had the appearance of a saint. Saints, and he was sort of person one would wish to have by one in a storm, or indeed in any kind of danger.

The receiver of the Humane Society is not, in its interior arrangements, unlike a ward in a hospital. Clean, and warm, and airy, it is provided with the means of hot and cold vapor baths at one time, and of readily putting in practice all the directions which are given in the Society's book for the restoration of those who are said to be suspended. As soon as I had been long enough in the warm bath, I was taken out and put into a bed between two warm blankets, heated from beneath by a hot water apparatus, but without sheets. The next remedy applied was a dose of something brandy-and-water of considerable strength; after drinking which I lay down again, and thought I had never seen so warm a room before in all my life. I remained there all the afternoon, in a half-dreamy state, watching the attendants as they moved about the room, putting away the things which had been deranged on my account, and listening to the sound of the turning over of leaves, which came from an adjoining room, where the superintendent was sitting, waiting till he might be wanted again, and reading, to beguile the time, a book of shipwrecks. Meanwhile a messenger had been sent to my house for dry clothes. The messenger thoughtfully chose was a woman, lest if one of the men in his remembrance had gone he might give the alarm close to whom he was sent in an unnecessary degree. By the time the dry clothes had arrived I was just ready for a pleasant dose. I was soon dressed, and was safe at home by the fireside before the lamps were lighted in the streets.

CAPT'N BEN'S WIFE.

IT is easy to describe Captain Ben Conover. Of powerful frame without being tall, quick in motion and speech, with a square, honest face, where many years of rough service have not left a line, with a certain stamp of the sea upon him we always find in those who "follow the water," behold "Cap'n Ben," as he is universally called, the oldest and most experienced pilot on the Jersey coast.

Meeting him the other day on board the Highland Light, I was surprised to hear him predict a northeaster.

"You don't apprehend a storm so soon, do you?" "I've had a three days' fog, and that ought to bring fine weather according to the signs."

"Fity the clark o' the weather don't know all the signs, as he could make it to suit. Now my signs says we'll have a northeaster before to-morrow morning, and I am thinking there'll be work for me longshore."

Captain Ben is the only really weather-wise person I ever knew. He seems to know from instinct what others can only guess at; for, despite the almanac and other equally credible authority, I maintain that, with our present knowledge, we can foretell nothing of the weather from observation.

"That three days' fog notion seems to hang on like," says the observing wrecker.

"Why, Cap'n Ben, I never did see a storm come out of a long fog."

"Well, Saxon, I have"—Saxon being a longshore nickname of mine. "The big blow of '38 came on in that way. You were a young 'un then; but you may remember the North America drove ashore on the Hook, and filled up the old Shrewsbury Inlet. I was anchor-sweeping with Jack Hartshorne that year, and lost my sloop the same night, with old Sam on board."

"That must have been a heavy loss to you, Cap'n Ben. You were a young man then?"

"Yes, the Juliet was my first sloop, and I thought at the time 'twas a pretty hard pull; but if it hadn't been for that, I should never count that storm pretty much clear gain after all."

This ambiguous phrase, and the wrecker's peculiar smile, led me to understand there was a story forthcoming, so, securing a couple of stools near the stove, I sat down, and being seated, I expressed my readiness to listen.

"You know," continued the old man, "there was a new wrecking station in those days, only two or three of us kept boats at bad, dirty longshore. I had one just below Deal, and after I got home I mustered a crew for her and set a watch on the beach, I made leg for Long Branch, where Uncle Jerry had a big old barge. She had been a good vessel in her day, Chalmers were so strongly put, you could punch a piece out with your finger. Uncle Jerry was laid up with rhumatis, and I knew his sloop would go ashore in her if need come, so I thought I'd better be with them, for in a heavy sea she'd want nice handling to keep her from bein' knocked to pieces.

"I left the Juliet Tuesday morning and got to Uncle Jerry's about high-water Wednesday. I found young Jerry—that was then—with an under lee of the barge, at a place called South Cove, where the shore lands in pretty sharp for a mile or so, and then takes a short turn back, making a big shaped like a fish-hook, with the light to southward. The entrance to much of this bay is long bar that runs dry at low-water, and a worse place for a northeaster, I don't want to see.

"Jerry told me the North America was wrecked in the inlet, and said the boys had gone up there at daylight.

"'That you've stood watch all the morning alone,' says I.

"'Yes,' he says, 'I came down at low-water and 'ave been here ever since.'

"Well, Jerry, I guess six hours out in such a storm is enough for one man. You go to the house and get some hot tea, and don't hurry back either. Some of the boys will be down from the Hook before dinner-time.'

"I overhauled the boat and found they had got her in pretty good order, and then took a tramp a-foot to the inlet.

"The tide was full up, and the storm about at the worst. The surf on the bar was really awful. I have seen many storms there since, but never when the sea seemed to get up as it did that day. It would roll up on to the flat, three great swells together, and then drop up into a broken, smaller seas, combing and breaking all ways at once. As I stood looking at the bar, thinking what a poor chance 'twas for any thing like a boat living up on there, old Tommy Wayman came along, and was going past, up to the house, without seeing me, the caps of the cloak blowing all over my face; I couldn't think what would bring the old man out in such weather, so I went over and spoke to him.

"'Good morning, morning for you to be out, Mr. Wayman,' says I.

"'Oh, Ben,' he says, 'I am mighty glad to find you here! I was sure, by this wind now, there we over. I can't stand it like I used to. I see Uncle Jerry's keep up above this morning, so I've been keepin' kind of a look-out with my glass. I can't see very well, Ben, but nigh as I can make out there is a sail and some about two miles in the offing. She lays head to it, and I can't tell whether it's a ship with her mizzen gone or a brig. Any way she's in distress, and with the tide she gets to the sand they'll pull through pretty fast.'

"There's where she'll bring up, then,' says I, pointing to the bar. 'Though, if there's any body aboard that knows enough, they might make a rag of sail on her and bring her round the upper end of the bar into smoother water, and if her anchors wouldn't hold then she'd ground where the surf wouldn't hurt her a bit.'

"The old man shook his head. 'No, there ain't no pilot aboard, or they wouldn't be where they are. I see she'd have to strike here anyway, so I come down to look if any thing could be done with Jerry's boat.'

"The boat is all right, Mr. Wayman, but how long would she live in a sea like that?'

"'No boat could go on to the bar and ever come back, Ben; but I think we might take 'em under the edge of the shoal and be of help when the wreck breaks up. I could do it if I was younger, and Jerry says you're a quick hand in a boat. I've but young folks is skeery these days; 'tain't like it was when I was young.'

"I didn't see any thing to that, but took another sharp squint to wind'ard, and thought I see a faint show of spars. 'I was gone before I could so sure; but I began to with the boys were down, so I asked the old man to go down to the boat-house and help me fire the gun. He thought 'twas no use, as he couldn't be heard more than half a mile to wind'ard; but we concluded to try it, and had fired two rounds when Jerry come down. He reported a brig in sight; so we fired again. Then rounds being the signal of distress. The boys were here by the next time fired, and soon came running in. They were wet, cold, and hungry; so I made 'em all go up to the house while they could, thinking they'd need comfort, maybe, before they got another chance.

"Jerry and I set about building a big fire under of the boat-house; and by time we had done that the brig was in plain sight about a mile off shore. If I had been aboard her then I could have saved every stick and stitch; but those who were there must have given up, for they didn't try to do the first thing.

"We laid ways down to the water, and when the others came back lifted the boat on to rollers. Then we all stood round the fire and waited. That is the hardest thing I ever have to do. All the courage in the world can't keep a man from shrinking when he has to stand idly on the shore and see a noble ship driving on to certain destruction, with human beings, new to the sea, clinging to the rigging, only to be swept off when the sea breaks over her. No one spoke around the fire that day as we watched the brig coming in. She was drifting very slowly at first; but, as old Wayman had foreseen, when her anchor touched the land they didn't hold at all, and she drove along fearfully fast.

"By this time a good many shore folk were gathered round the fire, and when I asked for volunteers to go in the boat every man was offered. I chose a crew of eight, taking every other man as they stood; and while they were taking the boat down to old Tommy Wayman came to me and asked pardon for what he had said. 'I know you'll not let an old man's talk hinder you to do any thing foolhardy, Ben; but if you should never come back I'd feel guilty about having as I live.' I shook hands with the old man, and told him 'twas no time to remember such little things; and for the rest, with the permission of Providence, I'd bring the crew safely back with more in her than she took out.

"We were a little to leeward of the brig when we started, but she drifted past us now very near the bar. I could not see her, as I held the boat almost in the water and didn't dare turn my head round even an instant, but I knew when she struck by the faces of the men. Watching my chance, I put the boat right about on the back of a sea, and we drove down toward the wreck. Just as I caught sight of her she lifted on a tremendous wave, and then pitched forward, striking so heavy that her foremast snapped like a pipe-stem and went over the side.

"As we neared her I put the boat head to wind-'ard again, and we lay almost in the surf waiting for some sign of life. There was no one on deck, and after watching a while, straining on the oars to hold our own, we had about concluded she was deserted, when one of the men thought he saw a signal from the cabin windows. Next time she lifted they could all see it waved a moment and then withdrawn, and several thought they could make out a woman's arm.

"I expected every moment the brig would break up, but, as it appeared, she was entirely new and her hull was very strong. When I saw she would hold together some time at least, I knew there was nothing to be done unless we could board her.

"There's the signal again,' said Jerry, who was pulling the bow oar, 'and it is a woman's arm, that's certain.'

"After a moment, feeling they were all looking at me, I said quietly, 'I'll not ask any one to go to a stroke further. You know what is to be done as well as I. If the boat lives through we shall save at least one human creature from a land death. If she goes to pieces—some of us may get ashore.'

"No one answered me, as I let her fall off all she'd been carrying to their oars with a will, and the next moment we were tossing and tumbling in the surf. It seemed to me hours, though I don't suppose 'twas many minutes, we were struggling literally for dear life, and, though eight better oars never were pulled, several times lost more than we had made. The old boat behaved nobly though, and, in a little lull, we finally crossed the shoal, weathered the brig, and rounded to just under her lee.

"They saw us as we passed the cabin windows, and a man staggered out with a coil of line in his hand, one end of which he made fast in the main rigging and the other round his waist. A sea coming over the brig's bow swept him off to leeward, and he was almost drowned before we could get him into the boat. He had been fearfully knocked about in the surf, where all hands had taken to the rigg, and at first couldn't speak a word. He was a Portugee, and couldn't talk much English any way, but when he was contrived to tell us there were five more aboard the brig, though he believed they were all dead except the young woman who made the signals, and she must be almost gone too by that time. I gave the helm to the stroke oar and stripped off every thing but my shirt and trousers, then taking the line from the Portugee's waist, jumped overboard and struck out for the brig. That was nothing of a swimming, but with the aid of the line I contrived to pull up into the rigging and cling there till I could get breath again. The cabin was astern, ship fashion, and by watching for seas I managed to reach the doors and open them. The water rushed out so I could hardly stand, and I had to wait for a lurch before I could go in. Every thing movable was adrift—tables, chairs, and lockers—washing from one side the cabin to the other, and through and mingling the lifeless bodies that were tossing to and fro with them.

"There was no one alive in the cabin, so I called loudly, and heard a faint answer from a side stateroom. The door was broken in and the little room was flooded with water at every side roll. Lashed fast in the top berth I found the young lady; she had given up all hope when deserted by the Portugee, and had sunk down here decently to die. Cutting the fasts, I lifted her in my arms and, without serious mishap, carried her out under lee of the caboose.

"I had not been aboard the brig more than ten minutes, but in that time the boat had drifted away and was laying in the surf on the shore side of the bar. The men bent to the work and pulled hard and heartily; but the Portugee was too much used up to row strong, and six sweeps couldn't hold. They had to let her drive into quieter water where they could bail out and take breath. Then they dashed in again and did the best men could do, working on, though often losing in one minute all they had made in ten, in imminent danger of being swamped or stove in, and the chances more against them every moment. I saw 'twas no use, and made signal to give it up and go ashore. They wouldn't do that; but going into smoother water again, they worked well up to wind'ard and tried to cross as we had at first. Two or three times in the trough of a sea I thought the old boat had gone under, and at last she did take a wave that filled her, and all but two had to in-sweep and go to bailing with their hats. They drove by some ways in shore, and beckoned me to jump and swim. I would have tried it alone, but I knew I couldn't reach with the young woman, so I waved my hand to them and turned away, feeling sort of desperate and half choked.

"There was no time for having the blues though, for my companion required immediate attention. I had a little flask of spirits in the pocket of my guernsey, and made her take enough to brighten her up a bit. She was regularly exhausted by fatigue and cold, but said she was not much bruised, and when I spoke about building a raft, was anxious to help, though she could scarcely lift her feet. I soon found there was no raft to be built, as the whole deck was breaking up, having been started when the foremast went over. I had hoped that, as the hull proved strong, it might hold together till the storm abated; but when the deck began to go I knew that was impossible. We could get into the cabin once more and found three or four blankets, which, though soaking wet, would keep the head off. Wrapping the young woman as well as I could, I carried her into the main rigging, out of reach of the seas, and lashed her fast, clinging closely by with my hands in case the brig came to cut at the last minute.

"I don't know if I told you before: the brig was the Tonquin, from Turk's Island, loaded with salt in bulk, and the breaking up of the deck, that I thought would be the ruin of us, proved our salvation. When the planks parted and floated off the cargo began to wash out, and as more was uncovered, it took to the bottom. She began to have a longer lift with the sea, and didn't strike so heavy. I couldn't get a range to see, but thought we must be moving, for the motion grew smooth, she swung round to her anchors, fairly afloat, and my hearty 'Thank God!' told my companion we were near the bar.

"As the brig lay pretty easy, head to it, I took the young woman down, and stowed her against the mainmast, while I made a little swept. The hold was half full of water, and there was evidently a big leak somewhere; so I thought best to cut cable and let her ride by the bow. She kept steering sail on her, but every thing was whipped out; and I had to let her go as she would.

"The young woman had quite livened up by this time, but I found her mourning piteously, and learned that her only brother lay in the cabin with the others. It appears he had left Kingston at Turk's Island for a house in New York, and his sister had accompanied him there, they two being entirely alone in the world. He had taken a fever out there, and they were returning home in hope of bettering his health, when the storm overtook them, just as they were rejoicing that the perils of the voyage were over. The poor girl cried bitterly while she told me this, and I felt as if I could have for the breakers close on the lee bow, Ben Conover might have felt another dash of salt-water too.

"We started to reach about a mile below the boat-house, but the people had followed us down shore; and as she was wash'd very heavy there, they hadn't much trouble in getting us clear of all right. They made a kind of litter with sweeps and thwarts, and I had the girl carried up to Uncle Jerry's, where good old Aunt Sarah made her comfortable as possible.

"Next morning, as she was sleeping good, I went to York without much to tell me there days to settle the affairs of the brig; and when I got back she was so glad to see me that I—well, I don't know exactly what I did; but pretty glad, too.

"Having been at Turk's Island since she was a little girl, she had no friends here, and didn't know what to do nor where to go to. I advised her to stay where she was, as I thought she'd be safer and more at home. Uncle Jerry's folks took a great liking to her; and when I built my house in Shrewsbury, and was ready to move in that next spring, they didn't want to give her up at all.

"There, Saxon, that's the longest story ever I told. We must be moving, and go back to the town. Let's go on deck and see if the South River boat is in sight. And, Saxon, if you want to see a perfect picture of the girl I found in the cabin of the Tonquin, you come down to Squan and make us a visit. My daughter Sarah is just the image of her."

Captain Ben was right about the coming storm. The night of the 3d of November witnessed one of the fiercest tempests of the year, and sixteen fellow-creatures became indebted for their lives to the skill, courage, and humanity of Captain Ben Conover and the hardy 'longshoremen of the Jersey coast.

FROM MY NATIVE LAND.

SWEET songster from a distant clime,
Why can't st thou to my prison grate?
Why by this cold shoals of crime
Dost wait?
Yet stay, and sing about my cell;
I love thee well.

Light tenant of the gentle breeze,
Whose sigh hath raised thy brilliant coat,
Till, like the foam crest on the seas,
Doth float
The snow beneath its gorgeous hue,
As white to blue.

Good bird, who was it bads thee fly,
And bear each bliss upon thy wing,
To him that's now condemned to die?
You bring
Dreams of the cot where he was born:
Is it yet gone?

Thou wanderer from my native land,
Thou fairy of the golden wing,
See, at my bars I suppliant stand:
Come sing
The news that nearest from abroad—
Thy precious hoard.

Tell me if yet the silver dew
Hangs heavy at the morning's dawn;
Or if the stream where once there grew,
A drooping willow at its side,
Still flows its tide?

And is the grass as soft and green,
The skies as bright as once they were?
The heaven's ah often seen
To dare
The chase, the echoing hills along,
With shout and song?

Say if the shadow of my thought,
Still goes to where the chapel floor,
And if that sacred prayer is fraught
No more,
With supplication deep and free,
Still for me?

And tell me if the roses bore
Their blossoms when you came away;
And if the one whom I adore
For aye
Still weeps and wails amid their bloom
In silent gloom?

But whisper not her name, sweet bird,
Or whisper very soft and low,
As if so sacred to be heard—
Ah! though
Some kindly angels from above
Said words of love.

But see, the light is reversed,
The rain is coming pattering from the sky:
Sweet bird, the sunshine hour is past—
Come fly—
Come quickly to my friendly breast,
And there rest!

Thou fleest, and thy 'wildering song
Is deathly false and sadly vain;
My prison bars are doubly strong
Again.
There's nothing left in life for me
But Liberty!

SPANISH THUGS.

IT is but to a limited number of Spaniards of the present day that the existence, in any age, of the society we are about to describe is known. But that it was formed in Spain, only in the latter years of Charles the Fourth's reign, is an indubitable fact in the secret history of Spain, and one in association with which the Inquisition performed, perhaps, its only praiseworthy act.

There is a portion of the period at which the secret society of Despeadores was first instituted; but from the name it is to be inferred it was of some antiquity. For though the Spanish language yet owns the verb actiar, desperate (not to be confounded with desperate, which latter means the act of throwing from a height or other elevation, precipitating), with the signification "to case, to alleviate, to relieve from pain or care," it has long fallen into disuse, and may be looked upon as nearly obsolete.

On the evening of a certain day in the year 1805, in a dwelling which overlooks apartments in the town of Ocaña, in Old Castile, a worthy and respected citizen lay suffering under disease of long standing; at the hour of the bell was fixed the customary pila, or little open earthenware vessel, containing holy water, surmounted by a painting of his patron saint at the foot of the bed, a table of a small kind of altar bearing a couple of lighted tapers flanking a wooden effigy of our Saviour extended on the cross, before which the sick man's eyes were riveted imploringly, gave unmistakable signs that the patient was considered in danger. And he was yet in a state of health, unmarried, well-to-do in the world, of excellent character, and notable for his devout and rigid observance of the forms and ceremonies of his Church. His only relative was a sister, who, with two domestics, constituted the household of the sick man. Aloof from the sick-chamber to make way for his friend the parish-priest—fortunately a plain, sensible, straightforward man—who, at the patient's request, had been sent for to receive his confession, and to administer the last rites of absolution and extreme unction. And now that these ceremonies had been performed, the clergyman, who had long known and held the patient in much esteem, remained at his side, praying with and exhorting him. The sick man did not exactly fear to meet death, nor did he murmur at the decree of his Maker, yet he nevertheless exhibited extreme regret at being called from this world so soon. Therefore his friend, the priest, sought somewhat to cheer him, by observing, "that, although in these acts he had complied with the duty of a good Christian in preparing himself for the worst, he ought by no means to despair of the possibility of the Divine mercy being even yet extended to him in this world, as there were numerous instances of persons recovering from a far more precarious state than he was yet in." This reawakened some hope in the patient's mind, and he seemed to gather strength and energy.

But a slight noise in the room occasioning him suddenly to cast his eyes toward the door, the patient was seized with a convulsive tremor, his countenance betrayed signs of the most intense horror, and a cold sweat burst from him, as in an agonized whisper he said to the priest, "There is no hope, no escape, for me; now, indeed, my life is circumscribed to a few minutes, and it must terminate when you leave me; my death is now certainly and inevitably at hand." The good priest feared that a sudden delirium had seized the sufferer, yet thought it well to argue with him, and inquire if any change in his sensations induced him to make so fatal a prognostic? No, he was incrcase in the symptoms of his disease; but he must die, he must die almost immediately. As he repeated this, often and vehemently, and with the same whispered tone, the priest insisted on being told the reason; and at last the patient, with great trembling and secrecy, pointed his attention to two persons who had entered and who stood in consternation at the further end of the room, as though unwilling to intrude on his spiritual conference with his adviser. They were staid, sober, and respected men of that same town, wearing the sad-colored garments that denoted their being beadles, or devotees, and they were acquainted both with the patient and the priest. They came to inquire the state of their departing friend, and if it must be, to take their farewell of him. The sick man, with increased agitation, whispered, "They are of us. They are my companions. They are Despeadores. By their hands I shall die as soon as you quit me and they and I are left alone." With this, his thin hands seized and held the priest's arm with almost supernatural force.

What was the meaning of those words? What were Despeadores? Why should his fate depend upon their? The priest were questions he was not quite unable to solve; but he determined, as far as possible, to tranquilize the poor wretch by assuring him that he would not leave his side until dismissed by himself to do so. This in some measure relieved the sick man's fright. There the priest sat for hours, during which the two men more than once drew near the bedside, inquiring of the patient (who shuddered afresh at each approach) if the state of his mind, conducive generally observing that the Senor Parroco must be wearied by his long attendance, and offering to relieve him in waiting upon the sufferer by the clergyman. But the priest, warned by the clutch of his friend's hand, declined to accept their proposal, and, finally, finding no change for a longer stay at that time, they had to withdraw.

Perceiving that there was a mystery to be could not for the present learn, and that the conflict of terror and hope rendered the patient for the time incapable of hearing it up, the clergyman resolved on staying by him until the latest hour, should his disorder finally take a fatal turn; and he gave strict injunction that no one whatsoever, not the medical attendants should be admitted into the sick-room: his clerical presence being a sufficient excuse to exclude others who might intrude. On the succeeding day he was gratified by learning that the crisis of the disorder had passed, and that the patient's condition was considered hopeful. As soon as he found him sufficiently tranquil and resumed to revert to the mysterious subject, the priest urged him to disclose every thing relating to his strange hints of the preceding night. Ultimately he drew from him, though with much difficulty, that a secret Judgment: This existed a secret Brotherhood of which he was a member, not numerously, but widely, disseminated throughout Spain, who were sworn to seek every opportunity of gaining access to such persons as, being in extremis words, had received the last sacraments and rites of their religion, and, under pretext of praying with and giving them spiritual consolation, to seize the first moment of being alone with them to terminate their remaining hours—by strangulation, by smothering with a pillow, or in any other way not calculated to awaken suspicion: That this Brotherhood was guided by a much higher object than the merely charitable one which their adopted name of Despeadores would imply; for, instead of merely attending to abbreviate the death-agony of the sufferer, their object was to prevent all possibility of his escaping from the world without dying, as would sometimes happen: That the Despenadores knew that, after having received plenary absolution and the other rites of the Church, the dying were in a state of beatitude, and certain of admission to heaven; while, should they be restored to health, they would be exposed to all the temptations and temptations of this wicked world, which, according to the weakness of nature, would lead them to sin again and unavoidably imperil their souls, should they afterward be cut off by accidental sudden decease: That the Brotherhood, therefore, looked to the eternal welfare of the absolved, and insured them a certain entrance into Paradise.

Anyone who can be had personally taken part in these acts on more than one occasion, the patient was sternly asked by the priest why they had never been visited by him in his frequent confessions to him? He answered that it was not incumbent on him or on any of his companions to name them, for, so far from being sins, they were meritorious actions, inasmuch as they rendered certain the salvation of souls that might otherwise perish.

The poor priest was shocked and puzzled by the revelation, for he could not easily decide whether he ought or ought not to regard it as made under the seal of confession, and consequently of inviolable secrecy; but, after some consideration, he judged it his duty to lay the whole matter privately before his diocesan, the Archbishop of Toledo. That prelate being one of the grand inquisitors, found sufficient reason in it to inform the three individuals whom the clergyman pointed out as Despeandores lodged in the cells of the Holy Office. On being examined, they exhibited neither fear nor compunction at owning themselves members of that secret but, as they contended, most praiseworthy association, or in naming such others of the fraternity as they knew.

How to act toward the fanatics implicated in this most horrible league, who were within a short time all arrested, became a matter of perplexity as well to the Inquisition as to the Council of Castile (which, as civil crime had been committed in the formation of a secret society, had also to take part in it); for it was desirable to avoid, as far as possible, giving publicity to the facts, lest an indignant spirit of revenge should be roused among survivors who conceived that their deceased relatives had been murdered. The question of culpability was, therefore, in many instances not hypothetically for consideration of the most eminent jurists in Spain, as well of common as of canon law, and the majority of their opinions was that crime had been committed—not with a willfully guilty intent, but from a deplorably misguided and fanatical belief. The punishment was consequently limited to such different terms of confinement as were considered necessary to indoctrinate the culprits in a proper manner; and when they were released it was under the assurance that the utmost severity of the law would be put in force against them in the event of relapse. The higher ecclesiastical and civil authorities were commanded to keep a most vigilant watch, and from that time the association was virtually extinguished, whatever became of the individual feelings of its members.

How many victims may have been sacrificed to this spirit of inhuman and revolting fanaticism no human being can ever know, and the day of judgment alone can reveal.

THE NEW ROBE.

BY S. E. S.

Were Lady Ecrit rom from her cold ocean bath,
Entwining the water-shadowed hair,
One day when the winds fluttered chill o'er the path,
And the leaves shivered down on the air,
She turned, in disdain, from the soft-flowing grace
Of her robe, and her jewels' gleam,
While the splendor fell down from her fair, bright face,
Like the falling light of a dream.

"I am weary," she said, "of the crimson and gold
That shine out in my autumn dress;
For the Night hath wept over every fold,
And tarnished its loveliness.
'Twas gorgeous and rich, but I tire of it now,
And sigh for another, whose hue
Shall be like the bloom that fell from the bough
Of the apple-trees, wet with dew.

"The sober brown dress that I wore last spring
When I sought for the first young flowers,
When I listened afar for the birds that sing
Through the low monotone of the showers,
Was suited by the dress and the mist's gray wings,
That braided o'er the glistening sheen;
And as summer blushed by the valleys and springs,
I drew around me a robe of green.

"Then covered with blossoms and low trailing vines,
With jasmine and rose-leaves quaint;
And the long grasses waved in delicate lines
Where the rose in my hair grew faint.
Diamonds and violets with quivering light,
Flashing, lay on my bosom bare;
While the lilies that bloomed on my mantle white
Dropped fragrance athwart the air.

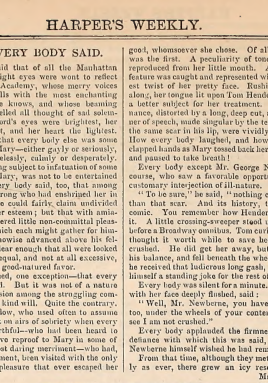
"But I cast it aside with cold, careless scorn,
And stepped from its clinging caress;
And down midst the yellow and whispering corn
I wove me a glittering dress.
Right royally flouted its purple and gold,
Gemmed over with gay crimson leaves,
While a warm, amber light glanced down from each fold,
Like the sun on the harvest sheaves.

"I braided the bands of my long, sunny hair
With the drooping grace of the wheat,
And I entwined the sheen of my golden ears
With the blue grapes fragrant and sweet.
But the wheat is shaken, the grapes' deep blue
Hath lost all its watery light,
And the hem of my robe is soiled, trailing through
The forest's brown paths in the night.

"I will dress me anew, ere the morning dawns,
In a robe whose beauty shall be
As soft as the shadow that flit o'er the lawns,
And pure as the form of the sea."
Then she turned with a bound to the wind's low sighs
That crept over the mountain bleak,
The light grew dark in her soft blue eyes,
As a thought flushed over her cheek.

When the morning came with its wide, pale light,
She stood by the frozen sea,
With her bare arms gleaming, snowy and white,
From her robe of purity.
Two floating and fair as the wind-kept down
That falls from the eider's wing;
And diamonds and pearls in her jeweled crown
Neath the sunbeams were quivering.

Long plumes of white, with their tremulous grace,
Drooping down from her shadowed hair,
Touched softly her cheek as her bright, glad face,
As she smiled on the amiit air.
In the misty folds of her drapery lay
Rare blossoms of silvery hue,
So cunningly wrought—so dream-like were they—
Each moment they changed to the view.



For the fluttering fall of the soft pure lace,
That lay like a veil around,
Hid the lily away in the snow-drop's place,
And covered them both with down;
And the Lady's smile overbowed her face,
In a sudden and happy glow,
As her eyes swept over her new robe's grace—
The whiteness and silence of snow.

WHAT EVERY BODY SAID.

EVERY body said that of all the Manhattan maidens whose bright eyes were wont to reflect the lustres of the Academy, whose merry voices filled Society's halls with the most enchanting music that nature knows, and whose beaming spirits forever repelled all thought of sad solemnity, Mary Dashford's eyes were brightest, her voice the sweetest, and her heart the lightest. Every body said that every body else was some way in love with Mary—either gayly or seriously, consistently or hopelessly, calmly or desperately. The idea of not being subject to infatuation of some sort, as regarded Mary, was not to be entertained at any time. Every body said, too, that among all the dashing young blades who had enlisted her in their souls not one could fairly claim undivided pre-eminence in her esteem; but that with amiable grace she showered little non-committal pleasantries around, which each might gather for himself and yet feel nowise advanced above his fellows. It seemed clear enough that all were looked upon by her with equal, and not at all excessive, though sufficiently good-natured favor.

There was, indeed, one exception—that every body acknowledged. But it was not of a nature to excite apprehension among the struggling competitors for Mary's kind will. Quite the contrary. An odd kind of fellow, who used often to assume dignity, and to put on airs of seniority when every body else was unfeignedly but lately heard in utter words of grave reproof to Mary in some of the innocents of mad dashing merriment—at which, as a proper punishment, been visited with the only petulance and displeasure that ever escaped her lips—who had not even the right-ful claim of extreme youth upon her attention, and who was altogether too profound and sometimes even pedantic to suit at all the tastes of the brilliant circle over which Mary held sway—was evidently viewed by her with much distrust and suspicion, notwithstanding that his relations of apparent friendship toward her were broken apart, and a superficial courtesy guided all the details of their intercourse.

Not that Mr. George Newberne was absolutely repulsive or intolerable. Very far from it. At most times, every body, Mary, too, was disposed to consider him with appreciation ;—for, after all, there were few more brilliant, more genial, more generous than he, when he so chose to be. But then he had queer ways of intruding inappropriate severities at unexpected times, and scattering sharp observations about him, in a manner that would bring upon him the temporary hatred of all who heard him. Not even Mary, whom every body else strove to shield from the faintest shadows of discomfort, was exempt from his occasional asperities. Sometimes, in the very height of her brilliancy, when all had gathered about her delighted, and were taking a delicious vicarious enjoyment in the great quantities, the sentiment of the group would be suddenly changed from happiness to wrath by some extraordinary and ill-timed utterance of Mr. Newberne, calculated to bring reproach upon the central divinity. Perhaps Mary would then briskly retort, and bring back the happiness that had been so unfairly used against her; and at such times Mr. Newberne was always instantaneously silenced. Then thought this strange, because they had noticed that when any person else entered the contest on her part, and undertook sarcastic retaliation, he was straightway confounded and put to shame by Newberne, who, whatever were his errors, had certainly no notion of shrinking from any encounter of keen wits. How Mary endured it as repeatedly nobody could understand, and every body declared that the time must speedily come when Mr. George Newberne would be blotted out from her recognition.

I remember one of these little exhibitions of bad taste, which was perhaps the most annoying that ever occurred. One festival night, when Mary was more than usually captivating, and when all the attractions of a glittering drawing-room lor conversation was the most powerful, she was surrounded by a little army of admirers, most of whom stood silent, venturing only a chance acquiescent phrase or a submissive murmur of approval. Mr. Newberne stood not far away, listening like the rest, and smiling like the rest, at each fleshing sentence. Mary drew wonderful revelations of character. With a phrase she characterized, for evil or for good, whomsoever she chose. Of all mimics she was the first. A peculiarity of tone came aptly reproduced from her little mouth. An oddity of feature was caught and represented with the queerest twist of her pretty face. Rushing playfully along, her tongue lit upon Tom Henderson. Never a better subject for her treatment. His countenance, distorted by a long, deep cut, and his manner of speech, made singular by the termination of the same scar in his lip, were vividly brought up. How every body laughed, and how every body applauded as Mary tossed back her dainty head, and paused to take breath!

Every body except Mr. George Newberne, of course, who saw a favorable opportunity for his customary interjection of ill-nature.

"To be sure," he said, "nothing can be duller than that scar. And its history, too, is all so comic. You remember how Henderson came by it. A little crossing-sweeper was run unconsciously before a Broadway omnibus. Tom curiously enough thought it worth while to save her from being crushed. She did get her way, but then he lost his balance, and fell beneath the wheels. And so he received that ludicrous long gash, and rendered himself a standing joke for the rest of his life."

Every body was silent for a minute. Then Mary, with her face deeply flushed, said:

"Well, Mr. Newberne, you have thrown me, too, under the wheels of your contempt, but you see I am not crushed."

Every body applauded the firmness and quick defiance with which this was said, and I think Newberne himself wished he had remained quiet.

From that time, although they met as frequently as ever, there grew an icy reserve between Mary Dashford and Geo. Newberne. Some persons thought too that when he was by she showed less gayety than she had been accustomed to. But this was considered of very slight importance compared with the fact that, for the first time within the knowledge of Society, Mary began to indicate a human preference. And who should be its object but this same unfortunate Tom Henderson, of whom she had made such fun only a little while before?

Every body deluded at first, but it soon became clear that Tom was very much favored. She went with him to the opera twice as often as with any one else, and allowed him to talk with her just as much as he desired to, which she had never used to do, because, she had said, although he was a noble fellow, he was a noble and outrageous fellow, as he had proved himself in that affair of rescuing the little street-girl, yet he certainly was dull and uninteresting, and brought heaviness of spirit upon her. But she never said any thing of that kind now, and if any body ever laughed at Tom to her, she would not encourage him a bit.

This went on until Tom himself experienced a light, and understood with some degree of clearness how matters were. Of course he was vastly delighted, and gave plentiful evidence of his appreciation of the good fortune that had befallen him. He bought amazing trousers, and decorated himself all over with watch-chains and finger-rings, to the extent of a good many hundreds of dollars. In the matter of boots and kid-gloves he became astonishingly immaculate, and his neckties were the most touching things I ever saw, in that way. His absolute disregard of cost, it was said by shop-keepers, brought upon him a great deal of credit. He even undertook to express himself in a more direct way to Miss Dashford herself, by adoration-offerings of bracelets and things; but these were rather frowned upon by the lady, who forbade him to go to any greater lengths than an occasional bouquet.

Mr. George Newberne saw all this, as every body did, but, unlike the rest, refused to make it a subject of public discussion. He saw no reason, he said, to persecute either Mary or Tom with the attacments of a pair of young people, and, for his part, he preferred not to talk too much about it. This was ascribed to his well-known acerbity, and when it was announced one day that he was about to desert New York, and run off for some years to the opposite continent, every body said he had probably got tired of the unfailing topic, and was determined to get rid of it by this violent means. But somehow, every body, in spite of all his bad temper and repeated social aggressions, felt a regret which they could not explain when they heard the news. They remembered some good points of manliness, genuine sincerity, honorable friendship, which they had been in the habit of overlooking. But as it was settled that he was to go, they could only bid him the best good-by they had on hand, and wish him all sorts of pleasant journeyings.

Mr. Newberne passed around to say the last words to his friends before departing. He came in upon Mr. Tom Henderson.

"What can I do for you, Tom, over the water?" said he.

"Why, nothing," said Henderson, "nothing that I think of. But, then, Newberne, perhaps you might do something for me here before you go—but it is, if you are willing."

"Of course; say what."

"You will see Mary Dashford before you go?"

"This morning, if she is at home."

"Well, Newberne, I have always had an idea that a little present for which you said one night at Larcher's house first turned Mary's thoughts upon me. I may be wrong, anyhow I would. What do you think—shall I, old fellow?"

"I never think about any thing," said Mr. Newberne.

"Oh; well, that's strange, too. But still it seemed so to me, and since Miss Dashford has—since she gives—since every body says I have—if you see you've heard what every body says?"

"Oh yes."

"Of course; well, since that is the case, I have written a little note here—I don't like to talk much, but it came hard, and I only finished it last night —telling her what every body says, you know, and asking her what she says, you see. Don't you see?"

"I see," said Mr. Newberne.

"To be sure," said Mr. Henderson. "Now since I owe you, or at least I think I do, something in this affair already, wouldn't you be a splendid fellow, and add to the obligation by handing her this note? Then, you see, if she should be angry, you could say you know, and you see you might say a thing or two in the right direction any way, you know."

At that moment Mr. Newberne's attention was attracted to the street. Returning, after a little space, he said:

"No, Henderson, be advised, and don't ask my assistance. I can't help you in this case. Besides, letters never do at such a time."

"What, not do?"

"Not at all. I know a lady who was attacked ever so many times with letters, and who put them all away, one after the other. It needed the true evidence of earnest feeling that the voice and the eye could give. Well, I can't give you lessons, but take care to avoid letters."

"Now, my dear fellow, it's my only way. What else shall I do? You don't expect such a face as mine to fascinate, do you? And what sort of a voice is mine, cracked by an omnibus wheel, and a cut-throat? No, it won't do, you know. So help me through, and take the note."

Mr. Newberne yielded to continual persuasions, and took charge of the note and letter, too, with a little less cordiality than he had shown on entering.

Miss Dashford was at home, and would be glad to see Mr. Newberne.

Presently they stood together in the drawing-room. Less highly animated, but more charming than ever, was Mary. She never seemed so tranquil as when she welcomed her visitor; and yet in her little hand, as it lay for a moment in his, quivered, trembled, as it was not used to do.

"A last journey," said Mr. Newberne. "Do I come too early?"

"Oh no—oh no," said Mary; "you do not come too early."

"I have a double duty," he said. "First, let me tell you that I go to-morrow upon a long voyage. I would not do for me to go without your good wishes."

"I heard you were going, Mr. Newberne, but I decided for I thought if it were true I should know it from you."

What was it in her tone that made his fingers leave the note which he carried in his hand, and wonder within himself whether he would part with it at all? But he hesitated only for a moment.

"I have," he said, "promised to hand you this, from a gentleman who has done me too much honor in according it to me. It was his wish, not altogether mine, that I should bring it."

With some surprise she took it and read. Then her head drooped a little, and her face was hidden.

They stood very quietly, just by the fire-place, Newberne still folded in his heavy traveling-cloak —Mary shading her countenance with her hand. At last she looked up and spoke.

"Do you know," she asked, "what is in this note?"

"Mr. Henderson has told me," he said.

"You know, then, Mr. Newberne, how little me to a better understanding of my real duty than I myself possessed. I have always thanked you for it at some times, and I now have had the strongest reason to think so. Help me once more, Sir; tell me now what I should do."

"Don't ask me—don't ask me, Miss Dashford," he said. "Here you alone must judge. You must not ask me to say a word."

Then after another brief pause, bending forward, she let the note which told the story of poor Tom's heart fall, never touched by her own, full among the glowing flames. And yet neither spoke.

But as the little hand returned it was caught—caught too fast to be released—and the drooping form was drawn to a stronger and worthier resting-place than it had ever before found.

"You will not go—morrow?" said Mary, looking up, and speaking first, a long while after.

"My darling, no," said George Newberne.

At first every body said it was impossible. But this would not do at all; so every body said con-fusted things indicative of profound stupor. At length, however, it was all arranged with extreme elegance, for every body said, "Of course, by all means, we always thought so; and some of us knew it from the very beginning."

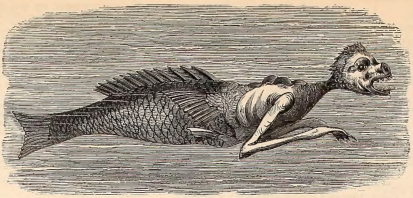
THE REAL JAPANESE MERMAID.



THE accompanying engraving of the well-known fish called by the Japanese the Nosmo, is from a sketch obligingly furnished us by the writer of the following letter. It will be viewed with interest by all who remember the excitement produced some years since by the exhibition of a so-called mermaid at Barnum's, in this city. The letter is as follows:

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

RANDOLPH, MACON COLLEGE, VIRGINIA, December, 1859.

I am to-night in receipt of a letter from Dr. D. B. Phillips, surgeon in the United States Navy, steamer Mississippi, dated Hong Kong, Sept. 27, 1859, and containing the accompanying sketch from nature and description (with the request that I forward them in his name and with his compliments to you for your Weekly, "of a very singular animal, found in Japan, and called the Nosmo. The specimen from which this sketch was taken is dead and dried, and is eighteen inches in length. I have examined it (continues Dr. Phillips) with the utmost care, and am fully persuaded that it is genuine. It is universally and immediately recognized by the Japanese as a Nosmo. The specimen is now in possession of Mr. T. King, master of the American schooner Wanderer, now at Shanghai, who purchased it at Kanagawa, Japan, for the sum of 130 tekiboos, equal to $40. Mr. King has since been offered $1500 for it by one I understand) Mr. Bruce, the English Minister to China." Vouching for the truth of all I assert, and leaving the question of classification to the naturalist, I remain, Yours truly, WILLIAM B. CARR.

THE JAPANESE MERMAID.—[FROM A SKETCH BY DR. PHILLIPS, U.S.N.

THE ROCK OF GIBRALTAR.

IN connection with the war now raging in Northern Africa between Spain and Morocco we give the accompanying picture of the rock of Gibraltar, the key of the Mediterranean. If Spain should be successful in the war, her statesmen openly avow her intention of endeavoring to recover, by fair means or foul, this important position. No attempt of the kind would be successful if made by force; but England is now less covetous of territory than she was once.

Gibraltar, standing as it does on a peninsula at the entrance to the Mediterranean, is connected with the continent of Spain by a low sandy isthmus, one mile and a half long and three-quarters of a mile broad; having the bay of Gibraltar on the west (which is formed of Europa Point on the east and Point St. Garcia on the west) and the open sea of the Mediterranean on the east. Near the point of junction of this isthmus with the main land are the Spanish lines, between which and the rock is a space called the neutral ground. The highest point of the rock is about 1400 feet above the level of the sea; its north face is almost perpendicular; while its east side is full of tremendous precipices. On its south side it is almost inaccessible, making approach from seaward impossible; the west side, again, although nearly as rugged and precipitous as the others, slopes toward the sea, and here the rock is secured by extensive and powerful batteries rendering it apparently impregnable. Vast sums of money and an immense amount of labor have been spent in fortifying this celebrated strong-hold. Numerous caverns and galleries, extending from two to three miles in length, and of sufficient width for carriages, have been cut out of the solid rock, forming safe and sheltered communications from one part of the garrison to another without being exposed to the fire of an attacking enemy. Along these galleries, at intervals of every twelve yards, are port-holes, bearing on the neutral ground and bay; while trees, shrubs, and flowers of various kinds have been planted at different points, both for ornament and utility. On the summit of the rock there are several barracks, towers, and fortresses. Of late the fortifications have been carefully strengthened at every vulnerable point. Something over 1000 guns, of the largest calibre, are mounted on the rock; and it is supposed that among them the Armstrong gun will not be wanting. The principal defenses are on the west side, fronting the bay, but there is also a battery on the east side, though the steepness and ruggedness of the rock would seem to render it almost unnecessary. The town of Gibraltar is situated on the west side of the peninsula, terminating in Europa Point, and fronts the bay. The bay is of semicircular form, about six miles in length and four and a half in breadth. The best anchorage is from off the middle of Algesiras, on the west side of the bay, toward Palmones River. The shipping is sheltered on the British side by two formidable moles, called Old and New Mole—one on the north and the other on the south side of the town of Gibraltar. Opposite the town of Gibraltar, on the west side of the bay, is the Spanish town of Algesiras.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

HERE is a fine example of waking up the wrong passenger:

"Passing over the Georgia Railroad some months ago, I fell in company with my friend W. H. Blankenship, better known as Dr. B., who, during the ride, got to nodding, and nodded off his hat. On awaking, he saw two ding and nodded off his hat. On awaking, he saw two gentlemen laughing at his excessive bowing. One of them remarked: 'My good man, you shot a monkey that time.'—'Yes,' said he; 'and if I'd had you in range I would have killed two!'"

Absolutely-five years ago a Pittsburgh alderman committed some breach of prison: for raising a noisy and other riotous conduct." He went by the name of Alderman Ramsay all the rest of his life.

A German doctor in Pennsylvania, giving his evidence in Court respecting a broken limb, called the fracture a fraction. In his cross-examination he was asked if the fraction of which he had spoken was a vulgar fraction or a decimal fraction. "Oh!" said the doctor, very assertively, "it was a dishmal fraction!"

Forty or fifty years ago the amiable Mr. P., the curator of the Academy of Fine Arts, not for several winters in the Legislature of Pennsylvania as one of the Representatives from Philadelphia. On one occasion, a country member having presented a petition for a lottery, Mr. P—— moved its reference to the Committee on Vice and Immorality. At this the precentor of the petition fared up, and cried, "Mr. Speaker, do any of the members of this House know what the member from Philadelphia does for his living? I will tell you: he shakes naked images to ladies and gentlemen for a quarter-dollar a head. He's a pretty fellow to talk of vice and immorality!"

On Sunday morning, September 30, 1859, a notice appeared upon the door of a prominent hotel in Washington City, of which the following is a verbatim copy:

"Gentlemen will Please not Bring any more chairs into th passag or atuat th door it very much dirpliices th indie & the success in the business depend on pleasing the Ladie"

An ex-United States Consul sends us the following:

"The Yankee residing at Buenos Ayres must be careful to take measures to celebrate the coming Fourth of July, and I was called upon to preside. As a toast was offered by stated the object of our meeting, Mr. F——, formerly of Massachusetts, arose, and after having obtained a printed page, proceeded to read. The preamble was good, and the resolution—Resolved, That the 4th of July, of July commence on the evening of the third, and continue till the evening of the twenty-first—decidedly patriotic. What a spree it prospect!"

"The whaling bark Franklin put in for repairs, and looking over the captain's logbook I found an entry of one page to consist of, 'This day commences dead calm.' A few lines below, 'Sea a mill pond.' Then a twelve hours later appears the next observation, 'Sea another trifle.' And the day's work ends with, 'This day ends—dead calm, out 1004 days nothin more particklar.'

"Last ult.' U. S. Int. Rev. Rec. W. W."

Those periodicals are most likely to explode which haven't a spark of fire in or about them.

The studio of a first-rate portrait painter must be a perfect beauty. It is full of striking likenesses.

It has been said that the difference between a carriage-wheel and a carriage-horse is that one goes better when it is tired, and the other doesn't.

Somebody says that "moring is the spontaneous escape of those malignant fishings which the sleeper has no time to vent when awake."

AN EYE TO BUSINESS.—Some one has remarked somewhere, that it is a ludicrous sight to behold a physician attending his patient's funeral; it looks so like a tailor taking home his own work.

"Practice makes Perfect.—" Oh, Jacob," said a master to his apprentice boy, "it is wonderful to see what a quantity you can eat."—"Yes, master," replied the boy; "I have been practicing since I was a child."

One day a beggar man, who had long been known as the do-nothing of the place where he lived, met a modest ladies with two panniers. On asking what was in them, and being told that they contained eggs and butter, he exclaimed, "Well, then, toss me in, for I'm nowt else."

"Why, Bridget," said her mistress, who wished to rally her on the assortment of her company upon the fantastic ornamenting of a huge pie, "why, Bridget, did you do this? You are quite an artist. How did you learn it?"—"Indade, it was mesself that did it," replied Bridget, "bein it pretty, mum? I did it with your false teeth, mum."

A glass of soda water was offered to a country lad, who rejected it with the greatest indignation, "I tell you what, I am a salamander," said he, "to drink water biling hot!"

"You had better ask for manners than money," said a finely-dressed gentleman to a beggar boy who had asked for alms. "Sir," asked for what I thought you had the most of," was the boy's reply.

Philosophers themselves, like the stoic gentleman of Marmontel, after gaining simplicity of living, often sink to sleep on heavy suppers and beds of down.

Persons in a crowd should keep their elbows out of each other's stomachs; yet a man's stomach is often turned sick by the motion of his own elbow than by those of his neighbors.

THE SENTENCE OF A WISE MAGISTRATE.—Always speak of a man as you find him.

"WANTED—A FEW MORE OF THE SAME SORT."—Furini, the dictator of Central Italy, has shown so much pluck, sagacity, and energy, that one can not help wishing Italy had at this moment more men "qualem furini."

LOST MEN.—When bachelors get married their bachelor acquaintances see them no more. So far as concerns their course in life in chambers, they might indeed almost as well be dead as wedded. Sometimes one of them appears in the world he once frequented, back-somed more like a ghost, and seems the merest shadow of the jolly dog he used to be. His old friends are hurrying more with sorrow than with anger, but neither he nor they derive much comfort from this visit. In fact, he drops in like a tax-gatherer, and makes every one uncomfortable. His wife was once the life because the death-bed of their dinner-table. A Benedick with bachelors is a fish out of water; and the best thing to be done with him is to throw a bait out and try to make him hook it.

MALAPROPISM.—A good old lady, having occasion to mention a work by a great contemporary historian, denominated it Mezeeter's "History of Europe." Subsequently, referring to the arrangement which terminated the late Italian war, the dear old soul called it the Treaty of Villafranca.

THE BANDS OF THE TIBER.—Crassus was the richest man of his time among the ancient Romans. Who were his bankers? If the opulent triumvir had a banker, Mr. Cæsius.

QUEER QUERIES.

In what high can a butting-man be viewed as a lay figure?

Is it legal for a blind man to use upon a bill made payable at sight?

When the morning breaks, is it expected to appear in the Bankruptcy Court?

A PROBLEM VERY EASY OF SOLUTION.

By an Indignant Young Lady, who is tired to death at the way-worn rubbish that is indulged in at the expense of ladies' dresses.

GIVEN: A Lady's Crinoline, and a Gentleman's Intervening Cane.

TO FIND OUT: Of which of the two the circumference is the greater.

THE STABLE MIND.—An ugly man, being in the lake of Wight, and finding himself in the neighborhood of the Laureate's dwelling, goes to call upon that illustrious poet, for the purpose of telling those boys of his which he has heard so much of.

MEMORANDUM BY A MENTOR.—How annoying it is to find people grouped, instead of being placed at proper distance from each other, in consequence of having pursued their own private instead of following our advice!

DOMESTIC PETS.—Never purchase a parrot without taking it a month upon trial. There is no knowing where the bird may have been brought up.

SOCIAL SUGGESTIONS.

BY MRS. ARTEMUS DODGERS.

When you receive your guests, be sure to tell them what a multitude of disappointments you had to meet, how the Lion of the day (whom you know you dared not have) was laid up with rheumatism, or had caught cold in coming.

If you have been so lucky as to catch some titled people, take care to tell your green-grocer to bawl their names out with a stentorian voice, as footmen, announced him.

In making out your dance list, introduce the Calednars and similar astronomical terms, as probably most many derive some entertainment from a study of the stars.

Be sure to tell your guests that they will be ready to come forward as a dea ex machina—and having the directions of Mr. Puff for the production of the ballet and the dedirector in the mazes at Hampton Court.

In being obliged to invite your relatives to eat much, of course you need not go to great expense about refreshments. A little cold meat, a few jellies, and cake and wine, is quite enough.

Whether to serve tea, coffee, or chocolate, is a question of importance. Some people are curious upon the subject—I, a, lots of gas, and little lobster salad.

With regard to wine, you can ask your guests Champagne at a very small expense, if you do not mind giving it to them in a tea-cup, or in a tumbler with them. The worse the wine is, recollect, the less will people drink of it. Sherry and Madeira are the safest evening parties, and it is just as well that nobody be disappointed.

A NEW TRIAL.—"Does your Watch Go, and is it a Repeater?" said a wag to a man in a railway train. The watch that does not go is a repeater; for whenever you consult it, it always tells you the same.

JOINING UNDER DIFFICULTIES.—Writing with tremendous chilblains on your fingers.

THE LANGUAGE OF FLOWERS.

BOY.—"I say, Bill, what's a mean talk?"

WICKED UNCLE.—"Yes, my dear, they talk with fingers."

MORAL LESSON.—A conscientious old gentleman, indicted to stand godfather to a friend's baby, and wishing to typify the requisite qualities of godhead, viz. and vanities, presents the little one with a set of wooden spoons.

APPROPRIATE ADDRESS.—A poet, a native of the "Land o' Cakes," wrote an Ode to the Owl, commencing with "Hoot Awa!"

EXTREMELY GREEK.—Secret drawers should never be made of green wood, for the reason that they never be deposited in them, from the very great risk they run of splitting.

When is a man (lawyers included) like strong ale?—When he thinks no small beer of himself.

"Conductor, you've passed my station," said a moneyed lady, "when I was young, called me an enchantress, but now I have lost my charms, they say I am an ugly as a witch. Ah, drat 'em!"

THE SHAME OF THE STABLE.—Rogues is a common appellation for horses. Gentlemen are unacquainted with horses. Can they seem dead as to their moral feelings No doubt their hearts are reviled.

A SHARP CRITIC.—An elegant declared that a pig's cheek was great. His friend, assenting, remarked that a big pig's head was better.

PARALLEL BY AN ILLITERATE PERSON.—Orthography is my spelling; heterography is another man's spelling.

FACILITY IN BOOK-KEEPING.—To keep books appear to be an easy matter, but the commencement is a difficulty with the majority of those who borrow books consists in forgetting to return.

IGNORELOGY.—Whitebait, in spite of their minutiæ dimensions, are decided by the most scientific epicures to be no small fry.

RETRIEVING ONE'S POSITION.—A fast undergraduate, immediately on having been plucked, gets driven to the station and takes a ticket for home.

ETIQUETTE à la Romaine.—Upon the principle that one man is as good as another, Dana, in a speech at Rome, put three hats upon his head because the Pope wears three crowns at once.

A DELICATE PROPOSAL.—A civic youth, intending to offer marriage to a young lady, wrote to ask her to unite with himself in the formation of an "Art Union."

THE MILITARY LINE.—Captain Bagge, of the Commercial or T. G. Hills Volunteers, describes himself and his gallant company as "Bagge Rifles."

THE LAW.—Its theory (says poor Mr. Briefless) is far better than its practice.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

To Public Speakers and Singers.

"Brown's Bronchial Troches," or Cough Lozenges.—From Prof. B. Silliman, Chemist and Geologist, B. Pascoe College, La Grange, Ga. "I have found their use very efficacious in relieving the irritation of the Throat so common with Speakers and Singers. I have enlisted several of my friends in their favor, among whom are Professor Wieler, Principal Brownwood University, and Rev. M. Tracy of this place. The Troches have only to be tried to recommend themselves."

"Here is a life which is a Life indeed, and before which the conventional and commonplace biographies of modern times sink into stupidity and insignificance. If we should write all we think concerning the merits of this book, we should run the risk of being charged with the accused of imprudent enthusiasm, besides incurring the penalties decreed by our profession upon by the deficiencies of the two succeeding volumes. But if Mr. Parton goes on in the same style he has begun, he will write a greater and more pleasing popularity than almost any American biographie has ever enjoyed. . . . All that the public has to do, therefore, is that he will continue and conclude as ably as he has begun.—(New York Courier and Enquirer.

"We confess having read the work in two prolonged sittings. . . . Take it all in all, we have never read more difficult and dangerous ground, but there need be no fear that his foot will falter."—(Harper's Weekly.

[The same journal, which should well be endorsed with regard to books, recently pronounced Mr. Parton's "Life of Aaron Burr" "decidedly the most successful biography ever published in this country."]

"We can only add to the foregoing, that he will continue and conclude as ably as he has begun.—(New York Journal of Commerce.

Scrofula, or King's Evil.

One quarter of all our people are scrofulous: their persons are invaded by this lurking infection, and their health is undermined by it. To cleanse it from the system we must renovate the blood by an alterative medicine, and remove it by healthy food and exercise. Such a medicine we supply in the most effectual remedy which the medical skill of our times can devise for this every where prevailing and fatal malady. It is combined from the most efficient remedials that have been discovered for the expurgation of this foul disorder from the blood, and the cure of the system from its destructive consequences. Hence it should be employed for the cure of not only scrofula, but also those other affections which arise from it, such as Erysipelas and Skin Diseases, St. Anthony's Fire, Rose, or Erysipelas, Pimples, Pustules, Blotches, Blains and Boils, Tumors, Tetter and Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Ringworm, Ulcerations, Syphilitic and Mercurial Diseases, Dropsy, Dyspepsia, Debility, and, indeed, all Complaints arising from Vitiated or Impure Blood. The popular belief in "impurity of the blood" is founded in truth, for scrofula is a degeneration of the blood. The particular purpose and virtue of this Sarsaparilla is to purify and regenerate this vital fluid, without which sound health is impossible in contaminated constitutions.

AYER'S
Compound Extract of Sarsaparilla,

PERUVIAN SYRUP.—Quiet patient Medicines most persons are justly prejudiced. Health is too valuable to be trifled with. So is no poisoning ordinary common sense would seem to take a patient medicine of which he has known nothing, or what is worse, of which he knows it is a nostrum, for all he knows, may be a deadly poison. The Peruvian Syrup can not be placed in this category. There is every evidence in its favor that it has in us quackery in it. It is a solution of the protoxide of iron, prepared by a new method. The proprietors are well known in Boston, and are gentlemen upon whose statements no honest reliance can be placed. They do not claim that the syrup is a panacea, but that to all those diseases in which the use of iron is indicated it will be found most efficacious. The diseases in which iron is prescribed by physicians are many, and the reason why only is regarded as one of the most useful in the pharmacopœia, or the vaults desired are not already obtained, for the reason that it is sometimes difficult to find in a form in which it should be administered. It has been asserted by psychological chemists, iron can only enter and assimilate with the blood in the form of peroxide, then if administered in this form it would save the stomach unnecessary labor. The protoxide, however, is said to be a very unstable compound, and liable to be converted into another form by the absorption of oxygen from the air. It is claimed that in the Peruvian Syrup it is so combined by chemical ingenuity as to remain permanent, further oxidation being impossible.

Pamphlets containing numerous certificates of cures from eminent physicians, and others, can be had on application to the Agent, or to

"We can promise all an ample reward for the cost and trouble of its acquisition in the contents of this most interesting book. The letters are so many jewels in their way—black to the subject, but brilliantly lightsome in it. It is a little mine full of picturesque diamonds."—New York News.

"Sketches amongst the most realistic, and tolerant, and genial we ever had the pleasure to peruse. The negro nature the author especially knows, profoundly, intimately; knows it not by intellection merely, but also by heart: knows it as one through the cold light of philosophical science only, but most of all, through the warm enkindling recollections of boyhood and youth. How appreciative, how loving, how truthful, how sympathetic he is in his delineations, we will let a few extracts show."—New Orleans Delta.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

The Publishers of Harper's Magazine have the pleasure to announce that they have made arrangements whereby they have secured the early publication in Monthly Parts of Thackeray's New Novel, "Lovel the Widower," in advance of any publication in England. The First Part appears in the present Number of the Magazine. The Tale will comprise about Eight Parts, one in each, with the original Illustrations, and will be published in each successive number.

Anthony Trollope, the Author of the brilliant Novels, "Dr. Thorne" and "The Bertrams," now in progress for Harper's Magazine, a Series of Stories under the general title of "Tales of All Countries." The First Tale of this Series is contained in the present Number, and will appear at short intervals during the year.

The Publisher rests the assurances which they have so often made, that Harper's Magazine will continue to maintain the high character and position which it has assumed. They do not undervalue the importance of the questions at issue between the different sections and parties of the country. Each of these has organs especially devoted to its advocacy and maintenance. The Publishers of Harper's Magazine deem it of paramount importance that there should be a periodical which, leaving the discussion of these vexed questions to their own especial advocates and opponents, shall inculcate those principles and set forth those opinions only in which wise and patriotic citizens of every section heartily concur. Their Magazine will be, as heretofore, the organ of no party in politics or truth in religion; but a National work, drawing materials and welcoming contributions from every quarter. The ablest writers of the country appear in its pages, residing in every section of the country and, of course, different sectional opinions upon the exciting questions of the day. What these private views are, or how freely expressed, beyond the pages of the Magazine, the Publishers think it out of their provinces to inquire: but they will maintain the most watchful care that nothing shall find place in any department of the Magazine which shall render it an unwelcome visitor in any household.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

Five Cents a Number: $2 50 a Year.

The First Number of the Fourth Volume of Harper's Weekly appeared on the 4th January, 1860. Last year over 4,000,000 Numbers of Harper's Weekly were sold, nearly half of which have been bound for reference. In commencing the new volume, the Publishers desire to state that it has been their aim to render Harper's Weekly, in the first place, what before any thing else, a first-class newspaper—a pictorial history of current events, equal to the best weekly in fullness of intelligence and superior to the daily press in combining illustrations with text. Now that the Postage is abolished in the States volumes now published will show. The Illustrations in the Third Volume will be continued in the fidelity with which every important event of the past year has been related and illustrated in the pages of Harper's Weekly. They would refer especially, in this connection, to the Indian War, the Great Exhibition, the Kansas, Harper's Ferry Outbreak, the Utah Expedition, the Paraguay Expedition, China, etc., etc. The value of the Paper can be best realized by supposing that it did not exist, and by trying to conceive how little people would really know of passing events if they had to rely on written descriptions alone. The wonderful development for the coming year are more complete than they have been heretofore. Harper's Weekly has Special Artist correspondents in almost every quarter of the globe, and commands the pencil of the first artists in Europe. It will moreover, in order to present its readers with a complete illustrated history of the year, appear from time to time in pages the best and most generally interesting pictures from foreign illustrated journals. In a word, the subscriber to Harper's Weekly may rely on finding in its pages next year as much to Please, Instruct, Interest, and well-printed picture of every memorable event which occurs, and a perfect history will thus be attained in the general attention of the people of this country.

The Publishers, in connection with the heretofore, to publish the best tales that are written by native and foreign authors. It has already published A Tale of Two Cities, by Charles Dickens (with original illustrations drawn for Harper's Weekly); Ernest Maltravers, by Sir E. Lytton Bulwer; The Lost Secret, by Miss Catherine Lucas; Lord Mauleverer's Secret, by The Good Fight, by Charles Reade; and Trumpet by Cist, by Wilkie Collins, and Two Women in White, by Wilkie Collins, and The Queen of Hearts, by Wilkie Collins, and Two Women in White, by Wilkie Collins, and The Queen of Hearts, by Wilkie Collins, and The Virginians, by Thackeray. Long, both of which are illustrated by John McLenan. Long tales, stories of One, or before the publication in the form of a section of equal merit will be commenced every week. The undoubted excellence that is written here is the result of its liberal system that it will have no foreign serials which appear in Harper's Weekly are published in Harper's Weekly at the same time as in the London Journal. All the necessary instructions given to secure the early sheets of the publication of the Publishers will publish the best that they can obtain, relying upon the merit of the work.

The other departments of Harper's Weekly will continue to receive careful attention at the hands of the publishers.

Gentlemen: I am here with my family, for a final visit with our friends, as we expect to leave again for Burmah in the spring.

But whether here or in Burmah, we find that we can not do without the PAIN KILLER. Indeed, it has become almost an indispensable article in our family. At least, we can not any where find a medicine to take its place.

I shall wish to take back a large quantity with me for our Karens, but will not order it now. We have to use it so continually now that we find it somewhat expensive to buy from the shop.

* * * * * * *

I might say that I need it the more at this very time, as I am now for the first time in my life troubled with a rheumatic affection. Your Pain Killer was the only medicine that Mrs. VAN METER found to give her relief while suffering from this painful complaint in Burmah.

I remain, yours very truly,
H. L. VAN METER.

SPEAKER PENNINGTON.

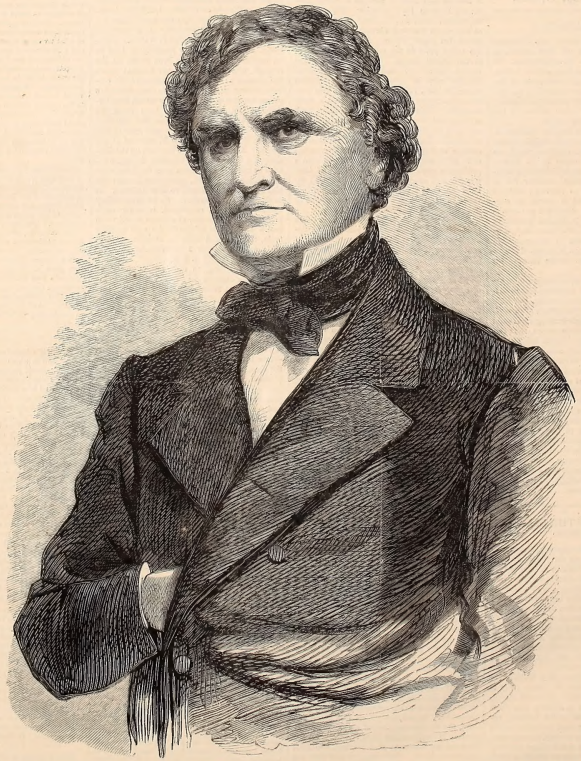
HON. WILLIAM PENNINGTON, better known as Governor Pennington, and henceforth, until the expiration of the Thirty-sixth Congress, to be addressed as "Mr. Speaker," is a native of Newark, in New Jersey, where he was born about sixty years ago, and where he has since resided.

His father, William S. Pennington, was one of the "Jersey Blues" who did such good service in the Continental Line during the Revolutionary struggle. He was regarded as one of the best artillerists in the army, and commanded a company in Colonel Lamb's regiment at the battle of Yorktown, which was complimented by General Washington for the prompt and efficient manner in which they handled their pieces. After the close of the war he was honored with several responsible offices by his fellow-citizens, and was Governor of the State of New Jersey from 1813 to 1815.

Mr. Pennington was educated for the legal profession, which he has followed, in his native city of Newark, with great credit to himself, and to the satisfaction of numerous clients. Gifted with a vigorous mind, with persevering application, and with a fund of practical sense applicable to all the occasions of life, he has always commanded the respect and the esteem of the community of which he has for many years been a leading citizen.

When a young man, Mr. Pennington was elected a member of the popular branch of the State Legislature; but after serving one term he declined a re-election, to devote himself more assiduously to the duties of his profession and his private affairs.

In 1837 he was nominated by the Whig party, and elected, Governor of New Jersey, which made him, ex-officio, Chancellor of the State and President of the Senate. He was re-elected five times by the Legislature, and during the six years of his gubernatorial service gave great satisfaction to the people. While he was Governor party politics ran high, and at the commencement of the Twenty-sixth Congress, in December, 1839, the Clerk refused to call the names of five gentlemen who claimed to have been duly elected as representatives from New Jersey, and whose credentials bore the autographic signature of Governor Pennington, with the "broad seal" of the State. A complicated struggle ensued, delaying the organization of the House until the 21st of the month, when it was perfected, but the five "broad seal" members were not admitted. Their rejection was made a party issue, and the course of Governor Pennington was canvassed throughout the land. The "broad seal" was an important element in the Presidential campaign of 1840, and the Governor was endorsed by the country.



Governor Pennington was an original supporter of the principle that home-manufacturers should receive legislative encouragement and protection. Living in the midst of an industrial community, he has always been a tariff man, and has not only recognized the expediency, but the constitutionality of what was known as Mr. Clay's American System. He is, in fact, and he always has been, a believer in the principles of the Whig Party. Throughout his public life this has always been apparent in his speeches, his writings, and his actions. He has at the same time manifested a conservative spirit, a knowledge of, and a respect for the Constitution, a veneration for the forms of our political institutions, an active faith in man's capacity for self-government, and an unconquerable hostility to arbitrary or oppressive power, in whatever guise it may exhibit itself.

Retiring from a position which he had adorned, Governor Pennington again devoted himself to his profession, although he never hesitated to avow and to sustain his political predilections.—When General Taylor became President, he, without solicitation, appointed Governor Pennington Territorial Governor of Minnesota, and the Senate confirmed the appointment. But it was not accepted, the Governor not being willing to leave his comfortable home at Newark for what was then, with the exception of settlements on the rivers, almost an unbroken wilderness.

President Fillmore, anxious to secure the services of a jurist possessing the practical business qualifications for which Governor Pennington has been so justly famed, offered him the appointment of Judge in California, under the law which provided for the legal settlement of landtitles, as established by the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo. He could not, however, be tempted from the retirement of domestic life.

At the last Congressional election, however, he could not resist the importunities of his personal and political friends, and he accepted the nomination of the "People's Party," in the Fifth Congressional District. This is composed of Essex, Hudson, and Union Counties, embracing Newark, Elizabeth City, Hoboken, and Jersey City, all largely interested in manufactures. The whole number of votes cast was 21,627, of which Governor Pennington received 11,641, electing him by a majority of 1659.

Governor Pennington was warmly welcomed at Washington as one of the old-school of politicians, with an integrity of principle unquestioned and unquestionable. Conservative gentlemen of other parties expressed their willingness to aid in elevating him to the vacant Speaker's chair, for the history of his life afforded conclusive proof that in his hands the power would not in any way be improperly exercised to the injury of any section of the Republic. Excepting, of course, Mr. Muhlenberg, the Speaker of the House during the very first session of Congress, and also Henry Clay, he is the first new member who has been elected Speaker. He may, in the goodness of his heart, not be as severe in his disciplines as the more turbulent spirits in the House require to keep them in order, and to facilitate the transaction of business; but the integrity and firmness of his character, the urbanity of his manners, and the gentleness of his position render it certain that he will discharge the important duties of his position with honor to himself and advantage to the people.

HON. WILLIAM PENNINGTON, OF N. J., SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

In person, Mr. Speaker Pennington is one of the finest looking gentlemen in Congress. His figure is manly and erect; his features are well formed and expressive; his hair is slightly frosted by age; and he speaks in an audible, distinct tone. When he has become a little more familiar with parliamentary rule, and handles his gavel with more decision, he will be one of the best presiding officers who have thus far occupied the third position in the Government of the United States.

Socially, Mr. Speaker Pennington has those urbane and polite manners which characterize gentlemen of the generation now passing away. In his own family circle, which he has so reluctantly left to enjoy unexpected honors, he is as fondly beloved as he is highly esteemed by his neighbors and respected by his fellow-citizens. It is to be hoped that he will receive the support, in his new and arduous position, of the conservative and the order-loving Representatives.

The Chief Justice, in No. 153, which was dated December 3, 1859.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1860.

THE SPEAKERSHIP.

THE long contest has ended, and Governor William Pennington, of New Jersey, is Speaker of the House of Representatives. So it is pity the fight had not been settled before. The recovery of the general commerce of the country has been seriously retarded by the uncasiness created by the long contest for Speaker, and the accumulation of useless millions in the sub-treasuries of the United States.

We wish we could hope that the election of a Speaker would put an end to the foolish speechmaking about slavery and disunion which we have lately heard ad nauseam in the House. Outside of the bluster people understand thoroughly that these speeches, whether for or against slavery, amount to nothing; and ore more empty than, intended to operate on constituencies at a distance. Should it be the misfortune of this country to be divided into two or more distinct nations at any future day, it is quite certain that the task of reorganization will require the aid of men of a very different calibre from the brawlers of the Thirty-sixth Congress.

Should the people of either section ever seriously contemplate such a catastrophe as disunion, they will choose them leaders, not from the loud talkers and angry mouthers of threats, but from among the hard-working and quiet members of committee whose names, thus far, have hardly been mentioned in the debates. We will be no light task for any man to prep are a practical scheme for the severance of this nation—a task for which menacing orations and insane debates are no sort of apprenticeship.

The Congressional reports during the next month or two may enable the careful observer to form a guess as to the names of the future leaders of the American people, whether united or disunited. They will be found among the hard-workers on committees—among the conservative, practical speakers—among the men who never pander to existing sectional prejudices—among those, in short, who really realize that they owe a debt to Washington to serve their country, and not themselves.

A NEW PHASE OF THE SLAVERY QUESTION.

WHILE politicians and theoretical writers are angrily discussing schemes for the extension, the limitation, and the abolition of slavery, the real slavery question—the most important problem of the age—is assuming a new phase, in obedience to the inexorable laws of trade and political economy. Not even the wisest of the statesmen of the past foresaw the perils which environ the present slavery controversy; now that those perils are generally realized, how many even of our most clear-headed and prophetic teachers perceive the changes which God's providence is preparing?

While the highest negro fields hands have been sold in New Orleans at prices ranging from $2200 to $2500 apiece. It is not stated, nor have we any reason to believe, that these field hands were superior to the ordinary negroes of their class: they were mere field hands —that is to say, they knew no mechanical trade. They were simply young and healthy, and they were wanted in New Orleans at $2200 @ 2500. Nor was theirs an exceptional case. We have before us records of sales of negroes at New Orleans for some months back; at most of those healthy young negroes, suited for labor on plantations, have commanded from $1800 to $2000 a head. The market-price of field negroes on the Gulf may, in a word, be said to have been firmly established at $2000 @ $2500.

Ten or twelve years ago negro field hands sold at New Orleans at from $600 to $1200—$1000 being a fair average price for first-class healthy young negroes. It is therefore no exaggeration to state that within the past ten years negroes sold in New Orleans have risen one hundred per cent. in value.

For the secret of this remarkable advance we must refer to the increased demand for cotton and the export of cotton. It is cotton which employs negro labor in the South; without negroes no cotton is raised; and, vice versa, without no negroes can be wanted. It follows, as a natural consequence, that the demand for (and hence the price of) negroes is dependent on the consumption and value of cotton.

Twenty years ago, in 1840, the United States exported to foreign countries 743,906,000 pounds of cotton, worth $63,870,307; being an average of 8·5 cents a pound. Ten years ago, in 1850, the United States exported to foreign countries 1,600,760,000 pounds of cotton, worth $71,984,606; being an average of 11 cents a pound. Both of these years, we may remark, were unusually good years for producers of cotton: that is to say, the prices were above the average of that day. Last fiscal year (1858–59) the United States exported to foreign countries cotton worth $161,434,451. The value was thus twice the export of that staple in 1850, only ten years before. This year the cotton export will probably exceed $180,000,000 in value; so that it may be said that the amount of cotton sent abroad between 1st September, 1859, and 1st September, 1860, will be three times as great as that which was sent abroad between the like period ten years before. A similar increase has taken place in the consumption of cotton in the United States. In 1848 the United States are said to have consumed 600,000 bales of cotton; in 1852, 680,000 bales; in 1856, 770,000 bales; while this year the consumption will probably reach 1,000,000 bales. This increase of consumption, both at home and abroad, having been accompanied, as by a decline, by a rise in the price—middling uplands having risen from an average of 8 @ 9 cents a pound to an average of 11 @ 12 cents—the consequence has been a prodigious increase in the area of cotton land planted, and consequently in the demand for labor on cotton plantations. Hence the advance in the price of field hands from $800 @ $1200 to $2000 @ $2500.

If the remarkable increase which has taken place within the past twenty years in the demand for cotton were due to exceptional circumstances, it would not be safe to base any philosophical argument on the consequences of that increase. It is never safe, for instance, to found arguments upon an advance in the price of cereals; for they can be produced throughout the temperate zone, and any marked advance in the price is sure to be followed by an increase of production, and a consequent decline in market value. With cotton the case is different. From the earliest recorded period of cotton furnished to the manufacturers of the world are produced near the Atlantic coast of the United States in a belt between 30° and 40° north latitude, which, although it has been supplied by Brazil, Egypt, Hindostan, the West Indies, Africa, etc., etc. Outside of that belt there appears to be no possibility of producing cotton, save in the countries we have mentioned —in which all the power of the Governments of England and France, and all the appliances of art and science, whether applied to the culture or quarter of a century, have failed to raise a crop that would keep the Manchester spinners going for more than a few weeks. So it would seem time all these countries together do not produce more than one of our great cotton-growing States, and the article yielded by them generally proves to be inferior in quality, and cannot so thoroughly have been their exertions, that it is safe to conclude that, for some years to come at events, there can be no material increase in the production of cotton from those sources, and that the world's reliance for its annual supply must continue to be on the belt of land extending from 30° to 40° north latitude, on and near the Atlantic coast of North America.

On the other hand, looking to the probable future of the trade in cotton goods, it is impossible to escape the conviction that, unless some substitute for cotton should be discovered, that trade must go on increasing from year to year with the spread of commerce and civilization. No material is known out of which clothing can be made as cheaply and as satisfactorily as cotton. Experience proves this to be the case, for the consumption of cotton goods increases in every country from year to year, has done so for a quarter of a century, and must continue to do so. Between 1840 and 1852 the production of cotton goods in Europe doubled; between 1840 and 1860 the production of cotton goods in the United States has doubled. The increased consumption in France may be inferred from the fact that since September, 1859, to date, we have exported to that country more cotton than used to be sent to France in a whole year, prior to 1850. Every country in the world, in short, is increasing its consumption of cotton. The establishment of peace in Europe, the opening of China, the commencement of commercial intercourse with Japan, the settlement of Australia, the colonization of Liberia, the civilization of Africa, the improvement of the condition of the Hindoos—all these imply an increased consumption of cotton goods, and consequently an increased demand for the raw cotton, which, as we said, can only be produced in the United States between 30° and 35° north latitude.

If this reasoning be sound, it is safe to conclude that the advance in the price of negroes which we have noted is no accidental occurrence, but the natural consequence of a commercial necessity, and that it will be permanent. Nothing short of the reopening of the slave-trade —which the present age will not tolerate—can again reduce the price of negroes to the rates current ten and fifteen years ago.

Now there are several States of the Union which are interested in the rise in which no cotton is grown. In these States no cause is operating to enhance the value of negro property; on the contrary, the gradual encroachments of free labor and political agitations rather tend to diminish the value of such property in those States; and it would fall much lower but for the fact that it can be transported to the cotton-growing States and there converted into money. Such States are Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, and North Carolina. These States contained, at the census of 1850, 1,231,632 slaves. In 1857, it is probable that the number had increased to upward of 1,300,000. It is probably considerably less now. For in Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri slave property, to hold as an investment, has been worth, on the average, over five per cent. per annum; hence the advance in the price of negroes in the cotton-growing States has led to very extensive employment of slave-labor for sale at New Orleans. The movement has been going on steadily for nearly a generation, but has been especially remarkable within the past year or two —since the recent advance in negroes at the South. A gentleman who traveled up the Mississippi a fortnight since describes the negro exodus as more extensive than the Irish exodus during the famine, every boat he met was black with slaves, bound to New Orleans. It would hardly be necessary, in the present state of affairs, to argue that every boat he met was profitable for the owner of negroes to sell them South at the rate of $2000 for each healthy hand, than to keep them in Missouri or Virginia and to receive 5 per cent. on a value ranging from $1200 to $1500.

Reverting, for a moment, to the propositions above stated; the cause of the advance in negroes being permanent in its nature, and the effect consequently presenting every chance of permanency; it follows that the conviction that slave-owners, in the Northern slave States, find it more profitable to ship their negroes South than to hold them where they are, and the exodus being already in full progress; the question arises —how long a period of time must elapse before the change that is going on begins to tell on the political phase of the slavery question? How long will mere political considerations avail to preserve the balance of power between the slave and the free States?

We forbear to pursue the inquiry. Its tendencies are obvious to every unbiased observer. No prophetic spirit is needed to detect the drift of opinion in the country, and the peaceful solution which will presently be discovered for evils now seemingly incurable and fatal.

Philosophers, political economists and moralists may preach, but mankind in the mass, as in the individual, is ruled by self-interest. No power in the world will in the long-run induce slave-owners in Northern slave States to retain their slave-property at a large annual loss; nor will any humanitarian or philosophical arguments induce the slave-owners of Northern people to uphold a crusade against the slave institution in States in which it is useful, and where it could not be dispensed with save at the cost of vast pecuniary loss. The signs of the times are eloquent; those who run may read.

THE LOUNGER.

ABOUT MONUMENTS.

We have a very hard time with our monuments. The money to build them comes much more reluctantly and sensibly than for any other purpose. Just a few years ago Washington Irving, and a single society of sympathetic men subscribe twenty thousand dollars; but the grand national movement to Washington, which began at the push-pin, in what year of grace is that to be completed? Then, several years ago, there was the Bunker Hill Monument to be built. Upon the whole, Bunker Hill is our most representative revolutionary name and battle-field spot. Webster made one of his finest "efforts" when the corner-stone was laid. Jubilate! Exegi monumentum! cried Boston. But Boston was mistaken.

Poor Bunker Hill! If the guns of our sires had hung fire as the monument did, there would have been no occasion for a monument. The pale gray shaft—it looks, at a distance, like a tall lined tower woven of the east wind (for the east wind is visible in Boston on a summer day)—seemed, for a long time, like Cologne Cathedral, a ruin before it was built. It looked sadly across the river to the busy city, which was briskly clustering over all the heights and stretching along the marshes on its neighborhood—itself a monument of intelligence, industry, and thrift; but the busy city was too much occupied with its own prosperity to attend to that of the monument; and the poor, pale fragment glimmered, unheeded, helpless and pitiful, until a Dayadère came skipping over the sea, and with one pirouette lifted the monument upon the point of her toe to completion. So much for any body who remembers the early days of the "Cachuca" and "Cracovienne" to contemplate the Bunker Hill Monument without a pensive regret for Fanny Elsler.

In the neighboring State of Rhode Island, which reverses the ancient circle Macrobius'es eval sess forth, as its founder, there is no monument, no statue, not even a head-stone, to commemorate Roger Williams; and the proposition to erect a mere memorial has never been seconded by the sympathy of the people warmly enough to succeed. So in the work of perpetuating Mount Vernon, it is certainly impossible to say when the money would have been collected except for the assistance of Mr. Everett.

The truth is that the genius of our people does not incline them to erect monumental memorative statues. The countenances of our greatest men are familiar to every body every where in the coarse lithograph likenesses that hang over the walls of tavern bar-rooms and other places of popular resort. Besides, we grow such enormous annual crops of great men!

But to continue. Mr. Everett has issued proposals for another monument, a President of an association to erect a memorial on Washington Green. He is supported by a body of Vice-Presidents from every part of the country, gentlemen of what an enthusiastic French feuilletoniste would call a phenomenal respectability. The address to the citizens of the United States, signed by Mr. Everett, and evidently written by him, explains the grounds of the national appeal made by the Association. The purpose is first to put upon which armed resistance was first regularly made to the arms of Britain and the war began. Therefore it is a monument, and the design which is proposed monument by Mr. Billings presents no Massachusetts individual, but a minute-man; for in the way in which men feel that kind of thing, and the spirit represented by them carried the Revolution.

Subscriptions are solicited.

Vermont, too, is awaking to this matter. Mr. Mead, at Brattleborough, is chiseling a heroic statue of Ethan Allen in the act of demanding the fort at Ticonderoga, and demanding the surrender in the name of the great Jehovah and the Continental Congress. The figure is full of action.

Undoubtedly, whether our genius has a monumental tendency or not, a taste for such works can unquestionably be cultivated. To be sure there is the Cooper Monument—a plant of exceeding slow growth. But every subscriber ought to reflect maturely that statues and monuments are not investments that return large dividends.

Is this perhaps the reason of our monumental apathy? And do republics never patronize art, as graduating collegians say on Commencement Day?

ADVERTISING.

THERE is a fact of which the Lounger has spoken before, and to which he now directs the attention of all interested persons. It is this: If you have invented a patent, don't ask distinguished persons to commend it to public notice, under their names, in the newspapers; if you have a lecture to delive r, don't get the following well-known gentlemen to sign a letter of request to you, expressing their profound interest and that of the whole city in your views. Don't do it for many reasons, and, among them, for these:

The people who sign such letters have not a profound interest in the matter; they have only an esprit de corps interest in it. Then they sign as a "set off." Did you sign the one of them present? Then, above all, every body knows that the signers know that it is a piece of transparent machinery—that whenever it appears the public has the alarm, and instead of a commendation read a condemnation, because it knows that speakers whom they wish to hear do not need the aid of the machinery.

For instance, here is young Charles Vanloo. He is the favorite pupil of Lionardo da Vinci. Perhaps Charles has just painted a picture of Daniel in the Lions' Den. He naturally wishes to exhibit it, and "reap a golden harvest of fame and dollars." He has requested us to be embodied in a list. So he talks it over with his master, and he writes:

"MY DEAR VANLOO,—Your picture is exquisite. It seems to me to combine all the agrémens of Peregino with the delicate Mundus Jocundus of the later Bolognese school. The figure of the Prophet is in the sublimest grove style, and as for the lions, why, my dear Charles, it will not be your fault if tears are not heard all over the Exhibition-room. I could have wished a little more glancing upon the windows of the distant palace, seen through the opening of the cave—but why should I mention it? I know you well—I sincerely congratulate you; and I salute you as, within a very short time, the undoubted artist in the ordinary to the Union Club. Use this as you will. Put your pictures in your sponsor. Cordially yours, my dear Vanloo,

"LIONARDO DA VINCI."

Who is taken in by this letter for a moment? Of course every body knows that it is an act of sheer kindness on the part of old Da Vinci; and inasmuch as the sight of peeps inevitably suggests weakness, perhaps the commendatory and invitatory letter might be advantageously disseminated. If you read in the preface of a book that it is published "by the request of friends who have assured," etc., are you prepossessed in favor of that book? No, Mr. Yankee: if you really do combine the aqua fortis and the delicate Mundo Jumbo, the world will find it out without the letter of Mr. Da Vinci.

SURPRISING.

It is clear that clergymen are not yet freed from the questionable compliment of a call from the parish who come and bring good things and a fat purse, and make themselves at home—eat it all in the papers! Don't misunderstand. Nothing is pleasanter than the social respect manifested by coming, and nothing often, probably, more reasonable than the money. Only, instead of carrying it as a gift, you should be receiving your clergyman's regular salary by the amount. The difficulty in the case is publishing the matter. Why don't you publish your other charities, as well as those to the minister? Why should he, of all men, be selected as the luckless individual who shall be paraded in the papers as the recipient of the bounty of his friends? The instinctive comment of every man who reads that any clergyman's society visited him and gave him "a handsome sum of money" is, "Very well! suppose they did. What on earth did they put it in the papers for?"

And why did they? They knew that nobody except the persons concerned had any interest in the matter. Why, therefore, is the public informed that Mr. Crow read a sermon to "setting address" upon the occasion, and that Mr. Thomas Jones and Mr. Richard Swiveller also made "interesting remarks"?

Simply that the eloquence of those gentlemen and the generosity of the congregation may be made known. And the whole performance, the moment it is made public, is of the most vulgar and offensive kind. For all sensible people give five hundred dollars to any friend, whether he be their pastor or not, without calling every body to see how generous they are, and inviting attention also to the fact that their friend is the recipient of their alms? If it be such a very fine thing to give the few hundreds over and above the salary, how much finer it would be to add them to it; in which case, it is to be hoped, it would be regarded as an affair perfectly and appropriately private between pastor and people.

PARTY SPIRIT.

At a moment when political excitement is so warm that some sober people begin to think it is going to boil over, it is important for us all to wait for them to remember that they may cool themselves off very rapidly by reading the disquisitions of the old parties upon General Washington, and by cultivating a familiarity with the early and late feud of the Federalists and the Jeffersonians.

There was the late Justice Story, who was a Jeffersonian in early life, and lived in the highly respectable town of Salem, in Massachusetts. But Salem was the very sehjetum of Federalism. It is in Essex County, and the "Essex Junto" was—what was it? No one but the Master Joseph gets his head almost broken, and flies into a protecting house, pursued by a group who differ with him in politics.

So in New Hampshire, in those hot times, the Legislature, which was of one political hue, wanted to control the judges who were of another. How should it be done? Why thus: Be it enacted that all the courts of the State be abolished; Section Second: Be it enacted that new courts are created with new names! Straightway it is as if the seat of the bench had fallen out and the old ledges disappear.

In the old Federal days, too, there was inquirement of whom, and, and as a Hartford convention. And when the Chesapeake and Shannon engaged one morning off Cape Ann the shores and hills were crowded with spectators. They were of the two kinds, the Jeffersonians and the Federalists. Suddenly a great smoke enveloped the ships. Every eye upon shore was strained, and every tongue silent, until the wind slowly blew away the cloud, and the two ships were seen sailing together toward Halifax. Even such an ocean of party strife feeling the Federalists were not sorry.

Then there was the last smoke, how vividly! Then has been an "era of good feeling" since. And there will be another era of the same kind when the smoke of the present confusion lifts.

"MY CANARIES."

In these snowy days how the birds at the windows make summer again! Sitting by a warm fire reading a fragrant, pulpy book, may it be Rohan's Ghost," for instance, the sudden, clear, alert roulade, the trilling, eager, penetrating scrap of the canary changes the carpet into a June meadow, and you think you hear bobolinks. Every body loves birds. Not always in the house, indeed; and not crows or owls especially. But the little shy, glancing, singing, twittering thin; from whose nature, and habits and rules of action we drop, they are every where welcome in spring morning, and the canaries, little exotics of song, that tender-hearted and young mistresses, bring home in sunny places among the other tender foreign plants and flowers, with them "it is always May," and they are dearer from their very dependence.

There is many a reader of the Lounger doubtless who either keeps birds, or wants to, and would, if she could only know just how to take care of them. Will all such permit the Lounger to introduce them to "Cousin Sarah," who, under the form of a child's book, has done the very thing they desire and tries her own experience and affection tell: them what they want to know? She call it "My Canaries," and it consists of pleasant chat about real birds, what they did and sang; and how droll and interesting their little ills, and how to guard them and do the best for them. It is a charming book for children of any age, and in loving birds and flowers we are all children. That love, - nay thing will, keep the heart young.

IN RE MRS. GRUNDY.

The ludicrous distortions o. a man's features in a tea-pot are hardly so droll and outrageous as the distortions of what he says, which are printed in the newspapers. It is a rule that you may disbelieve every thing you see a man say in the paper of another opinion than his. If he say that the moon looks like green cheese, he will be reported to have said that it is a lump of spring butter. His real words will be painfully disguised, and his meaning utterly misrepresented.

The worst of this is not its misrepresentation, for nobody's opinions and words are of such vast importance, but it is the contempt for men which the journals show for their readers. I hint a man should willfully lie about another in print or by word of mouth—that, with no particular hatred, but with only a general desire of injury, because a man is of another opinion, is exquisitely contemptible. And that we should, in a Christian house, require this, by supporting it, does not elevate us in the estimation of an honest heart.

As a general thing, editors are like scissors and gilders, upon their own side, and scavengers upon the other. Whatever the men of their side do it is to be presented in the most favorable light, and every kind of ridicule and falsehood is to be freely poured out upon the other side. We all know it—we all expect it—and, with no particular hatred, are all affected by it. We work hard, like boys in a dark room, to build up a terrible ghost of sheets and clothes-horses, and when the light is let in away we scamper frightened out of our wits at our own work.

Mean, at last, it seems as if no self-respecting man could respect public opinion. An opinion made by the meanest—a lie told by the most malicious—is treated as a general sentiment by being printed in a paper—"Why," a man says, "if that's the public opinion I'm ashamed of it!" and he condemns. If an enemy praise me, I shall tremble. If he sneer at me, I shall be content."

And yet, perhaps, this feeling does not condemn immoral action half so sharply and vindictively as it does unpopular opinions. In a dueling community, for instance, no man would probably have a much easier time if he committed a great many crimes which might be named, than if he refused to fight a duel upon moral religious grounds. How many people are known to be liars, who are yet generally recognized and tolerated, while many honest, high-minded men and ladies are taboo for abstract opinions!

All these things excite no very profound respect for Mrs. Grundy. But the worst is to hear people who has cut her apron-strings and walks on by him-self. He tod he can not do it—that he edge of his reputation is not also preserved when he does hold his tongue and cherish his opinions. The company of silent sympathizers with him is not in numbers. They are the great body of the free and accepted. The few who do the loud talking, and who have the ear of the public. Mr. G.'s—the most worshipful Grands—who are more conspicuous than the rest, but who only count one each. It may, however, perhaps, be worth while for any such opinion to remember that the unexpressed is weightier than the other; and to observe that, after being excommunicated for a day, Luther becomes the religious hero of posterity.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—Frontfield, Indefinitely declined.

—Cap-eal writes: "You are in error as respects the origin of the term 'wide-awake,' as applied by the Locofocos to the Republicans. It was common in the country to me of their not having a wig. Surely that's it!"

—A Democrat. Doubtless in the spring the pleasantest route to Boston is by the Worcester Railroad. But the cost of which need not be more than forty or fifty dollars. You must look at the advertisements of the Southern steamers.

—O. D. The lines you quote are usually attached to the engraving of a picture representing a boy sitting directly in the vein of Pope's famous figure of the wound ed deer. The Lounger does not know the author.

"See the startled wild fowl quitting the reedy pond,
And seek, in mankind flight, those golden skies.
You would if someone not in your own hand;
His limbs yet falter on the watery strand.
Poor bashful lad! that fearful, fateful morning! Ere,
How blest the shelter of that island shore!
There while he sobs like infant on its rest,
Nor found nor auster shall his tears molest."

—Joseph. "Is Mr. Browning the author of 'so beautiful poem to a c.'? 'Polly, my Boy?' No. Miss Mulock, who wrote "John Halifax," is the author. You will find it in her volume of poems lately published in Boston.

—Inquirer. No, there is no monument to Roger Williams in the Providence Public Square. There is a little muncetta. The question has been often discussed in the little square, but the fact is that Roger Williams has not yet determined to erect a proper memorial. The inhabitants contend that the State itself is the best memorial of its founder; but the natives inquire, whether it would be any the less so if it had a statue of the great lawmaker in the square? You will find a fine statue of Roger Williams in the first volume of Arnold's "History of Rhode Island," which contains engravings of Pollyry says in his "History of New England." The letter give to themselves, and to forming the Rhode Island, view of the sturdy old dissenter, who, when he was more than seventy years old, rowed in an open boat to Newport to defend his colony's charter. Let bad gone, but the dispute was held, and Roger proclaimed that he was victorious.

—Anon A. Nogan. It was Horace Smith (or his brother) who wrote the address to a mummy:

"And thou hast walked about, how strange a story!

In Thebes streets three thousand years ago."

—W. H. C. When an Englishman speaks of "a frock" he means, if he is talking of men, what we call a frock-coat.

—W. H. "Madge" has been mislaid.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A green spring from the Emerald Isle entered a boot and shoe shop to purchase himself a pair of brogues. After overhauling his stock-in-trade without being able to suit his customer, the shopkeeper hinted that he would make him a pair to order. "An' what'll ye ax to make a good pair?" said the man. The price was named, the Irishman demurred, but after a "lasting and the bargain was made. Paddy was about leaving, when the other called after him, asking, "But what kids did I want them, Sir?"—"Oh," cried Paddy, promptly, "I don't mind about the size at all—make them as large as you like, and I'll pay for the same."

Beauty is a gi t thing, but learning is better. In the estimation o the auctioneer, even, the Muses counted for far less than a pair of "Nine Sisters."

"Day, where do you come from, and how do you live?" "Come from Galway, and live by sting"—"Would you like employment?" "Faith, I would, Sir, if it ain't hard work."—"Well, boy, if you like, I will set you up in a comfortable way, and you can commence and get double"—"Go along, I'm ready!"—"Well, you go somewhere and get a bag of wind, and bring it to me."—"Arrah, Sir," replied the punster, "Just bag off half the name, and it is yer."

A shrewd old gentleman once said to his daughter, "Be sure, my dear, you never marry a poor man; but remember the poorest man in the world is one that has money, and nothing else."

According to the old mythology, Neptune, the sea-god, created the horse; and was the inventor of the bridle. This probably accounts for the fact that people who pull on the reins seem to so frequently get bridled in the street."

A terrible Bore—The bore of the Armstrong gun.

Bee to destiny. One of these days he may be polite and return your bow.

Why is a fool in high station like a man in a balloon? Because every one of any opinion looks to him, and he appears little to every body.

Believe misfortune quickly. A man is like an egg—the longer he is in trouble the less he is liable to be worn taken out.

If a woman could talk out of the two corners of her mouth at the same time, there would be a good deal to be said on both sides.

A man who employs people to work for him should not be more careful to feed his stomach than his hands.

A popular writer says it is not the drinking, but the thirst. Some people think it is neither the one nor the other. Some persons, influenced probably by this important consideration, seem to have deliberately resolved never to get sober.

CURIOSITIES.

A plate of butter from the cream of a "joke."

A small quantity of tar supposed to have been left after the Swedes pitched their tents.

The phrase which used to painting the "signs of the times."

A bucket of water from "Alf's well."

Soup with which a man was washed overboard.

The sheep which is used to sharpen the sheep's edge.

The pencil with which Britannia ruled the wave.

A portion of yeast sent to the baker to leave in your service.

A dress from the moon when she gave change for the last quarter.

The answer belonging to the sup of sorrow.

A dress made for the calling of a sociable wife.

The chair in which the sun sets.

The instrument looked at by the tee meeting.

A buckle to fasten a bagging stock.

The paper from the Lord Mayor.

Hinges and lock from the trunk of an elephant.

A dress from the politician's views.

Dockers from the Cradle of Liberty.

A feather from the wings of a flying report.

At the University of Virginia, several years ago, there was a young student preparing himself for the law. Whenever the Lounger visited the place he found him employing himself a young Patrick Henry, and would make rare oratorical efforts on every occasion when he had partaken pretty freely, he imagined that he had been grossly insulted. Leaving his finger on the side of his nose, he would in his wrath in the following flight: "If you repeat that insult, Sir, I will call you out immediately!" Another hapless young mangled corse will furnish food for the ravens, and the benevolent Society for the relief of fisherless children will be crafted in every breeze."

Reading Character in Writing.—There are persons who profess to give a clue of character by handwriting; and to judge from their advertisements, there is very little doubt that their profession pays them. Yet their judgments, after all, are mere matters of guess-work. For instance, as the gipsies do, on the mere pretence of simply looking at the hand. Now, writing a good hand is not by any means an easily inspired by a good head. Still less is it indicative of having a good heart. A man may write a beautiful hand at the superfine sale, and yet may write the coarsest and most commonplace letter in the world. A fine cleared hand and a fair may sign his name so puzzlingly that nobody can read it. And a man, perhaps, who writes a very bad hand may, without untruth, be looked on as a man of mark.

Remark on Dress.—If a hat is a tile, straw-bonnets are thatch.

The Wreath and the Weaker.—An artificial florist describes himself as "Head Gardener to the Ladies."

Brandy-and-Water by Degrees.—Brandy-and-water. Brandywine. Brandywine. Brandywine. Brandywine. Brandy-wit-ty. Brr-ughh!

Some persons seem to suppose that, as soon as they have breakfasted, it is their bounden duty to divest themselves entirely to the great business of the day—thinking of dinner.

"Miss, what have you done to be ashamed of that you blush so?" "Sir, what have the paper and the straw-bonnet and the pencils done that they blush so?"

"Pa, they tell us about the angry ocean: what makes the ocean angry?"—"Oh! it has been provoked, child."

It is a legal maxim that "the law does not concern itself about trifling matters;" but lawyers and law-makers often do.

"I have pity on a blind woman!" cried an athletic beggar man to a painter-by.—"You must be mad as well as blind," was the answer.—"I see you more than a short time more than a poor blind woman."—"Ah, Sir," replied the beggar, "that's true enough; but as I took the place of my poor blind sister that's dead, I have to go on with the business in her stead, and if I had not I was a strong man, of course nobody would pity me."

"Though lost to sight, to memory dear," as the maiden exclaimed when her lover shook his fists was buried in beard and whiskers.

Why is a cat's tail like a seam's bottom?—Because it grows down.

Uniform love is now defined as the love of a girl for a soldier.

A cockney being asked why he married a second time, replied, "Because it was re-quired."

The young woman who was "driven to distraction," now fears that she will have to walk back.

"THE SAILOR BOY LAY DEAD AND COLD UPON THE SUNNY DECK."

THE RETURN OF THE "FIRE-FLY."

"We're into port at last, Fred, we've pass'd the harbor bar,
I see the vane upon the spire blaze like a fiery star.
The town's in sight, I see the cliffs, the very street's track,
And the windows at St. Arthur's flashing all the sunlight back.

"Fred, rouse your heart for this, man! just think of mother's joy,
And of our dear blind father's pride in you, his youngest boy.
Fancy how madcap Mary in a breath will laugh and cry,
And, more than all, how one you know will greet you by-and-by.

"Nay, never look so white, man: remember when we lay
Becalm'd for five long days and nights in Trinidade's bay.
You said 'twould bring back life and strength to heart and arm once more,
Could you but feel the wind that breath'd along our own old shore.

"And now 'tis here: I smell the thyme and broom from off the down,
I see the yellow gorse that girds the hill-top like a crown.
I can not blame your weakness, boy, my tears could almost flow,
To think of nearing all we left three weary years ago.

"I'm sure they're thinking of us now with anxious hearts at home,
I warrant me they've heard long since the gallant Fire-fly's come;
And little Mary will have been, a hundred times to-day,
Begging a peep through Walter's glass, and watching on the quay.

"We'll not be half an hour at home ere Katie will be there,
Blushing like any half-blown rose, as modest as she's fair.
What! not a word or smile at that? as if I did not know
For whom you've bought the shawl and wreath you've safely stowed below.

"Hurra! we're come to anchor; I see the steamers' smoke;
A little time, and we shall sit amid our own dear folk.
Come, let me help you up, Fred, by this you're rested well."
But the cheery words and loving voice on heedless seases fell.

The sailor boy lay dead and cold upon the sunny deck,
A little lock of golden hair hung from his bended neck.
'Twas just as well—he ne'er could know that on his Katie's breast
Another's child look'd up and smiled before it sank to rest.

HON. WILLIAM PORCHER MILES, OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

W. PORCHER MILES, Esq., the Representative from the Charleston District of South Carolina, was born therein, on the Fourth of July, 1822. His ancestors for eight successive generations had been inhabitants of the Palmetto State, to which the Miles family emigrated from England when it was a loyal colony, and where they rendered good service during the struggle which resulted in establishing it as a sovereign member of the Original Confederation. His paternal grandmother was a Porcher, one of those old Huguenot families which brought the best blood of France across the ocean, and he is bound by many other strong ties of kindred and association to his home. Of that home he is emphatically a representative man. "I will act with the Democratic party," said he, about a year since, on the floor of the House, "faithfully, honestly, truly, and heartily, where I can do so conscientiously and consistently with the rights and honor of my State and section. When they call on me to depart one iota, the half of a hair-breadth, from that course, I turn my back upon them and leave them forever. Yes, Sir, I am willing to avow myself a sectional man. I come here to represent, in part, the State of South Carolina, and her rights and interests are first in my estimation, and foremost in my heart at all times."

After having acquired the rudiments of education, young Miles was placed at the celebrated academy at Willington, conducted by Dr. Waddel, a son of the preceptor and brother-in-law of John C. Calhoun. While there, he not only became well versed in the classics and mathematics, but had admirable opportunities for investigating the relation which the States and the General Government bear to each other. The great statesman of South Carolina was then proclaiming the doctrine that the General Government emanated from the people of the several States, forming distinct political communities, and acting in their separate and sovereign capacity, and not from all of the people, forming one aggregate political community. It was not to be wondered at that these views were adopted by a large majority of the South Carolinians then growing up, and these youth are now the master-spirits who control the political movements of at least fifteen States of the Confederation.

Entering the college of Charleston, young Miles was soon ranked among the most diligent students in his class, displaying a remarkable proficiency in classical studies. When he graduated he received the highest honor; and his valedictory at the commencement exercises elicited high praises from the audience, which included Lord Morpeth, now the Earl of Carlisle, who warmly congratulated the orator.

After leaving college, Mr. Miles commenced the study of law in the office of Edward M'Cready, Esq.; but after having been thus occupied about a year, he was elected Assistant Professor of Mathematics at the college of Charleston. Responding to this call to serve his alma mater, he accepted the position, and, while performing the arduous duties connected with it, continued to pursue his studies with unostentatious assiduity. The large stores of varied knowledge accumulated he has mentally digested, and retains in readiness for immediate use when occasion requires.

In August, 1855, Mr. Miles was a prominent member of that devoted band of humanitarians which left their homes in response to the Macedonian cry from the pestilence-stricken city of Norfolk, "Come over and help us!" While almost every State nobly contributed money, South Carolina also sent men! Nor is there a brighter page on her proud chronicle of the deeds of her sons than that on which is inscribed the services of Mr. Miles and his comrades at Norfolk. Their fortitude and perseverance in the prosecution of their arduous labors—the kindness and attention with which they ministered at the bedsides of the sick—and the fearless and undaunted courage manifested by them during a period of such awful solemnity and peril—all won them the heartfelt thanks of the survivors at Norfolk, and the gratitude of their fellow-citizens at home.

The people of Charleston testified their appreciation of the heroic conduct of Mr. Miles by nominating him for the mayoralty before he returned. On reaching his home he accepted this nomination, and, in the course of his remarks, he eloquently and completely vindicated himself from charges of connection with the proscriptive Know Nothing party which had been brought against him. He showed clearly that they had been based on garbled extracts from a speech delivered by him before a literary association, and fully exculpated himself from the charge brought.

Mr. Miles commenced his labors as Mayor of Charleston in November, 1855, and developed talents as an administrative officer and as a magistrate which have laid the firmest foundation for his official reputation. During the two years that he presided over the municipal government of Charleston many important reforms and changes were carried out, and new measures of merit were also inaugurated—an excellent Board of Aldermen seconding and supporting the Mayor. The financial management was also reformed, and the city government not only determined that they would "pay as they went," but they put into practical operation a scheme (originated by James G. Holmes, Esq.) for so liquidating the public debt of the city that in thirty years from that time it will have been extinguished.

Important sanitary reforms were also inaugurated, among them a system of "tidal drainage," to the successful operation of which is attributed the diminution of sickness in the subsequent summers. The police force, as reorganized by Mayor Miles, became one of the best in the country. It has a chief, two captains, six lieutenants, eighteen sergeants, and one hundred privates, with an additional force of fifty mounted men. These mounted policemen, especially recommended by Mayor Miles, are remarkably effective, and are regarded as the most valuable part of the whole system.

In 1857 the retirement of Governor Aiken, who had represented the Congressional District composed of Charleston and the surrounding parishes, induced the numerous friends of Mr. Miles to present him as a candidate. He was triumphantly elected, defeating General James Gadsden, who had been the Minister of the United States at Mexico, and also Colonel John Cunningham, an ex-editor of the American organ.

On taking his seat in the House of Representatives Mr. Miles was immediately placed upon the important Committee of Commerce, where he industriously examined the many bills and petitions referred to these guardians of the commercial interests of the country. Not only did he secure the passage of a large appropriation for completing a new custom-house at Charleston, where such a building was needed, and look after the individual interests of his own constituents who are engaged in commercial pursuits, but he carefully studied and effectively pressed the resources of the Southern States.

brought together in a smaller space, and enabled to transact business with greater facility, is the work of Mr. Miles, who proposed the change, and pertinaciously urged its adoption. He also proposed another important reform, which, if adopted, would save the country from the infliction of political essays, generally patched up by the literary Bohemians who haunt the Capitol, and palmed off on confiding constituencies as the productions of indolent or incompetent Representatives. The resolution offered by Mr. Miles provided "That hereafter no speech by any member of this House shall be published in the Daily Globe, unless it has been actually delivered in the House; and that a deduction of $50 be made from the pay of the said newspaper for every violation of this prohibition." This desirable reform was stifled by an "objection," and the mails are loaded down, as before, with speeches bought at prices ranging from twenty to one hundred dollars, and often not even read, yet published by contract as "delivered in the House of Representatives of the United States."

At the close of his Congressional term Mr. Miles was re-elected without opposition, and took his seat among the Representatives of South Carolina in the 36th Congress.

In a speech on the organization of the House, delivered a few weeks since, Mr. Miles frankly stated that the position of himself and of his political associates is simply this:

"That the Southern States, being the sole judges of what is best for their own interests, and for their own peace and security, can, whenever they choose, take their destinies into their own hands. We do not intend, therefore, to indulge in any 'bluster or bravado' as to what we can do in the event of a disruption of the Union. That is a matter that declamation, menace, rhetorical flourishes, even sober argument, will throw very little light upon; it will have to be submitted to the stern arbitrament of arms. I say that, because I believe that will be inevitable—not because the South would, in case she thought proper (in accordance with her constitutional rights) to retire from this Confederacy, desire to make war upon the North; but because we are constantly warned that, in such an event, the North would make war upon us. Yes, Sir, we are told that if we attempt to exercise our undoubted right to withdraw from this Government, in which, as sovereign States, we are peers and equals, we will be treated as revolted provinces and subjugated by force of arms! Well, Sir, the South is arming; and if she be not allowed to secede in peace, she will do it at the cost of war. She is the sole judge of the reasons which shall justify her, and the time when it will be expedient for her to break her connection with her Northern co-States. " " " When it shall become inevitable, the South will take the judgment of the tribunal of nations. She will assume her independent position among the Powers of the earth, and will know how to act afraid.' She will march on steadily to the fulfilment of her high mission, desiring the friendship of all—dreading the enmity of none. If attacked, she will be ready to face the world in arms; for Justice and Truth will be on her side, and her trust will be in the God of battles, who is likewise the God of justice and truth!"

The Huguenot origin of Mr. Miles has been mentioned; it is legibly stamped on his lineaments and exhibited in his deportment. The descendants of those gallant French Protestants have not lost the gracious worldliness of the Scotch Covenanters, or the calculating coldness of the English Puritans, or the wild enthusiasm of the Irish Presbyterians—but they have inherited the noble, the gifted, and the genial traits of la belle France, with more energy, more earnestness, and more mental ballast, than has characterized that land since the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Mr. Miles has a graceful yet manly figure—a capacious forehead, trenched with the traces of thought—a steady, impressive gaze—an honest and gracious smile lurking about the corners of his resolute lips—and the courteous manners of the old school of educated gentlemen, rare and ripe as a glass of Madeira that has stood a score or more of years in the genial temperature of Charleston.

* * * * * * *

BLACKWATER PARK, LAURENCE.

June 27.—Six months to look back on—six long, lonely months since Laura and I last saw each other!

How many days have I still to wait? Only one! To-morrow, the twenty-eighth, the travellers return to England. I am busy, hardly realizing my own happiness; I can hardly believe that the next four-and-twenty hours will complete the last day of separation between Laura and me.

She and her husband have been in Italy all the winter, and afterward in the South. They come back, accompanied by Count Fosco and his wife, who propose to settle somewhere in the neighborhood of London, and who have engaged to stay at Blackwater Park for the summer months before deciding on a place of residence. So long as Laura returns, no matter who returns with her. Sir Percival may fill the house from floor to ceiling, if he likes, on condition that his wife and I inhabit it together.

Meanwhile, here I am, established at Blackwater Park; "the ancient and interesting seat" (as the country history obligingly informs me) "of Sir Percival Glyde, Bart."—and the future abiding place (as I may now venture to add, on my own account) of Miss Marian Halcombe, spinster, now settled in a snug little sitting-room, with a cup of tea by my side, and all the earthly possessions ranged round her in three boxes and a bag.

I left Limmeridge yesterday, having received Laura's delightful letter from Paris the day before. I had been previously uncertain whether I was to meet them in London or in Hampshire; but this last letter informed me that Sir Percival proposed to land at Southampton, and to travel straight to his own country-house. He has spent so much money abroad that he has none left to defray the expenses of living in London during the remainder of the season; and he is economically resolved to pass the summer and autumn quietly on Blackwater. Laura has had more than enough of excitement and change of scene, and is pleased at the prospect of country tranquillity and retirement which the arrangement I prudence provides for her. As for me, I am ready to be happy say where in her society. We are all, therefore, well contented in our various ways to begin with.

Last night I slept in London, and was delayed there so long to-day, by various calls and commissions, that I did not reach Blackwater this evening till my day's end.

Judging by my vague impressions of the place, thus far, it is the exact opposite of Limmeridge. The house is situated on a dead flat, and seems to be shut in—almost suffocated, to my north-country notions—by trees. I have seen nobody but the man-servant who opened the door to me, and the housekeeper, a very civil person, who showed me the way to my own room, and got me my tea. It is a nice little boudoir and bedroom, at the end of a long passage on the first floor. The servants' and some of the spare rooms are on the ground floor; and all the living rooms are on the ground floor. I have not explored the house yet, and I know nothing about the house, except that one wing of it is said to be five hundred years old—that is bad a word round it once; and that it gets its name of Blackwater from a lake in the park.

Eleven o'clock has just struck, in a ghostly and solemn manner, from a turret over the centre of the house, which I saw when I came in. A large dog has been woke, apparently by the sound of the bell, and is howling and yawning drearily, somewhere round the corner. I hear echoing footsteps in the passage below, and the iron thumping of bolts and bars at the house-door. The servants are evidently going to bed. Shall I follow their example?

No. I am not half sleepy enough. Sleepy, did I say? I feel as if I should never close my eyes again. The bare anticipation of seeing that dear face and hearing that well-known voice, to-morrow, keeps me in a perpetual fever of excitement. If I only had the privileges of a man, I would order out Sir Percival's best horse instantly, and tear away on a night-gallop, eastward, to meet the rising sun—a long, hard, heavy, ceaseless gallop of hours and hours, like the famous highwayman's ride to York. Being, however, nothing but a woman, condemned to patience, propriety, and petticoats for life, I must respect the housekeeper's opinions, and try to compose myself in some feeble and feminine way.

Reading—is that the question—I can't fix my attention on books. Let me try if I can write myself into sleepiness and fatigue. My journal has been sadly neglected of late. What can I recall—standing, as I now do, on the threshold of a new life—of persons and events, of sights and sounds, during the past six months—the long, weary, empty interval since Laura's wedding-day?

Walter Hartright is uppermost in my memory; and he passes first in the shadowy procession of my absent friends. I received a few lines from him, after the landing of the expedition in Honduras, written more cheerfully and hopefully than his last letters to Laura. A month or six weeks later I saw an extract from an American newspaper describing the departure of the adventurers on their inland journey. They were last seen entering a wild primeval forest, each man with his rifle on his shoulder and his knapsack at his back. Since that time civilization has lost all trace of them. Not a line more have I received from Walter; not a fragment of news from the expedition has appeared in any of the public journals.

The most interesting and threatening obscurity hangs over the fate and fortunes of Anne Catherick and her companion, Mrs. Clements. Nothing whatever has been heard of either of them. Whether they are in the country or out of it, whether they are living or dead, no one knows. Mr. Fairlie's valet-detective has lost all hope, and has ordered the useless search after the fugitives to be finally given up.

Our good old friend Mr. Gilmore has met with a rod check in his active professional career. Early in the spring we were alarmed by hearing that he had been found insensible at his desk, and that the seizure had been pronounced to be paralysis of the first. After a long complaining of fulness and oppression in the head; and his doctor had warned him of the consequences of his habits of unbroken sedentary in continuing to work, early and late, as if he was still a young man. The result now is that he has been compelled to take a long rest out of his office for a year to come at least, and to seek repose of body and relief of mind by altogether changing the old mode of life. The business is left, accordingly, to be carried on by his partner; and he is himself, at this moment, on his way to Switzerland, in company with the settled there in mercantile pursuits. Thus another true friend and trust-worthy adviser is lost to me, for the present; but not for trust, for a time only.

Poor Mrs. Vesey—traveled with me as far as London. It was impossible to abandon her to solitude at Limmeridge after Laura and I had both left; and I have therefore arranged that she is to live with an unmarried younger sister of hers who keeps a school at Clapham. She is to come to Blackwater again to visit her pupil, I might almost say, her adopted child. I saw the good old lady safe to her destination; and left her in the midst of her relatives, quietly happy at the prospect of seeing Laura again in a few months' time.

As for Mr. Fairlie, I believe I am guilty of no injustice if I describe him as being unutterably relieved by having the house clear of us all together. He was not happy in his choice of simply preposterous—he used to let months pass in the old times without attempting to see her —and, in the case of Mrs. Vesey's, I think he leave to consider his telling us both that he was half heart-broken at our departure to be equivalent to a confession that he was secretly rejoiced to get rid of us. His last caprice has led him to keep two persons unnecessarily employed on producing sun-pictures of all the treasures and curiosities in his possession. One complete copy of the collection of photographs is to be presented to the Mechanics' Institution of Carlisle, mounted on the finest cardboard, with ostentatious red leather inscriptions underneath. "Madonna and Child, by Raphael. In the possession of Frederick Fairlie, Esquire." "Copper coin of the period of Tiglath-Pileser. In the possession of Frederick Fairlie, Esquire." "Unique Rembrandt etching. Known all over Europe as The Smudge, from a printer's blot in the corner which exists in no other copy. Valued at three hundred guineas. In the possession of Frederick Fairlie, Esquire." Dozens of photographs of this sort, and all inscribed in this manner, were completed before I left Cumberland, and hundreds more remain to be done. With this new interest to occupy him, Mr. Fairlie will be a happy man for months and months to come; and the two unfortunate photographers will share the social martyrdom which he has hitherto inflicted on his valet alone.

So much for the persons and events which hold the foremost place in my memory. What next of the one person who holds the foremost place in my heart? Laura has been present to my thoughts all the while I have been writing these lines. What can I recall of her, during the past six months, before I close my journal for the night?

I have only her letters to guide me; and, on the most important of all the questions which our correspondence can discuss, every one of those letters leaves me in the dark.

Does he treat her kindly? Is she happier now than she was when I parted with her on the wedding-day? All my letters have contained these two inquiries, put more or less directly, now in one form, and now in another; and all, on that one point only, have remained without reply, or have been answered as if my questions merely related to the state of her health. She informs me, over and over again, that she is perfectly well; that traveling agrees with her; that she is getting through the winter, for the first time in her life, without catching cold—but not a word can I find any where which tells me plainly that she is reconciled to her marriage, and that she can now look back to the twenty-third of December without any bitter feelings of repentance and regret. The name of her husband is only mentioned in her letters as she might mention the name of a friend who was traveling with them, and who had undertaken to make all the arrangements for the journey. "Sir Percival" has settled that we leave on such a day; "Sir Percival" has determined that we travel by such a road. Sometimes she writes "Percival" only, but very seldom—in nine cases out of ten she gives him his title.

I can not find that his habits and opinions have changed and colored hers in any single particular. The usual moral transformation which is insensibly wrought in a young, fresh, sensitive woman by her marriage, seems never to have taken place in Laura. She writes of her own thoughts and impressions, amidst all the wonders she has seen, exactly as she might have written to some one else, if I had been traveling with her instead of her husband. I see no betrayal any where of sympathy of any kind existing between them. Even when she wanders from the subject of her travels, and occupies herself with the prospects that await her in England, her speculations are busied with her future as my sister, and persistently neglect to notice her future as Sir Percival's wife. In all this there is no under tone of complaint, to warn me that she is absolutely unhappy in her married life. The impression I have derived from our correspondence does not, thank God, lead me to any such distressing conclusion as that. I only see a sad torpor, an unchangeable indifference, when I turn my mind from her in the old character of a sister, and look at her, through the medium of her letters, in the new character of a wife. In other words, it is always Laura Fairlie who has been writing to me for the last six months, and not Lady Glyde.

The strange silence which she maintains on the subject of her husband's character and conduct she preserves with almost equal resolution in the few references which her printed letters contain to the name of her husband's bosom friend, Count Fosco.

For some unexplained reason the Count and his wife appear to have changed their plans abruptly, at the end of last autumn, and to have left Paris, instead of going to Rome, at which latter place Sir Percival had expected to find them when he left England. They only reached Paris in the spring, and traveled as far as the Tyrol to meet the bride and bridegroom on their homeward journey. Laura writes readily enough about the meeting with Madame Fosco, and assures me that she has found her aunt so much changed for the better—so much quieter and so much more sensible as a wife than she was as a single woman—that I shall hardly know her again when I see her here. But on the subject of Count Fosco (who interests me infinitely more than his wife) Laura is provokingly circumspect and silent. She only says that he puzzles her, and that she will not tell me what her impression of him is until I have seen him, and formed my own opinion first. This, to my mind, looks ill for the Count. Laura has preserved me more perfectly than most people do in later life, the child's valuable faculty of knowing a friend by instinct; and, if I am right in assuming that her first impression of Count Fosco has not been favorable, I, for one, am in some danger of doubting and distrusting that illustrious foreigner before I have so much as set eyes on him. But patience, patience; this uncertainty, and many uncertainties more, can not last much longer. To-morrow will see all my doubts in a fair way of being cleared up, sooner or later.

Twelve o'clock has struck, and I have just come back to close these pages, after looking out at my open window.

It is a still, sultry, moonless night. The stars are dull and few. The trees, that shut out the view on all sides, look dimly black and solid in the distance, like a great wall of rock. I hear the croaking of frogs, faint and far off; and the echoes of the great clock-bell hum in the airless gain long after the strokes have ceased. I wonder how Blackwater Park will look in the daytime? I don't altogether like it by night.

285.—A day of investigations and discoveries —a more interesting day, for many reasons, than —had ventured to anticipate.

I began my sight-seeing, of course, with the house.

The main body of the building is in the form of that highly overrated woman, Queen Elizabeth. It has a ground-floor there are two stories of long galleries, with low ceilings, lying parallel with each other, and rendered additionally dark and dreary by hideous family portraits—every one of which I should like to burn. The rooms on the floor above the two galleries are kept in tolerable repair, but are very seldom used. The civil housekeeper, who acted as my guide, offered to show me over them; but considerately added that she feared I should find them rather out of order. My respect for the memory of my own petticoats and stockings infinitely exceeds my respect for all the Elizabethan bedrooms in the kingdom; so I positively declined exploring the upper regions of dust and dirt and the risk of spoiling my nice clean clothes. The housekeeper said, "I am quite of your opinion, sir, Miss" and appeared to think me one of the sensible women she had met with for a long time past.

So much, then, for the main building. Two wings are added at either end of it. The inferior wing on the left (as you approach the house) was, in a place of residence of mine by itself, and was built in the fourteenth century. One of Sir Percival's maternal ancestors —I don't remember, and don't care, which—tacked on the main building, at right angles to it, in the aforesaid Queen Elizabeth's time. The housekeeper told me that the architecture of "the old wing," both outside and inside, was considered remarkably fine by good judges. As further enlightened, I discovered that good judges could only exercise their abilities on Sir Percival's piece of antiquity by peering and missing from their midst all fear of damp, darkness, and rats. Under these circumstances, I unhesitatingly acknowledged myself to be no judge at all; and suggested that we should treat "the old wing" precisely as we had previously treated the Elizabethan bedrooms. Once more the housekeeper said, "I am quite of your opinion, Miss;" and once more she looked at me with undisguised admiration of my extraordinary common sense.

We went next to the wing on the right, which was in the way of containing the wonderful architectural jumble at Blackwater Park, in the time of George the Second. This is the habitable part of the house, which has been repaired and redecorated, inside, on Laura's account. My two rooms, and all the good bedrooms besides, are on the first floor; and the basement contains a drawing-room, a dining-room, a morning-room, a library, and a pretty little boudoir for Laura—all very nicely ornamented in the bright modern way, and all very elegantly furnished with the delightful modern luxuries. None of the rooms are any thing like so large and airy as our rooms at Limmeridge; but they are all pleasant to live in. It was positively ærial, from what I had heard of Blackwater Park, of fatiguing antique chairs, and dismal stained glass, and musty, frowzy hangings, and all the barbarous lumber which people born without a sense of comfort accumulate about them, in place of all consideration due to the convenience of their friends. It is an inexpressible relief to find that the nineteenth century has invaded the strange future home of mine, and has swept the dirty "good old times" out of the way of our daily life.

I dwelled during the morning—part of the time in the rooms down stairs, and part out of doors, in the great square which is formed by the three sides of the house, and by the lofty iron railings and gates which protect it in front. A large circular fish-pond, with some stone and an allegorical leaden monster in the middle, occupies the centre of the square. The pond is well stocked with fish and silver fish, and is encircled by a broad belt of the softest turf I ever walked on. I loitered here, on the shady side, pleasantly occupied, till luncheon-time; and, after that took my broad straw-hat and wandered out alone, in the warm lovely sunlight, to explore the grounds.

Daylight confirmed the impression which I had felt the night before, of there being too many trees about the house. The house is buried by them. They are, for the most part, young, and planted far too thickly. I suspect there must have been a ruinous cutting down of timber all over the estate before Sir Percival's time, and an agony of anxiety on the part of the new possessor to fill up all the gaps as thickly and rapidly as possible. After looking about me in front of the house, I advanced in a bee-line on my left hand, and walked toward it to test what I could discover in that direction.

On a nearer view, the garden proved to be small and poor and ill-kept. I left it behind me, opened a little gate in a ring fence, and found myself in a plantation of full-grown, pretty, winding path, artificially made, led me on among the trees, and my north-country experience soon informed me that I was approaching sandy, heathy ground. After a walk of more than half a mile, I should think, among the firs, the path took a sharp turn, the trees abruptly ceased to appear on either side of me, and I found myself standing suddenly on the margin of a very large, open space, and looking down at the Blackwater lake from which the house takes its name.

The ground, shelving away below me, was all sand, with a few little heathy hillocks to break the monotony of it in certain places. In one of these I confidently vowed to the spot on which I stood, and had been gradually wasted and dried up to less than half the size of its former size. I saw its still, stagnant waters, a quarter of a mile away from me in the hollow, separated into pools and ponds, by rising reeds and rushes, and little knolls of earth. On the farther bank from me the trees rose thickly again, and dark out the view, and cast their black shadows on the sluggish, shallow water. As I walked down to the lake I saw that the ground on its further side was damp and marshy, overgrown with rank grass and dismal willows. The water, which was clear enough on the open sandy side, where the bottom was sand black and poisonous opposite to me, where it lay deeper under the shade of the spongy banks and out reeds, clogging thickets and tangled trees. The frogs were croaking, and the rats were slipping in and out of the shallow water, like little shadows themselves, as I got nearer to the marshy side of the lake. I saw here, lying half in and half out of the water, the sun-warped top of an old overturned boat, with a sickly spot of sunlight glimmering through a gap in the trees on its dry surface, and the beginning in the midst of the spot, fantastically coiled, and treacherously still. Far and near the view suggested to me some dreary and horrible story of death and decay; and the glorious brightness of the summer sky overhead seemed only to deepen and harden the gloom and loneliness of the wilderness on which it shone. I turned and retraced my steps to the high, heathy ground; directing them a little south of my former course, that I might have a shabby old wooden shed, which stood on the outer skirt of the fir plantation, and which had hitherto been partly concealed from my notice with the wide, wild prospect of the lake.

On approaching the shed, I found it had once been a boat-house, and that an attempt had apparently been made to convert it afterward into a sort of rude lodge for sheltering inside it a fir-wood seat, a few stools, and a table. I entered the place, and sat down for a little while on the seat and put my hand on the table.

I had not been in the boat-house more than a minute when it struck me that the sound of the wind sighing through the fir-trees was echoed by something beneath me. I listened intently for a moment, and heard a low, thick, moaning sound, which seemed to come from the ground under the seat which I was occupying. My nerves are not easily shaken by trifles; but on this occasion I confess I felt a little startled —called out—received no answer—summoned back my recreant courage—and looked under the seat.

There, crouched up in the farthest corner, lay the forlorn cause of my terror, in the shape of a poor little dog—a black-and-tan spaniel. The creature moaned feebly when I looked at it and licked my hand, but showed no inclination to move from its miserable hiding-place. The poor little dog's eyes were glazing fast, and there were flakes of white froth on its mouth and jaws. The misery of a weak, helpless, dumb creature is surely one of the saddest of all the mournful sights which the world can show us. I took the poor dog in my arms as gently as I could, and contrived a sort of make-shift hammock for him with my pocket-handkerchief and my straw-hat round him. In this way I took the creature, as painlessly as possible, and as fast as possible, back to the house.

Finding no one in the hall, I went up at once to my own sitting-room, made a bed for the dog with one of my old dressing-gowns in the hall. The largest and fattest of all possible housemaids answered it, in a state of cheerful stupidity, which I should certainly have envied in a saint. The girl's fat, shapeless face actually stretched into a broad grin at the sight of the dog's misery when I showed it to her.

"What do you see there to laugh at?" I asked, as angrily as if she had been a servant of my own. "Do you know whose dog it is?"

"No, Miss, that I certainly don't." She stopped and looked down at the spaniel's inclined side—brightened suddenly with the invention of a new idea—and added, confidently, "I'm sure it's Baxter's dog, Miss."

This was almost wicked enough to wish that Baxter had shot the house-maid instead of the dog. Seeing that it was quite useless to expect this person's assistance, I sent her down stairs to get help in relieving the suffering creature at our feet, I told her to request the housekeeper's attendance, with my compliments. She went out exactly as she had come in, grinning from ear to ear. As the door closed on her she said to herself, softly, "It's Baxter's doings as they lost the footy—that's what it is."

The housekeeper, a person of some education and intelligence, thoughtfully brought up stairs with her some milk and some warm water. The instant she saw the dog on the floor she started and changed color.

"Why, Lord bless me!" cried the housekeeper, "that must be Mrs. Catherick's dog!"

"Whose?" I asked, in the utmost astonishment.

"Mrs. Catherick's. You seem to know Mrs. Catherick, Miss Halcombe?"

"Not personally. But I have heard of her. Does she live here? Has she had any news of her daughter?"

"No, Miss Halcombe. She came here to ask for news."

"When?"

"Only yesterday. She said some one had mentioned a report to her that her daughter had been seen in our neighborhood. No such report has reached us here; and no such report is known in the village when I sent to make inquiries there on Mrs. Catherick's account. She certainly brought this poor little dog with her from the country, and I saw it rot out after her when she went away. I suppose the creature strayed into the plantations and got shut. Where did you find it, Miss Halcombe?"

"In the old shed that looks out on the lake."

"Ah, yes, that is the plantation side, and the poor thing dragged itself, I suppose, to the nearest shelter, as dogs will, to die. If you can moisten its lips with the milk, Miss Halcombe, I will wash the clotted hair from the wound. I am very much afraid it is too late to do any good. However, we can but try."

Mrs. Catherick! The name still rang in my ears, as it the housekeeper had only that moment surprised me by uttering it. While we were attending to the dog the words of Walter Hartright's caution to me returned to my memory. "If ever Mrs. Catherick crosses your path make better use of the opportunity, Miss Halcombe, than I made of it." The finding of the wounded animal had led me indirectly to the discovery of Mrs. Catherick's visit to Blackwater Park; and if event enough had, in its turn, happened since, I determined to make the most of the chance which was now offered me, and to gain as much additional information as I could.

Did you say that Mrs. Catherick lived any where in the neighborhood?"

"Oh, dear no," said the housekeeper. "She lives at Welmingham, quite at the other end of the county—more than twenty miles off at least."

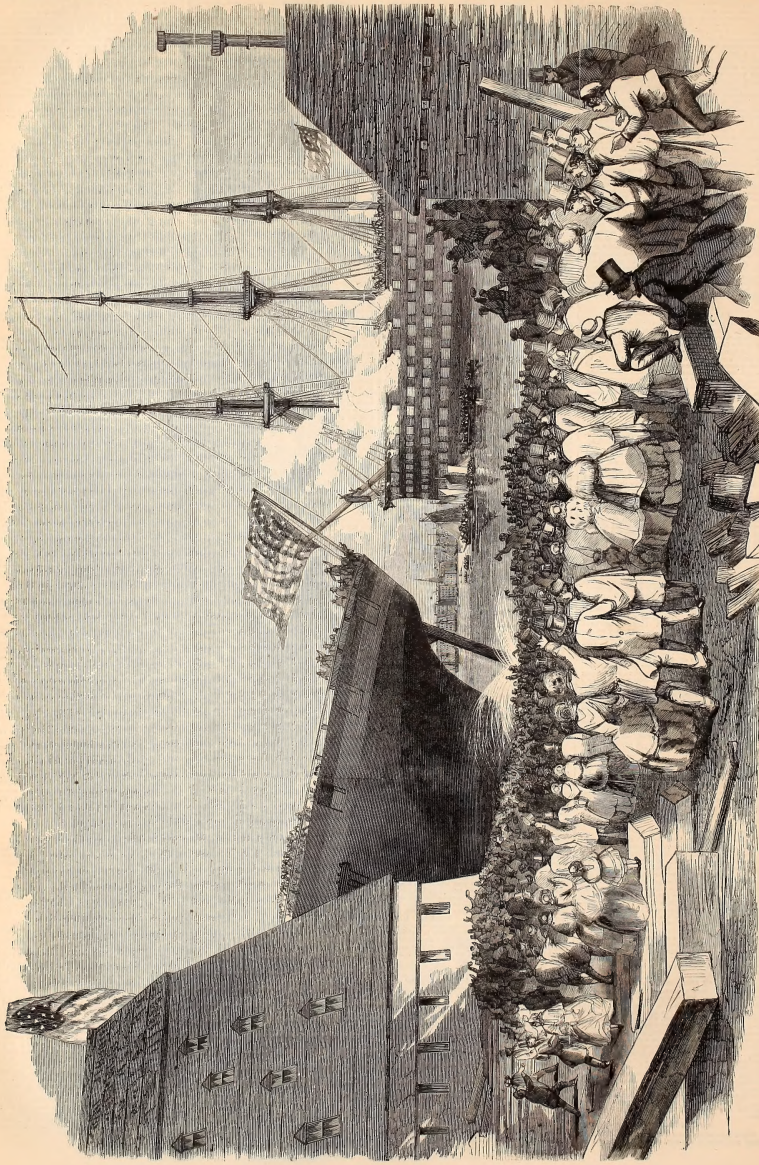
"I suppose you have known Mrs. Catherick for some years?"

"On the contrary, Miss Halcombe, I never saw her before she came here yesterday. I had heard of her, of course, because I had heard of Sir Percival's kindness in putting her daughter under medical care. Mrs. Catherick is rather a strange person in her manners, but extremely respectable indeed. She seemed sorely put out when she found that there was no foundation—none, at least, that any of us could discover—for the report of her daughter having been seen in this neighborhood."

"I am rather interested about Mrs. Catherick," I went on, continuing the conversation as long as possible. "I wish I had arrived here soon enough to see her yesterday. Did she stay for any length of time?"

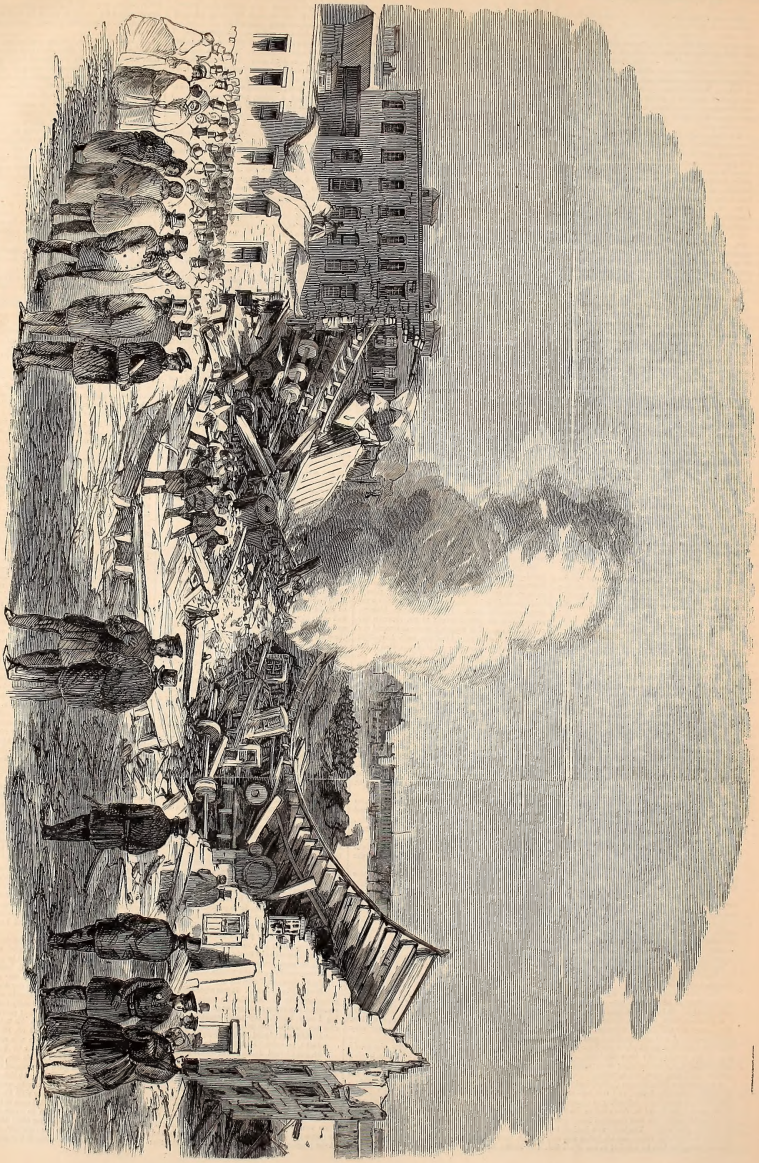
"Yes," said the housekeeper, "she staid for some time. I was sorry myself that she was remained longer, if I had not been called away to speak to a strange gentleman—a gentleman who came to ask me about the dog—who appeared to be quite a stranger to these parts. Mrs. Catherick got up and left at once, when she heard the maid tell me what the visitor's errand was. She left in a hurry, evidently that there was no need to tell Sir Percival of her coming here. I thought that rather an odd remark to make, especially to a person in my responsible situation."

I thought it an odd remark, too. Sir Percival had certainly not behaved, before, at Limmeridge, that the most perfect confidence existed between himself and Mrs. Catherick. If that was the case, why should he object to my having had a visit at Blackwater Park kept a secret from him?



Probably," I said, seeing that the housekeeper expected me to give my opinion on Mrs. Catherick's parting words; "probably she thought the announcement of her visit might vex Sir Percival to no purpose, by reminding him that her daughter was not found yet. Did she talk much on that subject?"

"Very little," replied the housekeeper. "She talked principally about Sir Percival, and asked a great many questions about where he had been traveling, and what sort of lady his new wife was. She seemed to be more interested and curious than distressed, by failing to find any traces of her daughter in these parts. "I give her up," she said to me at last, "and that I can remember; 'I give her up, ma'am, for lost.' And from that she passed at once to her questions about Lady Percival. Servant, and sad, as this



SPEECH OF SPEAKER PENNINGTON.

When the Clerk announced the election of a Speaker, Mr. Pennington, amidst a shout that went through and deafningly continued with the excited and disorderly procedings which involved every precedent, spoke as follows:

"GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:—I return you my grateful acknowledgments for the distinguished honor you have been pleased to confer upon me in electing me Speaker of this House. Coming here for the first time at the present session, I was unacquainted with the rules of order, and could have been more unprepared for the duties I should be called upon to perform than I now feel myself to be; and my friends will do me the favor to say that I have not sought this position. I feel my inferiority to many that I have seen here, nevertheless, as contrarily over as I am to the performance of this high and serious duties of dignity and labor, I should have been far better any gratification to me to have been relieved from it, and have placed but its duties here devolving the almost insurperienced hands. But in the way of an organization of the unavoidable obstacles to which I have referred, I have arrived at the conclusion that any gentleman of House, and any man, who could command a majority of the votes of the members present could have been more unprepared for the duties I should be called upon to perform than I now feel myself to be; and my friends will do me the favor to say that I have not sought this position. LAUNCH OF THE UNITED STATES STEAM CORVETTE "RICHMOND," AT NORFOLK, VIRGINIA, ON JANUARY 26, 1860.—[SEE PAGE 90.]

EXPLOSION AT AMES & MOULTON'S HAT FACTORY, BROOKLYN, NEW YORK, ON FEBRUARY 3, 1860.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

LAUNCH OF U. S. STEAM CORVETT.. "RICHMOND".

THIS fine vessel, the last of five of a similar class added to our navy, has been for months ready for the water; but not till now has the order been given to launch her. At a quarter before noon on the 26th of January she entered her destined element in splendid style, at Norfolk, Virginia, amidst the plaudits of thousands, who covered the decks of the surrounding vessels, and filled every "eligible vantage" for view at home. The ceremony of christening was gracefully performed by Misses Robb and Berryman—the latter a daughter of the distinguished engineer of the Atlantic and pioneer of the ocean telegraph.

The Richmond will not suffer in beauty of model in comparison with any of her sister ships. The following are her measurements: Length over all 220 feet; length between perpendiculars, 205 feet; extreme breadth 42; moulded ditto, 41; draught, fore and aft, 16; extreme depth from rail to keel forward, 22; amidships, 28 feet 6 inches; aft, 21 feet 6 inches; displacement at fifteen feet, 2958 tons; tonnage, by register, 1934. Her two engines have each 84-inch cylinder, and 14 inches stroke, with Martin's patent boilers and Sickels's valve. The propeller, of brass, is 14 feet in diameter. Her armament is 90, forecast 84, and mizen-mast 73 feet long; main-yard, 84 feet; and other spars in proportion. Fitted for thirty, she will mount but twenty guns, all of 9 inches. Engines and all are ready for her, and she will soon be fit for a cruise.

There are now five new steamers at the Gosport yard—gratifying evidence of Uncle Sam's awakening attention to the enlargement of his steam navy. An unprofessional man may be indulged in one reflection in this connection. One of the first wants of a new and large steamer, and, with her, there is always something in a name. Now we have never seen any explanation of the disappearance from our navy-list of many of those names which figure, and will always figure, so brilliantly in our history. Where are the Java, the Guerriere, the Wasp, the Hornet, the Chesapeake, etc., etc.? Poor substitute, indeed, the Frigolile and the Duck Rice for the tithes which are to the sailor's heart as the sound of a trumpet to the war-horse. It is a general thing, to enlist local feeling by dubbing our liners (if we ever have any) after States, frigates after rivers, and sloops after towns. But why make the rule so rigid? Why appeal so strictly to neighborhood rivalry, to the exclusion of name of national significance, and identified with national glory? England's practice is different, and here is a wide field for naval matters. The name cordiale may oblige her to ignore many of her old French prizes; but even the Frenchman will meet at her hands the Victory, the Trafalgar, and the Duke of Wellington; while with us she does not mince matters in the least. Our once-despised "line-built frigate," the Chesapeake and the Peacock, are carefully perpetuated. The Chesapeake if we mistake not, was prominent in the late Chinese engagement, her alliance in which was solicited. As our gallant Commodore glanced at her flag, he must have given the adage, "blood is thicker than water," a mental interpretation rather different from that it ordinarily bears.

EXPLOSION OF A STEAM-BOILER IN BROOKLYN.

WE engrave on the preceding page the explosion of the hat-factory of Ames & Moulton, in Brooklyn, New York, which took place on 3d inst. The explosion occurred at about 7.30 A.M. The loss of life already ascertained is six killed and fifteen injured, many of them mortally.

The factory is situated from Nostrand Avenue, near Myrtle, to Sanford Street. The main structure is 150 feet long and 25 feet wide, with a building at right angles, on the east side, 50 feet square—with buildings of brick, and three stories high. The boiler was on the ground-floor of the main building.

The precise cause of the explosion can not be definitely ascertained, as the engineer is killed. It is supposed, however, that the water-pipes were frozen, and, a large fire being built, steam generated so quickly as to cause the catastrophe. The engine-room and the centre of the main structure are a mass of ruins.

The noise of the explosion was heard a mile distant, and the force that the houses in the neighborhood shook to their foundations. A portion of the boiler was impelled a distance of 250 feet.

A general fire alarm was rung, and the firemen and police were promptly on the ground and commenced tearing away the rubbish. They encountered in extricating all who were supposed to be underneath. The dead have been taken into the sitting department, where all were recognized up to noon, except one. The injured were taken to their residences or to hospital.

The bodies of the five men who were killed were laid together in the planing room, where they were identified by their friends.

About two hundred persons were employed in the building, of which from fifty to seventy-five were females. As long some time before the hour to commence work, but few, comparatively, were here when the catastrophe occurred. Five girls [illegible] and many perhaps thirty men and boys. Had the explosion taken place one hour later the loss of life would have been frightful. Dozens were approaching the building from different directions, and some were just entering.

A young man John Hughes (Gilliel) had applied for work some days before, and was told to come this (Friday) morning. According to engagement he reported himself and sat down before the boiler to warm his feet. He was launched into eternity a moment afterward. The body was bruised into an indistinguishable mass, and his father was only able to recognize him by a defect in one of his feet.

A BROTHER'S STORY.

MAGGIE and I—sister and brother—were alone in the world. Father and mother had sought the spiritual life, leaving us here without a friend to whom we could lay the claim of kin. Father had been stricken in high health and robustness—cut off as the scythe cuts the stout stem. Mother—gentle, sensitive, frail—had lain down her life after, with that quiet releasing of grasp through which death has robbed many of sleep. We were quite alone—Maggie and I.

She was but a child—only fifteen. I was just within the shadow of twenty-one. We leaned toward each other entirely now—clasped our hands closer, and loved one another more fondly than ever before. Not that the former love was less, but this was greater

Another shadow came creeping over us. I was becoming blind. First a lessening of the glare of light and a dimness of vision; then indistinctness of outline; then confusion of objects; then—total chaos. Beneath the pressure came the earth sinks away all its forests and hills and cataracts are gone, till at last black clouds envelope me, and I lie in her indefinite and illimitable space. So to me it seemed that life was gliding away, leaving nothing but existence—a dreamless sleep.

Extinguish the light in your drawing-room of an evening, and after the first dense blackness will come creeping into view the faint outlines of objects—until, and then the lesser objects, till, in a little time, not many of them will be lost to you. So from the fear entire extinction of the material sense of sight, came gradually back, through other avenues, the same sweet scenes of life—veiled, it is true, in a veil of pleasantness, and scarcely less rich in suggestion than before.

As I have said, Maggie, when I lost sight of her, was not fifteen. She was a child. Nothing in her estimate beauty. Mentally mature, but in form and feature unperfected. A brunette, I remember here, in my blindness, that her hair was very smooth and black; her forehead not massive, but finely chiseled and suggestive; her eyes soft and brown; her outline was the distinguishing feature of my sister Maggie. It could never be painted. Even the finest touch of the artist is but a coarse light. Looking into her eyes, you looked into depths—floating, viscid crystals—black, cool, black, infinite, mellow, soft, profound. Such was the compass of a glance. I have seen eyes nearly dry —so void of liquidity as to suggest artificial lubrication; but Maggie's eyes whispered a thought in swimming. And yet my sister had not been called beautiful. Nor was she: there was not harmony between the features to be so considered.

I had always thought that the subsiveness of woman, her clinging nature, involved the sense of need—need of protection. I felt that I was never more helpless—who so helpless as a blind man?—my Maggie clung closer and closer. Protection! I was ashamed of my own selfishness. Maggie was the oak, and I the ivy.

Maggie used to me from the first words that we loved—each with the natural voice and most varied intonation. I verily believe that her soul-reading gave me more of the blessing of sight than it could possibly have caught had my own eyes wandered along the lines. Poetry, romance, history, art, politics, all were brought to me in noble, deep, musical tones. The morning paper enlivened our little breakfast-table. After the early household duties, Maggie ran to me, and asked me "the heavy reading of the day." After dinner, romance After that, poetry. At the tea-table, the evening paper. By candle-light, "Shirley." Between whiles she talked to me, or, with a sister's delicate tact, gave me time to muse when the mood was on, remembering that I could not take the pictures of color and form through retrospective musings.

Maggie's power of description was either originally great, or else her habit of word-painting for my benefit and pleasure wrought wonders. She could give me clear pictures of the scenes and objects: even painting and statuary were reproduced, and delicate shades of mood and curve of outline were almost as present to my inner sense of sight as in days gangrene.

Maggie became to me in the street, taking my arm as naturally as though I had not lost vision, and leading me thus. She learned to drive fearlessly, and thus gave me the full luxuriation of carriage-motion and the perfume of meadows and orchards.

Maggie took the place of light: saw for me; made me happy in spite of my stupendous loss. And she was as happy as I.

As months and years ran by, making her more and more necessary to me, accustomed to the thought of losing her would spring upon me, watched by this reflection: "She is not beautiful, and can not be won, perhaps, by any but a blind man like me." Thus the thoughts would rise and be pushed away. But often when, as the evening clo'd, she would throw herself into my arms, and sob out her sleepiness—Maggie was always full of both vivacity and drowsiness—I felt that I was dearer to her other Maggie than the angular school-girl of my days of vision: and when, passing my hand up to her face, I found her cheeks rounded and symmetrical, touched her full lips, and brushed the long lashes, and when I toyed with her fingers, measured her throbbing wrist, and felt the beautiful contour of her arm, my heart would sink a little. How could I help it? I hope I was not very wicked.

But when I hinted such a possibility, she would press her soft hand upon my lips, and, imprisoning my words, give wings to her own, and tell me over and over again that never, never, never could she be so happy as now, "queen of our little sitting-room, with such a brother to care for." Dear Maggie! Young men came often to call on me—to whom she would chat with so [illegible] heart as to set me quite at my ease. But what does a woman know of the life before her?—or a man either, for that matter?

Maggie became less airy and rollicking. Not sad; only about her seemed to float a silvery cloud—a veil, dream-like envelope; her step seemed changed from the sparkling dancer to the soft Italian. She was even more tender than before gained her hand almost unconsciously now, and laid her cheek more carefully upon mine.

One day a stranger called—a stranger to me. I knew the approaching step to be new long before the bell had begun to tinkle. The tread was regular and firm. A deep, rich voice uttered the salutations and the name of Jesse introduced the hand that I grasped met mine with a manly pressure. Maggie joined in the conversation, but the tone was changed. A little shyness—more liquid tone. I knew then that the depths of her woman nature had been stirred, and that her heart, like the Nile, was overflowing. Yet I felt that, a second time, I had lost my sight! After the shock that comhad gone me strength to bear it wi.ingly.

Days, weeks, months of time had come I called her to me, and, pressing her to my heart, opened the whole mystery to her. She knew it before I spoke—and told her that I gave her willingly to the stranger. Putting her hand upon my forehead —that hand of indescribable size and softness—I said, "I shall not see you. He can not come o us; I must not go to him." I expostulated; she was firm. It spoke the emotions of love and, trembling like a l af the while, gave precedence to love and duty. It was all in vain. The "stranger" went to his home, and I knew then, for the months which followed, Maggie and he were, in a sense, together.

A year had departed. Maggie and the "stranger" had sustained their waiting betrothal, but there was no change in her purpose. One morning in January of that year I went into the chu ter of my eyes. I felt upon my knees, prayerfully, and without the power to rise. As days and weeks went by, I felt light returning to my eyes gradually. Oh, how I prayed for the gift of actual vision!—less for my own sake than for Maggie's, while I kept the revelation in my heart, though it seemed ready to burst with the imprisoned joy. The outlines of objects came to me—then shapes, and last. I saw Maggie, the beautiful, queenly Maggie was pictured a thousand times before she had suspected that I had the blessing restored to sight.

I can not tell how I broke the sweet news, for I do not know. I remember tears, rubbings, smiles, caresses, laughter, and then—

The "stranger" came again. And when, at length, Maggie threw her arms about me with her joyous "Good-by," I could whisper a thought in my ear which made it, she said, almost easy to leave me. But no matter about that.

The marriage-day arrived and had been wrought, under God, through the skill of a young oculist in whose hands I had placed myself, enjoining strict secrecy, lest Maggie's love be lifted upon a wave of hope only to be dashed down again.

OUR PET.

THE way we became possessed of Our Pet was this. The uncle with whom I and my brother and sister live is fond of pets. He has a splendid dog, a pig, had a grand fondness for animals, and brought us up in the same praiseworthy sentiments. He has some rare birds in the stable, five poodle-dogs, and a proportionate variety of cats; and we loved them all dearly; but a feeling had somehow arisen among us, and needed to be repressed, that the family happiness was incomplete without a monkey. How to get one was the difficulty, for my uncle would not have a "nasty, mischievous monkey," who wore kilts, and had no manners; and a gentlemanlike monkey, accustomed to good society, was not easily found. At last, a lady living a few miles off, wrote to offer my uncle hers, as it had grown so intolerably mischievous she could keep it in house. Nothing daunted by the pleasing character awarded to it, my uncle cheerfully accepted the gift. Jacko arrived, was duly ad mired, petted, and put to bed in the stable, the warmth of which he seemed greatly to enjoy. Next morning my maid came to dress me, looking very much as if she had just been on board a steamboat in very rough weather.

"What is the matter, Jane?" said I.

"The monkey, miss," said she. "He's a walgur beast. I can't abear him."

"What has he done?" said I.

"Done, miss?" said she. "If you'll believe me, he's a setin' on the door-step a eatin' a live snail for his breakfast. I do."

It didn't sound nice, certainly; but hunger brings us acquainted with strange mouth-fellows; and I supposed the poor thing hadn't been properly taken care of; so I hurried down stairs, and found him chained to the rather in the dining-room, and the servants waiting for prayers. My uncle began to read a chapter. Jacko, finding it dull sitting there, with nobody noticing him, and nothing to do, began to pull at the tail of the black poodle lying near him on the hearth-rug, just to see how he would like it—as a pleasant way of beginning an acquaintance.

"Gro-o-o-o!" said the poodle.

"Jacko, be quiet," said my uncle.

"Hauuk!" said Jacko. It was a peculiar sound, something like a growl, that he made; unlike the peevish cry of a monkey, and very creditable during I ever heard. My uncle went on with the chapter. Jacko gave another sly pull.

"Grooooo-o-o!" said the poodle.

"Jacko, be quiet," said my uncle.

"Hauuk!" said Jacko; but finding that, for some inexplicable reason, my uncle did not intend to send a cook at hi head, he amused himself during the remainder of prayers by pulling steadily at the dog's tail, hand-over-hand, just as a sailor pulls at a rope, eliciting melodious music from the unhappy dog, angry, but perfectly useless ejaculations from my uncle, and a series of choking fits from the astonished household, who could hardly be expected to view such an exhibition unmoved. After prayers my uncle observed that he "r ither though " would settle Master Jacko to-morrow." From that time forward, during prayer-time, he w s always chained, rain or shine, to the door-steps, where, when he had once beheaded every flower within his reach, he could do no more mischief beyond vociferating himself hopelessly with live snails.

But on return to his first day among us. After breakfast at which he got a great deal more cream than his fair share, he was turned loose into the garden, being evidently tame enough. He wisely awoke enough to his own interests not to wander far from the house. Before luncheon he was brought in and chained again to the dining-room. The table was already laid, and the servant went to fetch the meat. Crash—crash—crash! In ran my uncle, and found Jacko with one of the fireirons like Mariou, among the ruins of Carthage, surrounded by broken glass and china, knives and forks, bread, butter and all rich mixed up promiscuously, and still holding in his hand the corner of the tablecloth, which he had pulled and pulled till down it came, with all its contents, on the floor. He got a tolerably sound thrashing for this exploit, but he did not seem overly sorry. My uncle m ant the table was relaid he began to cheat for his beer; and nobody could have any luncheon in peace till he got it. After luncheon he was turned out again to wander at his own sweet will in the garden, and I went to my music-l son. Presently the cook came to my door in great fright, and—e, in at the door, and asked me to come and k to her in the passage. I went.

"If you please, miss" said she, with ominous politeness, "what would you pl..se horder for dinner?"

"Dinner?" said I, helplessly: "didn't my uncle order dinner before he went out t.

"Yes, miss," said she, "he hordered it; but 'ow am I to get it, miss, when there's Mike outerwalkin', while that hanimal is a-roaring and a-vampag' ..ab-t? He come into the kitchen ten minutes a.o, of course we runn'd away, along of being frightened: and when we come back if h 'adn't been a-writin' on the mantel-piece with the 'ot poker, and 'ad a soup; and he's heat up the pie, and a flask of oil, and a pot of potatoun, and 'blister; and now he's a-hairing of 'imself in the t p of 'e 'ouse with your music-master's hat."

"Oh, Kitty," said I, clapping my hands, "if your master should hear you! Where is the dear to Jacko to bring the hat down again or not, that when Mr. Mellon said, "My dear young lady, you are playing wrong. What is the matter?" "Please ma'am?" I looked at it seriously, and said in monkey" instead of "a minute."

Shall I ever forget that meek little man's face when, on going away, he asked for his hat, and was informed by our Jacko, with the utmost gravity, that "the monkey had took'd it to the top of the 'ouse, Sir; but they've sent for a chimbley-sweep to get it down."

That functionary arrived in due time, and got the hat. I waited for Jacko in the garden with a cane of shrewish and forcible rotundity; and while he was drinking it, being rather exhausted with the excitement he had gone through, he allowed me to put the chain on, and I led him quietly away.

Monkeys certainly have very strong likes and dislikes. There is a particular style of person they can not endure. My uncle George's son is one of these Parishs of monkey civilization. No monkey who ever came across her could endure her for a moment, and least of all Jacko, though she is generally considered a pretty enough sight to look upon. However engrossing his occupation might be—whether he was eating his dinner, or going to sleep after it on my lap, or tossing the dogs, or pretending to be asleep in order to catch some of the tangled forests of their long curly hair—it was all the same—the moment she appeared he was dressed with a mischievous alacrity, and made a frantic dash at her as far as his chain would allow; then, when he found he really could not get at her, he rose to his feet on the wood-rstrut on the fender, and execute a war-dance among the fire-irons, grinning his teeth, rolling his eyes, flinging wild yells at her, and shaking his fists, and saying, as plain as monkey could speak, "She makes me sick; do, do take her away." She never provoked him in any other way: on the contrary, she was studiously deferential and timidly polite to him; and I dare say that was partly the reason why he behaved so ill; for I think monkeys are rather like lovers—a little wholesome severity, not to say harshness, is good for them, and keeps them in their proper place.

One morning my uncle, coming down to breakfast, was greeted by Jacko with an excessive urbanity and overacted delight that he guessed there must be something wrong; and, looking sharply round the room to see that there was no butter on the table, and that Jacko held one hand carefully behind his back. My uncle slowly advanced, eyeing him stealthily; Jacko, loudly professing how charmed he was to see him that particular day of all days in the year, still kept his hand behind his back. My uncle came close up, still eying him fixedly. Jacko, seeing there was no help for it, with a look bundled up from the butter into the grate, crossed his hands in his lap, and sat smilingly serene, as a good man roused from peaceful slumber. "Jacko, you sha' be licked!" said my uncle. He understood perfectly, and in his terror made such a horrible clutter with his chain among the fire-irons that my uncle began to imagine him, that he might thrash him in peace and comfort. But Jacko was too quick for him; the moment he was free he sprung up the chimney, and sat singing in the draught. His triumph was short. He for got he had a tail; and my uncle, cautiously putting his hand up the chimney, caught the tip of that tail, and brought him down, squalling and struggling, to receive his deserved punishment. Another time we found the breakfast-room so full of feathers that we thought some body must have been plucking a goose there; but it was only Jacko, who had contrived to reach one of the sofa-pillows, and had been unzipping it for his amusement. It was a great satisfaction to our feelings when he nearly choked himself with two or three feathers that had got into his throat; and then he glided instinctively at us, as if we had done it!

Things went on in this way for some months—Jacko perpetually getting into scrapes, and perpetually being forgiven—when a change came o'er the spirit of the family dream. It was arranged that we should go and pay a visit to my brother, the clergyman. Jacko was to go, too, for change of air.

Well, we went to see my brother. Never shall I forget that day's journey. We woke and found ourselves at Exeter. It seemed as though the intelligence of our approach with our queer retinue was telegraphed along the line before us; for whatever station we alighted at, we instantly became the centre of a group of admirers. Jacko's admirers consisted entirely of boys of every age and degree of respectability, from mamma's darling with blue eyes and curly hair, going home for the holidays, in his best jacket and trousers, to the sedate urchin of the parish. Big and little, they crowded round like bees, fluttering their noses against the hamper that contained Jacko, though there was nothing to be seen but two eyes that glittered like burning coals. However, it seemed to afford them unlimited satisfaction; and I heard one fellow in low say, in a most attack whisper, to a small confederate, "There's the ladies as belongs to the monkey!"

"The longest day, live till to-morrow, will have passed away." This trying day was over at last, and we arrived at my brother's village. Jacko was received in any thing but a flattering manner. As he was being taken out of his hamper at the door, a parrot, swinging in its cage opposite, bristled up all its feathers at him, and screamed out, "Get out, you snuff!" Jacko, a true philosopher, was no more depressed by this underrated contumely than he had been elated by the triumphs of the morning. "Hunk!" said he, and devoured all the sal-volatile people he could reach, while waiting for a more substantial supper. Presently my brother's dog, the most sagacious creature I ever saw, came out to meet us. It was curious to watch his astonishment at the sight of Jacko; he walked round and round him, sniffing; then gravely sat down on his haunches, to examine him at leisure; then gently bit the end of his tail, to see what he was made of, seeming to say, "I'm sure very odd; you are the oddest thing I ever saw" but I am smooth here, and as long as you don't bite I don't mind you." A loud scream from Jacko putting his head quite fearlessly down the dog's enormous throat, and bullying him in every way, at last drove a human being.

Jacko soon signalized his arrival at the rectory by coming out in quite a new light—as a moral reformer. He prevailed upon an old woman to go to church, who had withstood every description of clerical battery for years. No amount of blankets, or pounds of tea, or persuasion, could induce her to set foot inside the church. Once I went to her, armed with tea and sugar and a convincing tract, but bored her to such a degree that at last she turned upon me. "Don't tell me. Young man, you go to church to shew that bunnary; it's far to go to sleep. I'se sleep varmer here." And finding secretly guilty of a certain new bonnet trimmed with blush-roses, I thought of that, but took rush in where angels fear to tread: Jacko succeeded where many a curate had failed. When God Friday came round, all the village went to church except this old woman and Jacko, who, prowling up the street, spied some hot cross-buns in her window for sale. They did not remain there long; and he settled himself comfortably on her pump-handle to enjoy his feast. Presently the old dame came out to get some water, and seeing Jacko, broke down in a fit. When restored to consciousness by her neighbors, she solemnly assured them that she had with her own eyes seen the devil sitting on her pump, eating hot cross-buns. "Naw, dame, naw," said Jacko Tatlett, pork-butcher and parish to the village; "it couldn't ha' been the devil there's sean; t' devil would ha' been afeared to eat hot cross-buns; they'd burn his mouth for him. I must ha' sean a creter very like the devil, what parson's sisters play wi'." "Eh, man," returned the irritated dame, "thee thinks a the devil's fools but thysen. Dost think I don't know the devil when I sees un?" And nothing would persuade her but that she had seen the old gentleman himself, and that he would certainly come again "to fetch her," unless she mended her ways. Accordingly, she came regularly to church for a day or two after, and from that day forth Jacko was known in the village as the young ladies' devil.

Now there is a confidence that I wish to make to an enlightened public. I will tell the truth, humiliating though it may be to me or hers. Jacko didn't marry; and he didn't die; he "emigrated," which is polite English, I believe, for describing the fate of people who "leave their country for their country's good;" who are transported, in short. His tricks were so incessant, and so very mischievous, that he kept the village in a perpetual state of hot water, besides earning for my brother an unenviable notoriety as the "parson what kept the devil." So it was settled in family conclave that he must be parted with; and though I could then guess what the feeling of Brutus must have been when he sacrificed his son, I was forced to submit. A friend sailing for the West Indies agreed, as a favor, to take him with him; and we have never heard of Jacko since.

CROFUT ON SKATES.

THERE they were, all bundled into a four-horse sleigh, waiting for me, shouting for me to "Come down, Crofut!" It was "Our Skating Club," of which I was Secretary and Treasurer, and my Atalanta was among them; but, although I had been waiting for them, I didn't rush with joy to the window to say, "Coming!" I wanted to go, and I dreaded to go. The fact is—let me confess it in my first paragraph—I am a very bad skater! Indeed, I may say that I am a miserable skater. I never should have joined the club if Atalanta hadn't said, "Do, Charley—I mean, Mr. Crofut." I wanted to go because she was going—a good reason, you'd say, if you knew her; and I didn't want to go, because all the skill of hers made me fear mine. Whenever I fall, which is frequently, they laugh; they say they are sorry for me, but that they can't help laughing. Banks, of Dorne, is the only person particularly sorry for me, aggravatingly sorry; tells me to "Toddle up!" in a patronizing, gentle, encouraging way, that makes me strong enough to bite his head off; but I know it would only make the matter worse to betray my angry resentment by such means. Then there's Helen, of Troy, the tall, the thin, the neatly yet blandly sarcastic Miss Helen, who delights to extract from me, as from Banks, which she means to have hit me. Is there any creature more peculiarly hateful than a smart, spiteful, jealous woman? Helen is jealous of Atalanta, and Atalanta, who owns forty lady admires; as my dear friend Banks knows full well, when he comes to fit, every time a new rival is in the "her Highness." Banks don't attempt it off the ice, but there he knows he can safely snub me, and I submit simply because I like to keep up. Is that she encourages him! Oh no; she's an angel!

The sleigh was open and omnibus. Atalanta sat at the entrance, in a handsome habit-shirt, and with one of her winning smiles remarried, "Here's room!"—simple words, but capable of such interpretation both blissful and dreadful and hopeful for the future.

Five and a half miles of unalloyed joy! Banks and Helen sat nearest the driver, and we were sheltered from them by a dozen of merry-makers. The vehicle was so crowded that the drivers hung on; this, our fact were temptingly contiguous; wolf-skins protected us, under cover of which my angel allowed me to clasp her hands. She smiled upon me and said, How glad she was I came! She encouraged me, Let them teave, I should have rival the Banks! She was so graciously she managed to be so personally kind, and yet to be joining all the while in the general glee. I feared it was too much to hope for. Friends, I have since surmised that the other couples might have been similarly engaged. Omnibus-sleighs, and wild shouting and laughing generally, are not a general, but only superficial, merriment, which overfloats an undertow(e) of private and particular attraction.

Under these ameliorating circumstances I forgot past failures and disgraces, forgave my enemies, and felt kindly disposed even to the whole human race. I even looked forward to future successes: the time would come when I should no longer distrust the treacherous ice—when I should feel the time would come when—" Ah! blissful when!"—when I could claim the right to clasp that slender waist Banks had I pressed in mine, perennially, not slyly, as now, under cover, but openly, in the sight of all men—especially of Banks and Helen.

But now we were nearing the lake, and there came over me a sense of the transitory nature of human bliss. I saw the glittering surface of it—a sleighing time, and how fleetly it flies! I clung to the rupturous present with a closer grasp of that little hand; and then I looked at the skates which we are! There it is!" I did not look up, but I saw in mind that cheerless expanse of ice—miles of it—and myself upon it, with Banks and Helen, grew cold at heart, the while I tried to chatter as smile as my contribution to the general rejoicings. Then I looked down at my feet (trust Jem Ickes' Scene of awkward trials and ridiculous failures, of sprains and strains, of lumps and thumps, of sneers and tears—ever to be dreaded by the real actor), kept the silent tere there, in vexation at my invincible awkwardness.

My frame of mind was become so frigid that I could hardly lighter my lips into a smile, when my Atalanta, unprovoked by any look of mine, with radiance in her eyes, and her skates in her hands, said,

"Help me buckle 'em on?"

This was indeed a gleam of sunshine. She had never asked me before. Always that hateful Abraham, Banks, performing menial offices of all matters, had contrived to secure the doing of the delightful task. Now it was mine; and I bestowed a lingering care upon the task of it.

Oh, dainty, dainty boots! Oh, ankles round and small! Painters and poets may rave of that rich bottom line "of beauty and of joy," and cut to my ee no line of beauty so perfect, so enchantingly beautiful, as that which marks the upper edge of blacken kid and the lower edge of snowy stocking!

"That you shall be off and away! Would that McLean might see her, and catch with his fine pencil-point her symmetries of shape and motion! Her, and with consummate skill, the gay glides about, skimming the surface like a yacht before the wind. Muff, and skating-jacket, and closely-fitting hood give her an appearance of roundness with which the undulations of her flowing skirt make graceful contrast. Her colors, too—scarlet and gray, with segments of "Balmoral," and glimpses of something brightly white beneath—I grow selfish as I am charmed by them, and would have no other eyes than mine enjoy their daziement.

Now she increases the speed of her flight. Her skate-irons ring as she spurns the humming ice. With the swiftness and grace of a bird she glances along.

Now slowly she circles her course, and returns, leaning, with alternate swervings, from side to side —scanning "the poetry of motion" with smooth Iambic rhythm. She comes nearer and nearer; I can see the roses on her cheeks, and the smile she is bringing me. She sweeps a circuit, and rounds to at my landing, exclaiming, between breaths,

"I know you're true that Helen can beat me!"

"Say!" I could say nothing. I was speechless. Had my thoughts found words, I should first, I think, have subjected the Helen lament to the thick ice of my scorn, and then have offered my Atalanta my heart and hand, my fortune and for-east, my gloves, skates—every thing. In spirit, I dashed out to meet her; in body, I stood still, though my very shoes seemed impatient to be about to pace them, and slipped unevenly forward. So I was silent—wisely postponing my "yep," hoping for opportunity to be more powerfully upon every "yep;" for suppose I had slipped and tripped, or had stumbled and tumbled! Think of it!

"Come," she said, "let's go out and join the rest. Give me your hand!"

"No, thank you," I replied. "I was just thinking of offering you mine, and, but for this grave impose. (How charmingly she blushed!) I'm going off to practice by myself."

So she spoke kindly and encouragingly, and I thanked her with all my heart, and she sailed away. Then I struggled off alone to a distant, quiet bay, and began my old experiments in bifurcation.

Veals! I am at practice! I remember the "spread-eagle" wherein Banks excels, and am performing a humble imitation. Yet I fear to attempt it, lest my inexperience shall be re-united by twin-born Londoners; as they separate in venturous essay, I trust only in the strength of my tailbone. Down it comes! Sole falls me, then inevitably a dissolution of the union.

Viva! I have spread—not the eagle, but Crofut. Shall I attempt it again? Shall I advertise it? May I attain the joy of displaying to her the successful result of a determined, heroic effort in her behalf and mine?

Courage, mon enfant!

I DID!

With quadrupedal exertions I regain the perpendicular, and I resolve to attempt, in future, only the simpler experiments. I will at least practice outside edge. Courage! Corraggio! Never say die!—I struggle, I straddle, I gesticulate unmeaningly, I slide backward, and I come upon seated dull, I trip at nothing, and fall at full length.

My utter disgust with myself is not at all mitigated as I see Banks approaching me many invisible of my friends and hear their cheerful voices. I can distinguish them by their colors, and as I try to identify them I grow clearly! It is that hateful skating with my Atalanta, hand to hand, face to face! Are they waving their arms in the Spanish dance? Here they come over my slimness! Banks—he—but no, she's an angel. And yet she can not but prefer his easy skill to my stiff clumsiness. Say, I say! I will not! What would I not give to be among them, inferior to none, superior, even by only a little, to that baleful Banks!

Say! I say! I will! I will! I remain behind me the swift strokes of an approaching skater, and turning around, saw, close at hand, a youth of sweet aspect, who seemed to be hurrying me down; but he stopped, miraculously, yet so near me that we stood face to face. He was a youth with a trifle of the hauteur in expression, for I was not pleased to find my chosen retreat invaded by a stranger, but the fellow spoke so kindly and sweetly.

"Hope I don't intrude," he said; "the pond belongs to the town, I b'lieve."

"No intrusion at all, sir, before I had well ended the sentence he was off like a shot, and I forgot my brief annoyance as I gazed at his superb skating. A "crooked" boy, plainly, his aggressive garments giving view of stark wrists and blue stockings, but he could skate! His speed was amazing, absolutely. I could not, must, couldn't hold a candle to him. And when he came nearer, as if willing to display himself, I looked with wonder at the perfection of his skill. Then, with graceful movements, what sweeps and curves, what bold, far-reaching strokes to right and left! And then his marvelous dexterity in the fanciful delineations of his monogram and curly-q's, his lettering, from A to Ampersand! Then his utterest ease and confidence as he folded his arms was, and so was the horse and sleigh. I hardly waited for her leave, but, hanging into the barn, stirred up the sedate animal within in a summary manner (considering the season), and had him "tackled in" before he well knew what it all meant. The sleigh—have you never seen a Connecticut country sleigh of the antique pattern? Then I can't describe the vehicle, I'm in a hurry.

"Gee up, Dobbin!"

And Dobbin geed up rather. No road to the edge of the lake, and the crusted snow two or three feet deep, you can fancy what a hillowy ride I had. But once on the ice, and I soon learned the capacities of my animal. He knew oats; we weren't long in arriving at the scene of disaster.

That ride home! That ride home! Fleta went with us—a cousin of Atalanta's—and took care of the sufferer. I drove, as Dobbin could testify had he power to tell. Yet I often looked over my shoulder at that dear, patient pale face, and received, as often as I looked, a smile which— There is difficulty in rendering smiles into English, do you know? So small a percentage of my readers, however, will fail to understand exactly what might properly follow the "which" which antecedes the dash above, that I won't trouble myself with an attempt at translation. A smile in Kamschatcan means the same precisely as a smile in Patagonian. Dialects differ, but the lingua d'amore is the same the world over.

Do you know, my reader, the beatific loveliness of the smile which conquers pain and lightens up the pallor of a sufferer's face? Then you can appreciate the happiness with which I applied the whip-cord to Dobbin's back between the brief intervals of retrospect: you can sympathize with me; you will not be in the least surprised to read the necessary denouement of my essay upon "Skates:"

We are married.

ST. VALENTINE'S MORNING, 1860.

ST. VALENTINE'S MORNING.

OUR lady readers will be glad to have the above pretty picture, which tells the story of St. Valentine's morning. We are not going to inflict upon them, after the manner of historical journalists, a strictly classical and accurate account of the institution of St. Valentine, with a biographical sketch of the worthy old presbyter, St. Valentine himself, who never did any thing that should have rendered him an object of anxious solicitude to virgins and youths, but rather on the contrary, by getting himself beheaded, set them an example which they will do wisely to avoid. Every body who read Harper's Weekly last year and the year before (and where is the civilized person who did not?) learned all that is good and requisite to know about valentines and St. Valentine's day. We shall therefore content ourselves by directing our fair readers' attention to the engraving; to the sweet young lady who, so calm and unmoved that she can not surely be in love, is receiving a most expensive valentine from the roguish child in the centre of the block, and does not dream of the arrow which the rascal Cupid is aiming at her from his invisible heights; to the bad boys who are peeping through the door to see how the girls like their valentine; to the fair lady's-maid of the olden days of chivalry, who is handing her mistress's valentine to her lover—who, for obvious reasons, receives it on the point of his lance; to the affected misanderies of the marquis of Louis the Fourteenth's age, kneeling, with anxious and excited face, at his charmer's feet.

If it be necessary to add any thing, we would draw their attention to the following new and appropriate lines:

CUPID'S COURT.†

A youth before Cupid at court once was brought,
Saith the Judge, "What's the reason of this?"
"Be merciful, Judge; I stealing was caught,"
"Caught stealing?" "Yes; stealing a kiss."

"Confessed then the fault!" spoke sternly the Judge,
"Let us see what the Scriptures have said:
'An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth,'
For a kiss no penalty's laid."

"The Scriptures your law?" in joy the youth cried;
"Their judgment I'll gladly obey;
'Tis one wound for a wound, one stripe for a stripe,'*
But 'the thief seven-fold shall repay.'"†

We hope that every young lady reader of Harper's Weekly will receive at least one handsome Valentine; that it may come from some one whose name she can guess; and that when they next meet the audacious writer or sender may be soundly punished for his boldness.

BY FITZ HUGH LUDLOW,

AUTHOR OF "THE HASHEESH EATER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER VI.

A FEW FRIENDS.

It was thought best, on all accounts, that little Filkins should execute the spirit of the partner's behest not to be recognized at Chesswick by keeping fan-dusted at Sherry's lodgings. The latter had a most substantial supper prepared and sent up to his rooms, of which his guest partook with such a natural freedom from embarrassment as seemed to indicate that responsibility was not bad for him. After which Ernest went forth to attend the party at the house of Mr. Todds, cashier.

Mr. Todds had taken up his abode with the highly respectable and sensitive Mrs. Dilks, upon seeing in an advertisement that that lady was open to such a proposition. He was not such a spoon, as he would have readily told any body that desired the information, as to bite at that part of the paragraph which dwelt luxuriously upon "all the comforts of a home;" the "estimable and Christian family" was all gammon —the estimableness probably consisting in the very flattering opinion they indulged of themselves, and the Christianity being restricted to hints not to force or make experiments in secular music with Saxe Horns on Sunday, when the pious members of the household wished to —sleep. The advantages of the place consisted almost entirely to Mr. Todds in neighborhood —the man with the freestone steps next door having formerly owned a grandfather who cured nearly all Chesswick when it was first settled round the old Body, with bran knobs to her ruling, decently opposite, being the brother of a clergyman, a gentleman retired with a handsome fortune from bottled lemon beer, and two younger sons who had enough to live on even if they had done nothing but sleep, eat, and drive their own income, which they therefore did do.

It was to this house that Ernest Beckford beat his way. It was a tall brick edifice, very red in the day-time, as if blushing to the eyes with the self-consciousness of its own awful gentility; and even now he seemed to tell it from any other building by a sort of lurid glare, which fancy saw it shedding through the darkness of that warm and moonless June night. Sounds broke upon Ernest Beckford's ear, as soon as the door was opened, from the elevated region of third pair back. To say the least, it seemed as if animated discussion was going on in the room of Mr. Todds.

Thither went Ernest mounted, and, knocking at the door, was ushered in, with a pleasing hilarity of manner, by Mr. Todds, and introduced by that gentleman to the various guests whom he had not known previously, and who were chiefly representative of the mercantile interests of Chesswick, and the sporting class in general. "Mr. Beckford, Mr. Mixer. Mr. Beckford is a gentleman from Clingham & Co.—pecuniary, like ourselves—and him a valuable friend, perfectly reliable, secured by pledge of public stocks, heh, Beckford? Ha, ha! Mr. Mixer is of a house that's our large customer—he's in oil-cloth, door-mats, too? No? I'm surprised —really, I thought door-mats."

Mr. Mixer—a gentleman recognizable particularly by a most elaborate cravat pattern, and who, before Ernest entered, had been talking to Mr. Todds, with the gloves on, how it was that Figg hit Solomons when the last named worthy departed this life, threw the dexter glove upon the floor, and extended his hand with a most gratifying frankness—saying, "Glad to know you, Sir!"

It was chiefly, however, his physical prowess which enabled him to do this so fearlessly, for the rest of the young gentlemen about the room came up to be presented to Ernest with very much the same cheerful alacrity and air of making an agreeable acquaintance that characterizes an assembly of youthful sinners, who behold a doctor of divinity coming to talk to them. "Evidently," thought Ernest, "I am not especially an encouragement to our friends' gayety. But I believe I will stay, and 'make the best use of my time.'" It is surprising how very awkwardly sporting men will sometimes permit themselves to feel, in spite of those free-and-easy characteristics of which they boast themselves so much, in the presence of a very quiet and gentlemanly person, who, though coming among them as into a new life, feels no embarrassment at all.

Ernest Beckford saw the chill he had thrown over these young friends where he settled to fill with every possible degree of rejoicing. Not being at all a selfish man, though a very self-respecting one, he was desirous to relieve them as well as his entertainer from the embarrassment into which the arrival of a person who was not "one of our fellows" had thrown them.

He accordingly turned to Mr. Todds, and said, "May I borrow your gloves a moment? Yes! boa, Mr. Mixer? Yes! May I have the pleasure of a little exercise with you?"

If Mr. Mixer had heard the previous proposition made by the steeple of Trinity Church he would have placed as immediate confidence in his own ears. But before he could muster any expression of surprise Ernest stood before him on guard; he picked up his right glove from the floor rather by instinct than from any true understanding of what was happening, put it on, and made a feint. At the next moment what Britain would call a well-directed blow thought took Mr. Mixer off his feet, and extended him in a sporadic form over the floor. He picked himself up, slapped Ernest on the back, and told him he was a dem'd fine fellow. After which the utmost hilarity and good-fellowship was restored to the circle. It was the shortest way to put Mr. Mixer at his ease to knock him down, and all his friends with him.

Mr. Todds had prepared his guests for a "muff;" they were to make it pleasant to him, for reasons of policy, and they should him." The guests all now set this down as one of Todds's jokes, and greeted Ernest as a great accession to the jovialty of the party.

Ernest; a gentleman named Mangles, fat, fair, and forty, and who, from the exuberance of his nature and his fondness for Champagne, had stripped to his immediately extra-cutaneous garment, and was gradually making his way out of that as the hilarity of the company advanced; Mr. Bradby of the Bank, and another person whose true identity must now ingloriously sleep forever, in history the latter having had the baptismal name which he prefixed to Smith: these four made up a party, and sat down to play old Maid. Seated at one table, they were three gentlemen more, who preferred euchre of the peculiar subgenus known as cut-throat, and a few others still continued to dance, to the music of the five song. Mr. Todds, as entertainer, amused himself with superintending the refreshments, and meanwhile brewed a very large tin-pail—begging that the inaccessible bowl might be excused—of iced negus. This was consumed, or at last effected, tasted, and pronounced excellent, was circulated freely in tumblers, mugs, and small cups, of various sizes and patterns which prevail in bachelors' lodgings.

It began to have its effect. Little by little the interest in the cards languished, and the air of the more comprehensive sympathy for universal creation grew on the company. At last Mr. Mangles, the large gentleman in oil, got in a fit of brotherly enthusiasm for Ernest, against whom he was playing, and who had just trumped his two-spot with the ace, and with the deuce set at enmity no longer with him, even in sport, and falling upon his neck, began to inquire to him tearful confidences from the unsullied pages of early childhood.

One by one the distinct groups broke up, and a ring was formed about the table on which the punch pail stood. The enthusiasm of the young gentlemen who, during the previous part of the evening, had preferred harmony to antagonism, spread through all the circle, and beautifully various, both in number and school of execution, were the musical efforts of the amateurs in that direction. To the great astonishment and mortification of Mr. Mixer, who had been overwhelmed, as we stated, with reminiscences of primitive innocence, persisted in trying to the very lugubrious and sacred melody of Ortonville, a ballad which he recollected to have sung in his Sunday-school, Whereat Mr. Bradby, with whom cheerfulness now assumed the high-jovial and bellicose aspect, being very much chagrined, he interposed Mr. Mangles by sundry questions, suggestions, and snatches of more profane melody, in a manner highly derogatory to vocal harmony, and productive of no little unpleasantness of feeling.

Thus Mr. Mangles. "Permit me, L'diesandgemlun, to awake a harp which on the Bab—on the Baby—which has long hung on the Bab'-lonish willows. Ernest, I'm a child—I'm childhood."

"'Birds in their little nest agree
But I'm shockingsight—'"

Mr. Beadby. "I deny it in toto! 'Tisn't a shocking sight. It's a remarkably pleasant sight to see birds in their little nests agree. I'll stand up for the birds. I'm a bird. I was brought up with 'em. And any body that says it's a shocking sight again, will do it over my dead body!"

Mr. Mangles. "I repeat it, I

"'Birds 'bir' IFII ner'agree...'

I say it 'n ht' authority 'f Doctor Watts."

Mr. Beadby. "What's Watt?"

Mr. Mangles. "Watts's name!"

Mr. Beadby. "Don't repeat my words, Sir! Won't stand it if you are drunk, and very much ashamed I am to see you so. What's his name?"

Mr. Mangles again (in a subdued voice, as if yielding to force of circumstances). "I said Watts, 'ndsayitagain, Watts!"

Mr. Bradby. "I know him; he's a beast. I'll sing something of my own:

"'In the good old Colony times,
When we all were under the King,
Three regulah chaps—'"

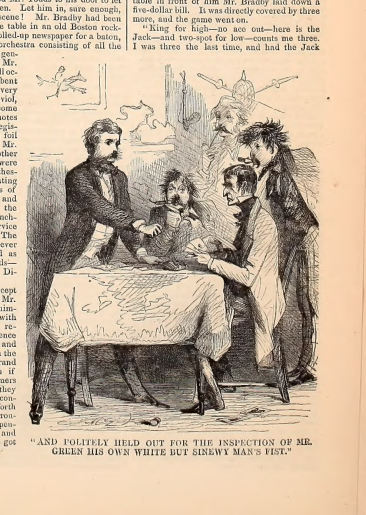
Mr. Mangles (reviving and very forcibly). "And 'tisshockingshot!"

There can be but little doubt that the very next moment would have seen Mr. Bradby's tumbler of punch wasted upon the outer instead of the inner side of Mr. Mangles's physical economy, had not Mr. Todds, who saw how nearly things had come to a crisis, very adroitly picked up the said utensil as Mr. Bradby was reaching for it, and finished it himself. Which effected a diversion in favor of Mr. Mangles until he could be laid upon the settee. There was now abundant room for Mr. Bradby's song, which consequently shed itself abroad to his own intense satisfaction, and little more or less delectation of every body else.

Prominent among the most excited admirers of the band was Ernest Beckford. With feet and hands, with mug now quite drained, with fist upon the hard mahogany, he signified his applause passionately.

And Todds, cashier, looked upon him with an approving smile, based upon the hypothesis that he was getting "delightfully tight." Then cast a glance of triumph upon Mr. Bradby and the first book-keeper, M'Dowlas (whom we have not mentioned before, but perhaps shall not mention again, because he never did any thing worth mention; not even to get drunk with a comical expression, but rather stupidly and incapably so), as much as to say, "I told you so! I was the man who really appreciated Beckford; see him disclose splendid!"

Song followed song; applause became more and more excessive; and the large tin—pail, whose centripetal attraction kept the ring around it in hilarious revolution, got lower and lower.



Mrs. Dilks, meanwhile, sat upon the hardest of hair cushions, in the stiffest of upright armchairs, in the back parlor two stories down. There were no doors between her boarder and his guests and herself; but these floors were not impermeable to sound. Which fact caused her relief and rest from daughters, who were nearly as old as herself, to experience those emotions which persons mature and grave have a singular tendency to feel when in suspense, as to whether the house is coming down on their heads.

Mrs. Dilks had just arisen, and, in a manner of extreme yet dignified and self-sustaining acerbity, was about to ascend to the room hired by Mr. Todds, to make a final admonition prior to "calling the police," when a ring came at the front door. Which was just in her way, she opened without the five minutes of profession, and, all smiles and sunshine, behold Mr. Luke Green stands before her.

"Oh, don't show me up, ma'am! Spare yourself, I entreat you! I know the way perfectly—makes Providence glad you are aware, upon these young persons of the Bank. Ah! how young people need fatherly superintendence!—how one looks for them to accept responsibility, ma'am—great; duty only enables us to sustain it. You are a mother, I believe?—yes. So I thought: you can understand me, then. Oh, spare yourself, I pray! I can go just as well without a light. Good-night, ma'am!"

In less than a minute thereafter the lightest of taps summoned Mr. Todds to his door to let Mr. Luke Green. Let him in, sure enough, upon a singular scene! Mr. Beadby had been elevated upon the table in an old Boston rocking-chair, with the newspaper for a baton, was leading an orchestra consisting of all the rest of the young gentlemen, except Mr. Mangles, who, still occupying a recumbent position, made an excellent bass-viol, and gave forth some very voluminous notes from the lower register, elicited by a roll in the hands of Mr. Mixer. The other instruments were supplied by clothes-brooms representing violins, the backs of chairs as harps and psalteries, and the now emptied punch-kettle doing service as a snare drum. The chorus was one never before performed as such on any boards—Filkins and his Dinah.

Every body except Ernest ceased as Mr. Green disclosed himself; and he, with mock solemnity, requesting the audience to sustain talent and listen to a solo on the double-action grand chair-back, even if the other performers were so drunk they couldn't go on, continued to send forth from his throat reminders of the most penetrating melody, and stopped when he got re-ly.

"AND POLITELY HELD OUT FOR THE INSPECTION OF MR. GREEN HIS OWN WHITE BUT SINEWY MAN'S FIST."

"Very drunk," observed Mr. Green, turning to Mr. Todds, with a sad shake of the head.

"Very!" returned the gentleman addressed, in a peculiarly sprightly and pleasant manner. "By Jove! didn't think it was in the fellow!".

"Really it is too bad, though, Mr. Todds," added the Bank superintendent, in a desolate tone. "This young man came here with the best of recommendations, and look what you have made of him. Bad as Mr. Filkins already. Ah! how evil habits infect even the most innocent. Sad boys, sad boys!"

"Guess it won't hurt him," curtly answered Mr. Todds. "If he's been drunk before, he's used to it; if he hasn't, why he'll do it better next time. That's my philosophy. If a man can't be a brick sometimes what's he live for?"

"A very ratio," said Mr. Green, addressing himself to the company at large, "and may I ask, for Mrs. Dilk's sake, that the harmless mirth of our young friends take a form less decidedly demonstrative? The excellent woman whom I have mentioned, after a most laborious day, was about making a visit upon this room as I came in; and nothing but my representation to her of the extreme care which she owed to her health prevented her from so fatiguing herself. Doubtless it would be also disagreeable to you to have her take that pains." Then, turning to Mr. Todds, he added, sotto voce, "Suppose you propose a return to cards—as a slight sedative, you know?"

As requested, the cashier suggested, with all the quiet which he was capable of, making allowance for the youth and festivity which it might be an agreeable variation of the hilarities of the evening to resume cards. The suggestion appeared to receive general favor, and even Mr. Mangles arose from his resting-place, said that he felt perfectly right, notwithstanding that it was his general conviction still that Sodom in their little nests agree; and sat down opposite his former enemy, Mr. Bradby, in a game of old sledge. The other two who made up that set were M'Dowlas and —oh! it was discovered that a fourth was wanting. Would Mr. Green play? suggested Mr. Bradby. Mr. Green thought he had better not—they could make up the set without him. No? Positively would no one fill up the game? Well, then, just to oblige, he would take a hand, though it was not his usual custom.

As he said this he looked out of his ordinarily placid, steel-gray eyes, with a sharp, quick glance aside at Ernest, which would have kindled pank, or any thing drier and more impressible than that unfortunate young man was just at present. With a sleepy, good-natured air he returned the compliment; at the same time drawing his chair up—in a feeble, half-discouraged sort of way—to a place where he could look at the game.

By this time Mr. Todds had bestirred himself, and was ready with another pail of punch. Tumblers, mugs, or cups, all around, and mutual healths to begin with. Mr. Green just sipped, scorning another fire-proof glance at Ernest as he did so, which that young man evidently noticed not in the slightest.

The game went on at the table near which Ernest was sitting, and meanwhile the remainder of those in the room had organized themselves into various groups, one playing euchre, another whist, and a couple of gentlemen amusing themselves at bluff upon the settee. Presently Ernest nodded more and more, and finally leaning his head upon the post of the door by which he sat, was evidently asleep. On the table in front of him Mr. Bradby laid down a five-dollar bill. It was directly covered by three more, and the game went on.

"King for high—no ace out—here is the Jack—and two-spot for low—counts me three. I was three the last time, and had the Jack time before—seven. The game is mine, I believe."

This might have been said by some men in a way to provoke all the losers to frenzy. I have known of a loser who, hearing it said, lifted the heavy arm-chair on which he had been sitting and pitched it into an elaborate ormola-framed pier-glass twenty feet high, necessarily to the somewhat damage of that expensive article. But in the present instance it was uttered with a touching ease, delicacy, smoothness, a tone from four notes on the one hand, or condolence on the other—a perfect lulling placidity and passive force, which lubricated the passage of the stake to the winner's wallet, so that it seemed in the very nature of things as possible for a stick to float on the glassy surface of the pool's funnel, as for that twenty dollars to have been swept into any other hands than Mr. Luke Green's.

There was not a murmur from any of the losers. There was not the slightest unusual motion on the part of any body.

And Mr. Luke Green supposed that he alone was the repositor of one secret. He, together with a knave who, in the present day, sometimes keeps our darkest secret with us for so long that we even dare to fancy him our accomplice, because he does not shriek out at the instant. Who but Luke Green knew how the Jack, the King, and the two-spot, all came into his hand at the same time—who could declare that he saw the cards stacked? There was no one besides himself, as he thought, more in thought—in words—then his steel-blue eye shot another spark over his shoulder—oh! with one exception, that Mr. Halliwell. How fortunate that he was drunk, poor animal!

Several times the same thing happened, the pursuit, the gentle cajoling—every body drinking pretty deep, except Mr. Green, who must be excused, as he never had a strong head. At last Mr. Luke Green grew serious, and was accordingly assisted to assume a reclining posture upon the settee, as before.

The heavy unconscious by this little episode aroused Ernest Bedford. He rubbed his eyes, stretched himself, and seeing the vacant seat of the Illustrated Mangler, expressed a desire to become his successor.

Another glance of the steel and flint fire. Not paying any attention to it or to the subject of an answer to his request, he sat down dreamily in the same place, jogged confidently at his pocket-book, drew out from it a bill, and laying it down in a very irresponsible and bibulous manner, said, "Drive ahead, old fellow!"

"Awful drunk," murmured Mr. Bradby, approvingly.

Mr. Green's only answer was to send another dart of the steel-blue fire in Ernest's direction, and drive it with such a swing woefully at Teddie and Brudby. The game went on, and Ernest lost his stake to Luke Green. He swept the next pool into his hand with the look of one who is beside himself—not haggard, blear-eyed, disheveled—but with a wild, forceful light of decision and earnest in his great blue eyes —his sleepy manner quite worn off by excitement—he slapped down a roll of bills on the table with a hand that made it ring again, and ring, in a voice that seemed as fearfully calm as Green's.

"There is one hundred dollars; your whole wallet can't cover that!" Nobody seemed disposed to answer—everybody was probably frequently played for, if ever, by most of the gentlemen present. And Ernest sat looking at Luke Green with a face of unmoving challenge.

It was a moment of suspense, great suspense to even the most unconcerned in the room; and whether shaken from his usual emotionless balance by the weight of so much notice, or disgrained enough before to could control himself, that this fresh stripling should defy him, Luke Green took his wallet from his pocket, and laying it on the top of Ernest's stake, said, "There it is! And here's to its better acquaintance with your $100." So saying, he flung down a small note. He was secure enough, he had stacked again.

"Does this hand decide it?" said Ernest.

"Exactly, my young friend," was Green's reply. "Our other gentlemen don't choose to play on Ernest's hand, and you recollect we were five and— I suppose I may show my hand to our friends who have left the game?"

Ernest looked Green, indulging a sardonic look of triumph which he was betrayed into by his bad angel, and contrary to all his previous habit of reserve, flourished a sprawl of cards, which all bore the trump mark, over his shoulder, where Teddie stood nodding approvingly.

"Your play, if you please, Sir," said Mr. Green.

"Precisely," was the very calm reply of Ernest. "You have shown the hand that you think decide it—permit me to show you the hand that I know does."

So saying he rose from his chair, threw down the cards he held on the table—not a trump among them all—and politely held out for the inspection of Mr. Green his own white but sinewy man's fist, which that worthy could receive from the surprise natural at th's eccentric demonstration, this good right hand of Ernest's held taken in its grips his own notes and Mr. Green's wallet together. The next instant and they were altogether in his inside breast-pocket. The door was just behind him; one long, agile, backward spring brought him to it, and before a single arm of all that paralyzed company could be stretched out to bar his way the door was locked on the outside, and Ernest was down the stairs, had opened the front door and shut it behind him.

FULL OF LIFE.

So full of life is Ceylon that the great forest trees disappear almost instantaneously after they have fallen to the ground, being reduced to dust by the white ants and beetles. Let a man come near with a gun, and a palmyra palm shall seem to have no creature in it; when there is a block of mahogany in possession, hidden cunningly behind its leaves. But let a dog follow, and the desire of all the monkeys to look at the dog will set them peeping.

There are two kinds of the graceful little Loris or Ceylon sloth, a creature that moves so wonderfully as to cone unawares on a bird, and seize it before the alarm of its presence has been given. Its large bright eyes are said to be very useful as charms or love potions, and it is said that they extract them cruelly by holding the little animal to the fire until its eyeballs burst. Equally cruel is the mode of taking tortoise-shell from the hawksbill turtle, by which it is supplied to commerce. It takes after death the shell is clouded and milky. Therefore the turtles are seized as they repair to the shore to deposit their eggs, and are hung over a small fire, which makes the shell to shrink from the bone to which they are attached. Then the miserable creatures are allowed to escape to the sea, where, by a singular is the instinct a the period of breeding that the turtles are found to return to within one mile of their birth-place, though at each visit they may undergo a repetition of the same torture. At Colobo the turtle is killed by blows on the head, and the shell is removed by the aid of boiling water. Indifference to the sufferings of animals is a characteristic of the Ceylon natives. Disciples of Buddha, they refuse to eat animals to take life, are dead to any sense of pain they may inflict. Pigs, with their fore and hind legs tied together by a rope, are carried to market by men screaming with pain. Fowls are brought to market from long distances, hanging by their feet, and ducks are carried by the bill, which is a cruel mode bent to stifle their cries. Worst of all is the sale, by Tamil fishermen's wives, in the Jaffna marketplace, of fresh-water tortoises, to be living animal, which lies on its back with its beating heart close to the sun and is left to die. Cut away fins, fat, and pounds of flesh, usually leaving head and head to be the last pieces selected. The heart still beats, and the mouth sings, when the shell is nearly emptied of all its contents.

The swarm of life in Ceylon includes a multitude of bats, who form one of the features of the evening landscape. Of many forms and sizes, they abound in every available cave, gallery, bungalow roof, or other place of shelter. They hang to the trees. At sunset out they fly, and chase the moths even about the lamps upon the dinner-table. One bat has a growth like a leaf at the end of its nose. One glossy black little bat, not much larger than the bumble-bee, will alight on the dinner-cloth, and show no great terror at being caught under a wine-glass.

In the depths of the forest the most formidable fellow is the bear, who digs for honey, feeds on the ants, and accounts nothing daintier than honey. A bear, found by a traveler growling over his breakfast in the midst of a cocoa-nut grove on a branch, thrusting portions of a red ant's nest into his mouth and licking his paws with the other by endeavored to clear his eyebrows and lips of the angry inmates, by whom he also was bitten. In time of great honey hunger bears become fierce, unable to climb back, frighten away the women who resort to the wells for water. The bear is, in Ceylon, a most dangerous beast, and there is no nuisance strength against man only in self-defense; then he endeavors to fill his assailant by a blow upon the head, and when the man has prostrate, makes his attack first upon the eyes. The bears also attack fearlessly the rude dwellings of the Veddahs, for the honey found in the roofs of some of these poor people. The post-office runners, who always travel by night, carry torches, that the bears who are hunted by day may keep away from them.

The only sort of tiger in Ceylon is a leopard, or cheetah, who is, in fact, the true panther, and he is much less feared than the bear. The deer, which is a variety of him, sometimes met with, it is not safe to shoot altogether black. He haunts the pasture land in quest of deer and cattle. There is a belief among the people that when a leopard has brought down a deer, bullock, he will not return to feed upon it if it fall, in dying, so that the right side is underneat. The Ceylon leopard will attack the buffalo, and even the elephant, for a kid. He is strongly attracted by the smell of small-pox. This disease, as the natives shrink from vaccination, is frightfully common in the villages. Route small-pox hospitals are made in the jungle, and to these the leopards are so certainly allured that special hand of them is necessary.

Of the jackals there is a native superstition attached to a small horn, called Narri-combu, which sometimes grows on the head, hidden by a tuft of hair. Cingalese and Tamils alike hold this jackal's horn to be a talisman, which commands for its owner the fulfillment of all wishes, and which, if lost, invariably finds itself again for him. On the other hand, the leopard's tooth carries concerning for the ichneumon, that it uses some plant as an antidote to the bites of the serpents upon which it preys, is here rejected.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Cough Lozenges.

Brown's Bronchial Troches. At this season of the year, when so many are troubled with hoarseness, influenza, and bronchial difficulties, these Troches afford a grateful relief. We have seen instances of their good effects in cases of inflammation of the bronchial tubes and of the hoarseness of children. They contain nothing which can injure the constitution, and have a decided effect very efficacious in assisting expectoration, and promote the secretions of the throat. For public speakers, singers, and all persons troubled with hoarseness, they are invaluable.—Providence Transcript.

FARMERS AND THEIR WIVES, Sons, and Daughters—all ought to see LIFE ILLUSTRATED. Only a quarter for 3 months. FOWLER AND WELLS, N. Y.

Clothing, Time, and Labor Saved.

This Machine dispenses entirely with rubbing, and in this and every other way it saves cost, in the value of clothing, in a few months' time, even in a small family. The saving of labor and time is equally remarkable. The Machine is simple in construction and management, and being made of galvanized iron, is very durable. It will wash the finest as well as the coarsest fabrics. For finishing—a matter different thing for the laundress to manage—its operation is astonishing, as it thoroughly cleans them, without the slightest shrinkage.

DESCRIPTION.

It consists of a metal cylinder, with cleats on the inner surface, and an interior cylinder of wood, with cleats. One crank turns both cylinders at the same time in opposite directions, producing a suds, forcing the water through the clothes, and effectually removing the dirt.

A hundred attends daily to show the operation of the Machine.

"By Great Odds, the Best American Historical Novel."

HENRY ST. JOHN, Gentleman,
OF FLOWER OF HUNDREDS, IN THE COUNTY OF PRINCE GEORGE, VIRGINIA.
A Tale of 1774–75.
By JOHN ESTEN COOKE,
Author of
"Leather Stocking and Silk," "The Virginia Comedians," &c.
12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

This book and the "Virginia Comedians," to which it is a sort of sequel, present the most truthful picture of the society of Colonial Virginia that literature has yet produced, and one which, indeed, we do not believe will ever be improved on.—N. Y. Albion.

The story is one of many vicissitudes, and some striking incidents and adventures: but its more imposing features are the delicate portraits o the great men of Virginia. Of such men no one can paint nobler portraits than Mr. Cooke. In all the scenes, they appear equally noble under his touch—lofty, strong, equal to the occasion; sometimes above it and in advance of it, but never below.—Charleston Mercury.

This work, though less and there it has a good deal of mannerism in it, is very readable, and is the best American novel we have received for some time past.—London Leader.

John Esten Cooke of Virginia is a national romancist we do believe, as much as Walter Scott was. "His womanly emotions are real and living beings. St. John is a chivalrous gentleman; but the portrait of the whole story is the Earl of Dunmore, haughty and cowardly, intriguing and insolent, cunning and treacherous, we have him here to the life. Captains Fry and Waters are inimitable. They are most artistically contrasted, and wonderfully well drawn. " Henry St. John is certainly the best historical novel that has been published for years, and Virginia should be proud of the author.—Phila. Press, Dr. S. Mazeppa.

Henry St. John is a work of great value, as a faithful portrait of the times. There are passages in the volume full of the genuine spirit of the Revolution, and written with a fire that must thrill the dullest reader. In our opinion, it is, by great odds, the best American historical novel. A series written as the volume before us is written, may be popular, as it will deserve, the American Waverley.—S. C. Courant.

"John Esten Cooke, Esq., is one of the most effective writers of fiction in America. When the "Virginia Comedians" was published anonymously we read it with infinite zest, and we now welcome Henry St. John, Gentleman, as a similarly attractive work of romance. The scenes and scenery are in Virginia in the old time. The actors are the frank, hearty, gay, and glorious people of the Old Dominion. The whole story is heroic, full of action, and without too much passion. We do not know of any writer who places his actors on the stage with more life and character."

THACKERAY.—TROLLOPE.
HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

THE Publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE have the pleasure to announce that they have made arrangements with the Author, by which they are to receive the Monthly Parts of THACKERAY'S New Novel, "Lovel the Widower," in advance of publication in England. The First Part appears in the present Number of the Magazine. The Tale will comprise about Eight Parts, and, with the original Illustrations, will be published in each succeeding Number.

ANTHONY TROLLOPE, the Author of the brilliant Novels, "Orley Farwell" and "The Bertrams," will, expressly for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, a Series of Stories under the general Title of "Tales of Every Landing." The First Tale of this Series is contained in the present Number, others will appear in different intervals during the year.

The Publishers renew the assurances which they have so often made, that HARPER'S MAGAZINE will continue to contain the most conservative position which it has assumed. They do not undervalue the importance of the questions at issue between the different sections and parties of the country. Each of these has organs especially devoted to its advocacy and maintenance. The Publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE deem it of paramount importance that one should be a periodical which, leaving the discussion of these vexed questions to their own organs, shall consider only those topics which, from their principles and set forth those opinions only in which wise and patriotic citizens of every section can heartily concur. Their Magazine will be, as heretofore, the organ of no party in politics or faction in religion; but a National work, drawing materials and welcoming contributions from every quarter. The Conductors whose names appear as its pages residing in every section of the country have, of course, different personal opinions upon the exciting questions of the day. What these private views are, or how they are expressed, beyond the pages of the Magazine, the Publishers think it out of their province to inquire; but they will exercise the editorial care that nothing shall find place in any department of the Magazine which shall render it an unwelcome visitor in any household.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER. $2 50 A YEAR.

The First Number of the Fourth Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY appeared on the 4th January, 1860. Last year the Publishers of HARPER'S WEEKLY gave a Mammoth Number, nearly half of which have been bound for reference. In commencing the new volume, the proprietors propose to state that it has been their aim to render HARPER'S WEEKLY, in the first place, a real family paper, and, in a first-class newspaper—a pictorial history of current events, equal to the best daily journal, and furnishing to the subscriber to the daily press as combining illustrations with the news that they have obtained during the three volumes now published will show. The illustrations in the future Numbers of the Journal will be selected with which every important event of the past year has been related and illustrated in the pages of HARPER'S WEEKLY. They would refer especially, in this connection, to The Indian War, the Great Japan Embassy, the Prince's Visit, The Ferry Outbreak, the Utah Expedition, the Paraguay Expedition, the Chinese War. The value of this paper can be best realized by supposing that it did not exist, and by then looking over the files of the daily press to see how many of passing events if they had to rely on written descriptions alone. In this particular the arrangements for the coming year are more complete than they have been heretofore. HARPER'S WEEKLY has regular artist correspondents in almost every quarter of the globe, and something of the result of the best artists in the world. It will moreover, in order to present its readers with a complete illustrated history of the times, devote to illustrations the pages the best and most generally interesting pictures that the great Illustrated Journals in the world. The subscriber to HARPER'S WEEKLY may rely on finding in its pages a great year-book of illustrations, with the graphic and well-printed picture of every memorable event which has occurred, and a pictorial record of every phase in the general attention of the people of this country.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue, as heretofore, to publish the best tales that are written by native and foreign authors. A new Tale of Thrilling Interest, "A Tale of Two Cities, by CHARLES DICKENS (with original illustrations by Harry Furniss), will appear in the early part of 1860; and by Sir E. LYTTON BULWER: The Dead Secret, by WILKIE COLLINS; Lucy Crofton, by Mrs. GASKELL; A Good Fight, by CHARLES READE; and Trumps, by GEO. MANVILLE FENN. In commencing the The Virginians in Waste, by WILKIE COLLINS, and The New Partner in HARPER'S WEEKLY, by FITZHUGH LUDLOW, a large body of which are illustrated by JOHN MCLENAN, Esq., Or, or before the close of these tales, others of equal merit will be commenced, it being the intention of the publishers to present to the subscribers of undoubted excellence that is written here or abroad. It is hardly necessary to add, that the foreign serials which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY are purchased from their authors in advance by the proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY, who, in many instances, give for a mere right of priority what amounts to a large remuneration to the author.

In addition to serials, each number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will contain a short complete Tale by a native or foreign author. In respect to these tales, as with the serials, the publishers will aim to give the best that can obtain, without regarding their origin.

The other departments of HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue to receive careful attention as the basis of the publication.

WE COMMENCE IN THIS NUMBER

THE

Uncommercial Traveler,

BY

CHARLES DICKENS,

And a new Serial Tale of American Life, entitled "THE MISTRESS OF THE PARSONAGE."

THE BRIDAL OF GALTRIM.

THE priest's at the altar: the bride—and the groom—
The bridesmaids—and gallants, with doff'd cap and plume,
Are kneeling around till the word forth is gone
That license the union of two into one.
But while the decree were responding "Amen,"
The blast of a war-trumpet rang through the glen,
And each man, as he sprang to his feet, grips'd his sword,
While the fresh-plighted hand of the bride held her lord.

"Oh, hold me not, dearest!—you would not detain?
It is honor to go—'twere disgrace to remain.
The foe's at the gate; we must drive him away!—
A joust is befitting a chief's wedding-day!"
He buckled his mail o'er his gay wedding garb;
His colt'd for his lance, and he sprang on his barb,
And waved back a graceful adieu, as he cried,
"A victor I soon will be back with my bride!"

And soon was he back, and a victor beside—
But 'twas to his widow, and not to his bride;
For, foremost in danger the foe to repel,
In the moment of conquest the conqueror fell.
Slowly the victors return from the field,
Lamenting the knight whom they bore on his shield;
And the Lady of Galtrim, as Chronicles say,
Was maid, wife, and widow—and all in one day.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE MISTRESS OF The Parsonage.

BY ELLA RODMAN.

PART I.

IT is October.

Not October with golden mists, and mantle of soft gray upon the distant hills—not October with cool, breezy mornings, glorious noons, and sweet, half-mournful evenings—but October bleak and rainy, over which the heavy clouds brood like a pall. Within lies the corpse of the past, and the black robes of mourning throw their shadow on my heart.

I remember Octobers that are gone—dead and buried with my happiness; and they came dancing joyously, their foreheads bound with golden sheaves of grain and wreaths of gay-colored leaves, and their robes were gold and purple as the sunset. Where are they now? The third-story room of this dull city-house looks out upon other houses as dark and dull; and as I pace its narrow limits I think of Bonnivard, and the stone floor on which were imprinted the marks of his weary footsteps. I would wear the Roman penitent's dress of serge, with the galling chain beneath—but he taught me differently from that; no self-inflicted suffering can ever erase those blotted pages of life. And yet I have not been really wicked—only thoughtless, and more sinned against than sinning.

That quiet study continually haunts me, with the pale, earnest face of him who bends over his writing, while I lie idly upon the sofa, or trifle with some nondescript bit of sewing. I see the smile that ever fell upon me like the sunlight streaming through those rose-draped windows. I feel again its gentle influence; and I wake to weep, and find it but a dream.

My pen is in my hand; a waste of blank paper, procured to meet the wants of my little flock of scholars, spreads itself out before me; and I will commence the retrospection of a misspent life. It is a pleasant task to live over again, even in thought, those days of quiet happiness; and, perchance, it may prove a useful lesson to this poor, tempest-tossed heart thus to record my folly and waywardness.

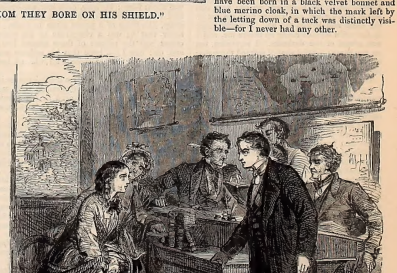
I know not where I was born; but it must have been in the country, for I have faint, misty recollections of green fields, and apple-blossoms, and a low, spreading house, with moss-covered eaves, and a deep well, where "the old oaken bucket" used to hang, dripping with clear drops that, on a warm summer day, were more precious than diamonds.

But later memories come, crowding back these pleasant thoughts; and I awake, as from a dream, in a small, dreary house, that stands in a close city street, and seems never visited by the fresh air. I stand now in that dark, narrow entrance-hall, so close and confined that, when placed there for punishment, I fancied the sides were moving to crush me.

My grandmother lived there—my father's mother—a fierce old woman, with deep, black eyes, that were set so far back in her head they looked like caverns. She was a female miser, and had a gaunt, hungry look that made me afraid she would eat me. Her pocket—an immense sack worn under her dress—was full of keys; for she kept every thing locked; and she would try to persuade me that bits of fat or lard tasted better on bread than butter. When I read of Amine and the Ghoule, in the Arabian Nights, I thought of her. Her usual dress in winter was a stuff petticoat, and a man's coat with the tails cut off, and a thick muslin cap with deep ruffles—the hue of this cap made me wonder if it was not like the clothes of the dressed dolls in the shops, sewed on never to come off.

She had one "sole daughter of her house and heart;" I shall always hate the name of Hester. The sharpest gray eyes that were ever placed in human head, a figure especially calculated for so energetic a character, and hands and nose that had a peculiarity of always looking chilly, were the distinguishing attributes of my maiden aunt. She was not then very old, but she had the precocious sharpness of a "lone woman;" and as the ill-used maid-of-all-work said of her, "that she was hooked for an old maid was written in her face."

I have, even now, a disagreeable sensation of Hester's fingers, as they closed over and sunk into my plump little arms, while administering correction for some childish mischief; and I remember that they were cold and hard. Had I suffered the same amount in any other way I should not have cared so much, but I disliked to have her touch me.



Both mother and daughter were animated by a determined spirit of saving; and in consequence of this disposition we were short of clothes, short of provisions, and short of all the comforts of life. I used to think that I must have been born in a black velvet bonnet and blue merino cloak, in which the mark left by the letting down of a tuck was distinctly visible—for I never had any other.

"IN THE MOMENT OF CONQUEST THE CONQUEROR FELL."

"LAMENTING THE KNIGHT WHOM THEY BORE ON HIS SHIELD."

"ALLOW ME TO EXAMINE THE YOUNG LADY—"

The house was old, and oddly contrived. From the front door you walked down the hall for some distance, and then turned quite unexpectedly into a small parlor, where the first object that would probably arrest a stranger's attention was a huge shell comb on the mantle-piece. Of the fitness of things my grandmother cared not; the comb had cost money—had been admired as a head ornament—and there was, therefore, no reason why it should not now do duty as a piece of parlor furniture.

A cosey, warm carpet, maple chairs, a sofa hard-heated as its owners, and green blinds to the windows, completed the furnishing of the apartment. The parlor was bleak, cold, and discouraging; and yet they kept it locked as though it contained valuables. When a little thing, I made superhuman exertions to get a view of it through the keyhole; but the first time that I found the door really open put an end to my interest.

Then you crossed a second strip of entry to the sitting-room—a small apartment that looked upon a yard containing a large peach-tree. In summer this peach-tree always bore an abundant crop of green worms; but in the early autumn large, luscious-looking peaches were carefully laid in a small basket, with which Hester travelled mysteriously forth, and when she returned the basket was in the same condition as Mother Hubbard's cupboard. A looking-glass, with gilt cherries around the frame, is the principal article of sitting-room furniture that I can remember.

A door opened from this apartment into a closet that contained a cot bedstead. Here my grandmother, Aunt Hester, and myself slept; and I, at least, found it rather crowded quarters. There were rafters overhead that were whitewashed; and at the foot of the bed hung bunches of onions and red peppers. I used to sleep there and dream of being smothered, and wake to find it all alone, and Hester would have the blue flame that curled slowly upward from the newly-kindled fire in the sitting-room. At this hour of the day she was always engaged in a calico morning-gown that had a belt made only of the lining—a calico belt she pinned on afterwards. A aunt's appearance was changed surprisingly cold—the room looked any thing but comfortable—and I dreaded the summons to get up. But I always came before it was made for it; and when dressed, I descended, half-frozen, to the kitchen. Here a repast of re-coffee, or hot tea, and stale bread was soon dispatched; and then began my daily duties, which consisted, in those early days, of running up and down stairs, going of errands, bringing skeins of silk and thread, ripping up old things, peeling apples, washing dishes, and doing any thing which a pair of small hands would do.

When I was first taken there I was a little, dimpled, rosy-cheeked thing, who could only speak plainly. I was brought there by my father after my mother's death; but he, too, died, and they were the only relations I had. Hester's was no money left in their hands for my maintenance; I was a dependent orphan, and they made me feel it to the utmost.

A cheerless childhood passed on with but little to vary its dreary monotony. Nothing ever took place that I can locked parlor except on two occasions: one was a funeral, and the other a tea-drinking.

I have a faint remembrance of a sick lady, who spoke very kindly to me, and gave me sugar-plums; she was a lodger who had a room up stairs; she died, and her body was brought into the parlor. I stood upon tip-toe and looked over a her face had a yellow hue, and there were dark circles around her eyes. I cried aloud, for there was no one now who would care for me, and Hester took me out of the room and locked me up. The still figure in the coffin seemed rising up before me, and I was afraid of the darkness. I screamed, but no one came; fearful shapes seemed thronging about me, and I fell upon the floor in a paroxysm of terror.

I awoke to consciousness three weeks after. I had been very ill, and when I recovered I wandered about the house a thin, pale child, with a grief at her heart for which no one cared.

One afternoon my aunt came in with a moderate-sized pound-cake in white paper wrappings, and began cutting it into the thinnest possible pieces. My grandmother was polishing some white and gilt cups and saucers, and I wondered in all meant. I caught a glimpse from the sitting-room of some prim-looking young ladies and heavy men in the parlor; but before long I was consigned to the companionship of the red peppers and onions, and fell asleep with the hum of voices in my ear.

This is the only time that I can remember any visitors; no one ever came to the house except "the minister," who talked through his nose and drank a great many cups of tea. I never felt disposed to accept his repeated invitations to sit on his lap, and Aunt Hester considered me a hardened sinner. They were professors of religion, but professors only. I read the Bible, and the Psalms, and the religious books that were abundantly scattered around, and felt a sweet meekness growing up in my heart that made me comfort myself sometimes then, I think I may say always, with gentleness and a forgiving spirit.

But I met with no return for my forbearance. They took my submission as a natural right, and apparently considered me nothing more than a machine for working and saving.

Once I rebelled. Mince-pie was my particular horror and aversion: it always seemed to me such a dark field for mystery—such a detection-proof opportunity for the smuggling in of unlawful articles; and my grandmother's mince-pie—oh! I shudder to think of it. I had refused it at dinner-time; after dinner Aunt Hester came bringing a piece on a plate. "It was ridiculous," she said, "to humor a child's whims. I should eat it." I entered the porch as it was of rest, and Mr. Winnesle led me into the pleasant parlor and introduced his sister.

Dear, good Arethusa! she was an extensive specimen of womanhood, with white eyes and hair—the latter dressed in a high and peculiar fashion, with love-locks at the side. She was not much younger than her brother, and exhibited that peculiarity in matrimony kindness that won my heart. Her stock in trade of conversation was an "Is it possible!" uttered in a variety of tones, and she was in a state of perpetual surprise. But I loved her from the first —she was so kindly considerate.

Before long I felt perfectly at home, and I would pace my airy room in childish delight at its length and breadth. New begun light, and life, and freedom. I was a new existence, and the past was but the chrysalis from which the butterfly emerges.

That country tea-table, how pleasant it was! The room cool and shaded, white through the open windows were the heads of roses on the evening breeze; the table pure and inviting, and smiling faces around it—things to which I had been unaccustomed for many a day. On the first floor were the parlor, dining-room, and Mr. Winnesle's study and bedroom; on the second, a large attic chamber, reassigned to my use, Arethusa's room, and others that were not used.

Mr. Winnesle took me to the school and introduced me to the teacher, whom I found not a set of cherubs, ready to go into ecstasies at sight of their new teacher, but a community of wild Indians who looked on me as destined with dislike. But my trials in this line were lightened by kindness at home; and I tripped to school like the veriest child among them, and returned perhaps more sober, but not less happy; for this kind friend of mine was always there to meet me on the constant sunshine in my path. Why they became so kindly interested in my welfare I did not stop to ask. The perfection that enveloped passed me on all sides as we take the blue sky and the flowers, and thought it not more strange than the gifts of a heavenly Father.

Mr. Winnesle had a horse and a small carriage; and every pleasant evening we drove about the country, while the golden stars crept out in the sky, and the moonbeams shone on our homeward route.

I scarcely knew myself until I went to Meadowbank; it was as though I had been in a trance all those past years, and suddenly awoke to find the beautiful life that others existed in by my new friends; their kind, anticipating care rendered me perfectly helpless; and in my wild exuberance of spirits I frequently ran into imaginary mischievous pranks that called forth smiles and laughing reproofs. Then I was driving, and pointing the fingers toward some airy bank, or the lonely-expressed face of Arethusa; now I had run into the woods, and frightened them both by calling from the top of a tree.

There were quieter moments than these, when I sat in Mr. Winnesle's study, and read aloud to him from books which he selected with a kind view to my improvement; and I could those many hours when she engaged to light old stores of learning, and left kind, housewifely Arethusa commanding a more substantial meal in the kitchen. She tried to initiate me into these mysteries, but my hands ached terribly; and she said, with a loving smile, that they were too small to be of any use. I looked at them in surprise; no one had ever told me so before; but my former hands my grandmother always attended to the housekeeping department, and left Hester and me to sew and preach school. Here my presence which was not owing, as Arethusa seemed to suppose, to the smallness of my hands.

Mr. Winnesle's annual smile, and place his substantial hand beside mine, and call me "Fairy." They were making me vain; but, gods! the fearful recess so new and pleasant! I never used to think of my looks before; but now I found that long brown ringlets were prettier than fine-colored or grey hair; that some eyes were like large violets; and they wondered if I had stolen my cheeks from the peaches. It is not unwise flatterers make me write this now; for, oh! they are numbered with the things that have been.

Arethusa loved to overlook my wardrobe (not much trouble that), and select my most becoming things; with skillful fingers "made and clothes look amaist as weel as new." My school kept me pretty well employed; but Arethusa always found time for every thing, and mended my clothes as naturally as she sewed buttons on her brother's shirts. In the evening we sat around the centre table; the sister with her sewing, Mr. Winnesle with a book—and I also reading, or idly teasing them both.

But sometimes we two strolled out into the moonlight; while Arethusa, who did not understand moonbeams and "such romantic nonsense," sat within at work, or waited in the door-way for our return. Sometimes we wandered to the lake that was not far from the house, and went long down into the clear water Mr. Winnesle preached beautiful sermons, that were like the shell-flowers we gathers by the wayside. And in the temple not made with hands that encompassed us on all sides I stood motionless, my soul freighted with a deep feeling of awe, and lifting itself from earthly things far beyond the blue canopy that overshadowed us.

We strolled on past cottages and country-seats, and looked in upon rooms flooded with a soft light, and upon the occupants as they listened to and fro, or gathered in the windows, or around the tables. We looked in other people's windows, and imagined their histories, and planned incidents and denouements that had very little foundation.

I rattled on in this wild manner, and Mr. Winnesle would listen with a smile, or remark with a sigh, that "I was young yet." Was it a "heritage of woe," this youth, that he always wished? Or was he thinking of his own spring that had departed in autumn? I looked forward why it was.

Arethusa smile welcomed our return; and then came those beautiful readings from the Bible, when Mr. Winnesle's voice seemed to me like that of one inspired—then prayers—a kind "good-night" from my friend—Arethusa's kiss—and then to bed.

I would lay my hand lamp on the mantle, and gaze at the snowy counterpane, white curtains, and vase of flowers placed there by affectionate hands—of the moonlight that entered among the foliage—the roses that crept to my window and offer up a silent prayer of happiness. The dews that were falling on the fields and hedges for wild flowers to scatter about the study; and sometimes I even dared to pelt the Rector himself with these floral missiles.

I never knew what Sunday meant until I went to Meadowbank. The sound of the early church bells, wafted across the fields by the summer breeze, was like a strain of music; and having donned my best simple costume, from which the long curls escaped not quite accidentally, I took my seat beside Arethusa, while Mr. Winnesle, with his white gloves and white cravat, drove us slowly to church.

A half-concealed pride diffused itself through my heart as I walked up the aisle to the Rector," for Mr. Winnesle was much beloved by his parishioners; and I took my seat with the consciousness that many eyes were upon me. But I cared not for the country youths—my attention was fixed upon the pulpit; but I should as soon have left them in love with St. Paul as Mr. Winnesle.

Thus ended another church, how it rises up before me! It was pure and fresh in all the beauty of white walls and green blinds, for the congregation had at that spring completed the often-broached project of painting it throughout; and through the open windows came glimpses of the green fields, and waving foliage, and blue water. They were unpretending-looking people, those inhabitants of Meadowbank, and were honest enough must have come them from a former generation; but, oh! the faces beneath them were pleasant to look upon, and glowed with spontaneous hospitality to strangers. I looked from the rough farmers, stiff in their coats of Sunday best, to Mr. Winnesle, and his face seemed to me like that of Adam; and standing beneath the eloquence showered from the pulpit, I felt as though I could never dare to trifle with him again.

And now Memory, sweet magician!
Weaves her silver wand for me;
Calls all the misty Present,
Once again my soul is free!

Village spires are faintly gleaming—
Village bells are on the air—
Hayey with the summer fragrance,
June's sweet breath is melting there.

As in days of yore, I'm seated
In the old beloved pew;
Village church, so quiet and simple,
Still my heart will turn to you.

Hark! the sweetly-chanted numbers
Issue through the open door;
And rise, like spirits winged for heaven,
As the tide of music pour.

Now a deep-toned voice upraises
To the skies its load of prayer,
Each heart bows in adoration,
Finding calm every where.

Oh! the tear-drops will come stealing
That I struggle to repress;
Though the rose breathes summer stillness,
Sobs are rising in mine face.

Ever still my soul is sighing,
With its burden of unrest,
For those days of sweet communion
When I gathered with the blest.

Once again that voice is breathing
Forth its sad and solemn joys—
Once again the sound is rising
Heavenward of tuneful praise.

But, alas! 'tis only dreaming,
And I wake to dream again—
Grasping still my parted treasures,
Source of mingled joy and pain.

Ever still that face will haunt me—
Day and night it seems a guide;
Yet am a pilgrim wandering—
He is traveling heavenward.

I stood visiting my long curls before the glass in the study, I thought that I was alone; and I studied my face as I would a new picture that interested me.

"Fairy," said a gentle voice behind me, "you are very beautiful."

I had suspected as much before; but my cheeks now looked still more like the peaches that grew beneath the window. Mr. Winnesle turned me gently around, and looked gravely and earnestly upon my downcast face.

"It is a great gift, this beauty," said he. "Oh! how often it has proved a curse to those whom God has gifted—toward the deformed, the old, the suffering!"

I slipped down stairs to Arethusa; and when Mr. Winnesle next saw me I was braiding up the locks which it was her highest enjoyment to have me arrange; and I saw by his smile that the cloud on his heart had passed away.

So glided on the days to autumn, peacefully as a calm river; and I would that they had all glided on thus to the ocean of eternity. The close October wind came rushing through the trees; leaves of crimson and gold were lying on the Episcopal walks; and "the fields were ripe for the harvest."

Mr. Winneslie would sit, with bowed head, listening to the autumn wind as it wailed the dirge of summer; and melancholy foreboding crept into his heart, and checked the smile upon his lips.

"It is always so," said Arethusa, in answer to my questioning; "as often as the autumn comes round he looks himself in his study for days together. He wants cheering; but I scarcely know what to say to him."

"May I come in?" said I, as I knocked softly at the door of the study.

"This room is always open to you, Fairy," was the kind reply, as Mr. Winneslie raised a sorrow-shaded face from the desk on which he had been leaning.

"But what is the matter?" he continued, as he noticed my eyes.

They were full of tears; for I held in my hand a letter from Hester, and she said that I must return, a more lucrative situation had been found for me. It was worded coarsely, even for her; and I sank down on the sofa and sobbed aloud.

"Ernestine," said Mr. Winneslie, as he seated himself beside me and took my hand, "do you then so very much regret leaving us?"

"They can not make me go!" I replied, passionately. "I will never return to them!"

"There is one way," said Mr. Winneslie, "by which you could remain with us always; would you accept it, Ernestine?"

I looked into the deep, loving eyes that were bent upon me, and knew that he was asking me to become his wife. My heart throbbed quickly at his unpremeditated words; but I was not—I dared not. He was too good, too noble and elevated for a foolish girl like me; but he would let me say no more; and I was only conscious that his arm was around me, and I was sobbing convulsively, with my head resting on his shoulder.

"This will not do, Fairy," said he, with his kind smile; "you must cheer up, my child, instead of crying yourself; for remember that you have promised to marry an old man, who will be always sighing and complaining."

I smiled back through my tears, but I feared not; my ship was safely moored in a firm harbor.

"Dear wife him, dearest," said Arethusa, as she kissed me again and again in the overflowing gladness of her heart. "He has troubles that none but a wife can relieve; may you indeed prove a helpmate to Arthur!"

I smiled as I laid my head upon my pillow. These sentences were very proper for a woman of Arethusa's age; but a giddy girl of nineteen was far from considering so deeply. Had I written the story of the marriage-day, you would, doubtless, have run thus: "I, Ernestine, take thee, Arthur, to be my wedded husband, to receive from me all the favors that you choose to bestow, all the love that you can conveniently spare, to be considered by you as the idol to whose wishes all other wills must bow, and promise in return—to be satisfied." Who could expect more?

I received from the place I had called home a letter that was in fact a certificate of dismissal; in which Hester entirely washed her hands of me, and could scarcely conceal her joy at the pleasing performance. In answer to my invitation she said that "she had no time for such nonsense as weddings."

It wounded me at first; but Mr. Winneslie came to look over my head, and I forgot all but that I was to be a clergyman's wife.

We were married. A white-haired clergyman from a neighboring town performed the ceremony; and I stood leaning on Mr. Winneslie's arm, and received the congratulations of those around.

My wedding-day had achieved a triumph of the needle in my white muslin dress; and the long brown curls were suffered to float beneath the bridal veil. Arthur had twisted those curls around his finger; they were precious in his sight, and I would not have them put back.

So Arethusa kissed and arranged them with a sigh, as she thought of the childish-looking bride I would make; and even the clergyman seemed surprised when his eye first rested on me. But Mr. Winneslie was satisfied; his responses came from a heart trembling beneath its weight of happiness, and I feared nothing as I looked forward into the future.

The guests were heavy-looking men, thrifty wives, and young women who were so stiff and exact that the discipline of dress seemed painful to them. They were an old assemblage who filled the parlor of the Parsonage on my wedding-day; but Arethusa passed among them in mysterious ceremonies with the manner of one who was quite satisfied with her guests.

The carriage was at the door; my traveling-dress was ready; and in a few moments I was whirled off for my first peep at the world under the guidance of my new guardian.

How, child as I was, it appeared to me like an ever-brilliant panorama, and how Mr. Winneslie lived over again his own youth in my enthusiasm, are still fresh in my memory.

A REGRET.

I WALK with memory through the blooms
Spring's tender fingers spread;
The lark amid the faint perfumes
Sings gayly overhead.
With joyful sounds the woodlands ring;
The wild brook flashes on;
The honey-bee is on the wing—
But she is dead and gone!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1860.

A NEW SERIAL BY DICKENS.

WE publish in this number the first of "a series of occasional journeys" by "an uncommercial traveler," said traveler being Charles Dickens, Esq., and the journeys being actual tours and trips made by him in search of the picturesque, the interesting, and the unknown. The first journey, of which we publish the record herewith, was to the scene of the wrecks of the Royal Charter. It is in Dickens's most powerful manner.

It was by sketches of real life—reports, in fact—that Dickens first won his fame. We have no doubt that this new series will sustain the reputation he has won as a novelist; each journey will, in fact, be a tale complete in itself.

We have purchased from Mr. Dickens the right of publishing these journeys in advance of their appearance in this country.

SOMETHING FOR THE LEGISLATURE TO DO.

IT may seem childish to suggest useful subjects for legislation to the members of the Legislature of New York, as every one sees that that body is engrossed in corrupt schemes for the establishment of monopolies and trusts, and for the plunder of the railroad companies which are now in existence.

Still, we believe, doubtless, among the members of the Senate and Assembly a few individuals who are conscious of their duties, and who do not consider di-bones gain the whole purpose of their legislative career, we venture to suggest that the recent catastrophes in tenement houses and manufacturing establishments in this and other cities within the State call loudly for legislative interference.

The accident in Elm Street—which we described in our last number, and by which a score of persons lost their lives—was not the only necessity for adopting a law by which the owners of tenement houses shall be bound to provide their inmates with suitable means of escape in case of fire. Various other accidents of a somewhat quite a number of fire-escapes have been suggested. We do not intend to try to discriminate among them. It is clear that some remedy should be adopted; the most practical plan would be that the Legislature should create competent fire-wardens for the city, and leave to them the responsibility of deciding what is, and what is not, an adequate safeguard against fire.

In like manner, inspectors of steam-boilers should be appointed, whose duty it should be to examine all boilers in use in large cities; and no one should be allowed to use a boiler until its safety had been certified by those inspectors. We have no doubt but a large majority of the steam-boilers at present in use in the city are unsafe: the iron being, in most cases, entirely unsuited for the intended purposes.

Many lives will be saved if the Legislature passes the requisite laws on these subjects. We will only add that, as the Mayor of New York seems a good deal occupied with party political affairs, he may not have time to attend to such matters, and the appointment of the inspectors had better be left to the Governor.

THE NEW ERA IN FRANCE.

WE published in our last number the points of the recent manifesto of the Emperor of the French on the subject of free trade, in which Napoleon III. announced his intention of using his power and all the means of the French Government to develop agriculture and industry throughout his empire, and to abolish the old-fashioned restrictions which, in the guise of protection, have so long hampered the progress of enterprise among the French. It may safely be said that, momentous and astounding as many of Napoleon's previous measures have been, this is the greatest wonder and the greatest triumph of them all.

Hitherto many British manufactures have been wholly excluded from France. British cutlery and many descriptions of British textile wares have been contraband. On the other hand, all kinds of raw materials—cotton, wool, sugar, coal, and iron—have paid enormous, and in some cases almost prohibitive, duties. The consequence has been—first, high prices for all articles of consumption, which either "protected" by the tariff or which were made from commodities heavily taxed at their admission into the country; and, secondly, a stagnant and often a retrogressive state of industry, consequent upon the want of competition.

With the marvelous sagacity which has marked every step in the career of the Emperor of the French, Napoleon is now going to lay the axe to the root of these evils. He proposes to admit British manufactures into France on payment of a moderate duty. And he proposes to admit, free of duty, all such articles as cotton, wool, and sugar, which enter into manufactures. Thus the French manufacturers, if they wish to retain their home markets, will need to better themselves; to avail themselves of all the resources of modern science; to work well and cheaply, and to sell cheaply. They will be enabled to purchase their raw materials at a lower rate than usual; but for the rest they will have to trust to themselves.

The inevitable result of these measures will be a large increase of commercial and industrial activity in France. No unbiased person can carefully study the result of the free trade system in England without coming to the conclusion that free trade is the surest system for a country which seeks manufacturing and commercial development. Protection blights the very interests it is expected to serve; free trade fosters every interest. For, in plain words, free trade throws the burdens of taxes upon stagnant and unproductive property, while protection imposes upon traffic and enterprise the burden of supporting the idle and lucky politic.

Under the new French system we expect to see France rise to a new and unexampled pitch of prosperity. England already proposes to reciprocate, by abolishing the present duties on French wines and silks. We should be large gainers by the abolition of the present duties on cotton; and when the promised boon is granted it would be wise and politic for us to follow the French example, by removing some of the heaviest duties which now impede our import trade from France.

THE LOUNGER.

PUDDLE-PHILOSOPHY.

THE conceit of Expansionists is one of the commonest forms of conceit, because every body supposes his own tooth aches more than any body's else ever did or could. A man who has not constant twinges in his gums feels a kind of scornful superiority of the man who has not. His conviction is that nobody has had any trouble worth having until he has had the toothache. That is, we all try other people by the test of our own experience. "You've always had your own way, my dear," says he; "it's good for you to have a little suffering," somebody remarks, with ludicrous conceit, to his neighbor.

"How are you, my dear neighbor," do you call this suffering? Why this is only a smart toothache. I can go to sleep on this. Wait till you've had inflammation of the lungs, or the typhus measles—in bed for eighteen months. Wait till you've had your leg amputated, and then ere all. Wait till you've felt a cancer in your breast, which I am dying, and then talk to me of a 'little suffering.'"

For what is human life but such sufferings? A man buries his mother, and we all think that he now begins to know something about the stern realities of life. Why! the man has been heartbroken all his life for reasons of which we all know nothing; and he has been so much our master that we never knew that there was the matter. And if the man loses a fortune, and we all fall to and talk about discipline and trial and the rest of it. We pish a long time, and yawn and long dismally that he may be taught by trial. Yes, and he is taught by trial. Taught so well by trials which were real and which he doesn't especially care about, this purely external circumstance. Taught indeed by trials of which outsiders know nothing.

Why, then, should we magnify the toothache because that is our particular form of trial? Some men are tried by poverty, and their friends live luxuriously, sleep soundly, lie soft in whatever money can buy or skill prepare; you and I look on, and think that he is getting a great round of good solid twinges in the gums to make him all right! Suppose now that we look into the core of the fruit and see that it is worm-holes. Perhaps we will think it a pity that such a blooming perfection should not have had a few bumps and bruises.

If, as has sometimes been experience inspires, trial is necessary to the strengthening and development of character, we may be very sure that no body escapes. Every body has his own person. Something stirs and moulds your whole life which is nothing to another man; as a gust blows a puddle in one boy over and he is in tears, while another boy will ripple the neighboring sea. "Godfrey!" cries the Puddle, "what a gale there is to-day!" The Puddle is perfectly right. It is wind for a puddle. But then Puddle-philosophy is no rule for the ocean.

Nobody knows when he has had trials of another man's life come to him. In fact they are only suspected sometimes by the greater cheerfulness and hilarity, by the calm opulence of all trial. But let Angela in the convent wore a garment next her skin which was lined with the points of pins turned inward and piercing the flesh. Outwardly she wore clean linen on her person and sweet smiles upon her face. The other sisters knew when she had added pins, and they increased the torture only by the greater calmness and sweetness of her smiling. One day the youngest of all the sisters who had just come and knew nothing of the rule of fire, said to her:

"Dear Angela, how happy you are! Are you not afraid of such unmixed enjoyment? Ah, dear, if you could only have a turn of toothache it would do you so much good!"

Angela smiled, and, going to her cell, added a hundred pins. But when she came in to vespers the youngest of the sisters looked at her, trumpeted by holy smiles, and said to herself: "Poor dear Angela! if she could only have some trials!"

You will find the instance in any neighboring volume of the Domestic Saints.

LET WELL ENOUGH ALONE.

SOMEBODY in the Legislature proposes to meddle with the management of the Central Park. Before any action is taken it is greatly to be wished that the whole body of law-makers would visit the Park and see what it is, and what it is going to be, and should understand that the present improvements which have been achieved by a management which profoundly understands the character of the work, and which has accomplished its ends with an impartiality and satisfaction to nearly every concerned entirely unparalleled in the history of our public works.

Of course the real object of any interference whatsoever is a political object. The pretense may be economy; the intention is to construct partisan machinery. Now the Central Park is quite beyond the realm of politics. It chanced, indeed, to be organized under the auspices of one of the great parties, but that was only chance. It has been administered for the exclusive political advantage of that party, the other might justly claim a share in the spoils and endeavor by every means to obtain the control. But it is not so. The architect in charge has been scrupulously careful to banish politics altogether; and as he is an honest man he has not, under this plea, only the more skillfully promoted partisan objects. He has pushed the work forward as if there were but one party in the country, and that one anxious to complete at the earliest moment a magnificent public enterprise worthy the city of which it is the chief ornament, and of the country whose generous spirit it represents.

Had the chance fallen to the other party, and the work been done in the same way, there is not a man in a million who is competent to speak to the point, who would not have desired to leave it entirely in the hands of the architect appointed by that party. Of course nobody expects that there are not gentlemen enough in the other party than that which is represented by a majority of the Commission to fill the place of Commissioner with the utmost ability; but when a change is projected which involves the discharge of duties in the work itself, why not abstain? why not let well-enough, or rather as-good-as-possible, alone?

The Central Park is undoubtedly an expensive work. Did the city of New York suppose it was to have a park worthy to take rank, directly upon its completion, with the finest parks in the world without paying well for it? And being well under way, does the city desire to have that work suspended or stopped, that speculators may come to line their own nests? As we said long ago, it is a miracle that so honest a work should have been so honestly done. Let it be left to its own opinion. Let it, then, proceed as begun, and stand as a monument of the truth that the people were better than their government.

TRAPS.

ALL learning from experience is simply shutting the door after the horse is stolen. It is an effort to keep the cow, at least, now that the horse is gone. The city of New York has done its work, but goes upon the principle that it is better to save some than lose all. Therefore the lessons of experience with the fire-traps are studied at all; and they are the sharpest spur to action. When a parent has lost a darling child from disease contracted under particular circumstances, he will be very sure to avoid those conditions in the case of his other children.

Is not the city of New York the parent of her citizens? A Niobe of stone, sometimes, rather than of flesh, if you please, but still a Niobe. What, then, does she mean to do about the case of eighteen citizens by five in a tenement house? Eighteen people are burned in a dwelling-house of five stories high, between nine and twelve o'clock in the evening, because the staircase is at once contracted, and there are no ladders or fire-escapes any where adequate to the occasion.

Undoubtedly the fewer laws the better; but only when the few laws are adequate to the event proposition, gravely made in a certain State, to make the calling of names in the street a penal offense, is a farce. A ludicrous law does not avail individual liberty which it is wiser for society to indulge than to restrain. But the care of life and property is the first duty of society and the city justly takes measures to protect the pedestrian from falling into excavations in any street, so it ought to guard against the probability of such accidents as that in Elm Street.

Because the probability is that a fire in all tenement houses will not be constructed, it would occasion the same terrible results. They are only traps, ordinarily set to catch incomes for owners, and, involuntarily, to catch the lives of the inmates; and they should be just as severely subjected to supervisory law as steamboilers.

And if the city be incompetent to enact such laws, let the Legislature do it. The Legislature is now engaged in the work of railroad bills, and are introduced every day, for every purpose. Who will give notice of a bill to prevent the taking of human beings in tenement traps?

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—JAMES, Kensington, Pennsylvania. The verses are hardly worthy of publication. As to continuing to write poetry, the rule is very simple. No man ever hurt himself by practicing versification in late moments, though perhaps there are many studies more useful. But as to writing poetry for a living, no sane person should think of it. Alfred Tennyson and Longfellow would have starved if they had had no other resource than their Muse to support them.

—G. F. S. Captain Mayne Reid is a real name, and he is alive and writing, as a fresh book from his pen evinces.

—"A Sentimental Friendship," by DAISY, of Louisville, is respectfully declined.

—The obliging offer of CALLENDER is declined, very respectfully, from want of space.

—MARIE. You may read of the Lady of Shalott in the old Arthur romance. But the significance of the picture you must ponder for yourself. What is the "meaning" of Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner"?

HON. J. L. M. CURRY, OF ALA.

HON. J. L. M. CURRY, of Alabama, is a native of Lincoln County, Georgia, where he was born in June, 1825. His father, Colonel William Curry, a wealthy planter, removed with his family to Talladega County, Alabama, in 1838, and settled in the beautiful valley bordering on the picturesque mountain range known as the Hillabee country.

The Curry family are of Scotch descent—a fact remembered and appreciated by them with a pride characteristic and peculiar to the Caledonian race.

On his maternal ancestry nothing more need be said in this connection than that his mother was a Lamar—a name honorably and inseparably connected with the history of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Texas.

The subject of this brief sketch graduated at the University of the native State in 1843. When a student at college he devoted much of his time to the library and literary societies of the institution. Here, by habits of temperance which yielded to no temptation, and by an industrious zeal which knew no tiring, he laid the foundation, in solid principles and elegant attainments, of a brilliant career of usefulness which has from its commencement known nothing but success. Soon after leaving the University of Georgia he entered the law-school at Harvard University, Massachusetts, from which institution he received a diploma in 1845. On his return home he opened an office in the town of Talladega, where, for two years, he devoted himself, with abundant evidence of future success, to the practice of his profession.

In 1846 he enlisted as a soldier in the Mexican war, and served during a part of that campaign in a company of Texas Rangers. In 1847 he was married to Miss Ann, youngest daughter of Chancellor Bowie; and, bidding adieu to clients, courts, and fees, for not the less arduous but more congenial and fascinating field of politics, was, in the same year, chosen by the Democracy of Talladega County a member of the State Legislature—a position to which he was re-elected in 1853 and 1855. While a member of the Legislature, although young in years, he soon distinguished himself, not only as an orator and parliamentary debater of a high order, but as a committee man ever faithful in the discharge of his duties.

The canvass of 1855, conducted by Messrs. Curry and Parsons, though limited in range, was probably not less brilliant than was the canvass of the same year in the Old Dominion. In that, as in this, the "invisible Sam" was totally routed —the "Black Knight, with his vizor down," was met and conquered. In 1856 Mr. Curry was appointed by the Democratic State Convention an elector for the 7th Congressional District. In 1857 he was elected, without opposition, to represent the people of that district in the 35th national Congress; and was, again without opposition, re-elected in 1859.

On entering Congress—by force of talent, not political tact—he soon occupied a prominent position, and is now, in that unwieldy body, one of the few members who can, in addressing the Chair, command the ear of the House.

In delivery Mr. Curry's style is bold, energetic, and rapid—fluent in the use of words well-selected, chaste, and expressive. His speeches read well; but when delivered in his strong, shrill, well-cultivated voice—whether they soothe, excite, or electrify—they never fail to interest an audience.

In politics Mr. Curry is a Democrat of the Calhoun school; and without ill-feelings toward any section, he is devoted to his native South and her institutions, and to the Union administered under a strict construction of the Constitution. In the principles of "State Rights" he was early indoctrinated, and from them he is as immovable by outside influences as are the blue hills of the "Benighted Seventh."

July 1st.—The confusion of their arrival has had time to subside. Two days have elapsed since the return of the travelers; and that interval has sufficed to put the new machinery of our lives at Blackwater Park in fair working order. I may now return to my journal with some little chance of being able to continue the entries in it as collectedly as usual.

I think I must begin by putting down an old remark which has suggested itself to me since Laura came back.

When two members of a family, or two intimate friends, are separated, and one good abroad and one remains at home, the return of the relative or friend who has been traveling always seems to place the relative or friend who has been staying at home at a painful disadvantage, when the two first meet. The sudden encounter of the new thoughts and new habits eagerly gained in the one case, with the old thoughts and old habits passively preserved in the other, seems, at first, to part the sympathies of the most loving relatives and the fondest friends, and to set a sudden strangeness, unexpected by both and uncontrollable by both, between them on either side. After the first happiness of my meeting with Laura was over, after we had sat down together, hand in hand, to recover breath enough and calmness enough to talk, I felt this strangeness instantly, and I could see that she felt it too. It has partially worn away, now that we have fallen back into most of our old habits, and it will probably disappear before long. But it has certainly had an influence over the first impressions that I have formed of her, now that we are living together again—for which reason only I have thought fit to mention it here.

She has found me unaltered; but I have found her changed.

Changed in person, and, in one respect, changed in character. I can not absolutely say that she is less beautiful than she used to be: I can only say that she is less beautiful to me. Others, who do not look at her with my eyes and my recollections, would probably think her improved. There is more color, and more decision and roundness of outline in her face than there used to be; and her figure seems more firmly set, and more sure and easy in all its movements than it was in her maiden days. But I miss something when I look at her—something that once belonged to the happy, innocent life of Laura Fairlie, and that I can not find in Lady Glyde. There was, in the old times, a freshness, a softness, an ever-varying and yet ever-remaining tenderness of beauty in her face, the charm of which it is not possible to express in words—or, as poor Hartright used often to say, in painting, either. This is gone. I thought I saw the faint reflection of it, for a moment, when she turned pale under the agitation of our sudden meeting, on the evening of her return; but it has never reappeared since. None of her letters had prepared me for a personal change in her. On the contrary, they had almost painfully, recalled to my memory the days of her girlhood and the happy by-gone time when there were no secrets between us.

"Whenever you and I are together, Marian," she said, "we shall both be happier and easier with one another if we accept my married life for what it is, and say and think as little about it as possible. I would tell you every thing, darling, about myself," she went on, nervously buckling and unbuckling the ribbon round my waist, "if my confidences could only end there. But they could not—they must go on into confidences about my husband, too; and, now I am married, I think I had better avoid them, for his sake and for your sake, and for mine. I don't say that they would distress you, or distress me—I wouldn't have you think that for the world. But—I want to be so happy, now I have got you back again; and I want you to be so happy too—" She broke off abruptly, and looked round the room, my own sitting-room, in which we were talking. "Ah!" she cried, clapping her hands with a bright smile of recognition, "another old friend found already! Your book-case, Marian—your dear little-shabby-old-satin-wood bookcase—how glad I am you brought it with you from Limmeridge! And your work-box, just as untidy as ever! And the horrid, heavy, man's umbrella that you always would walk out with when it rained! And, first and foremost of all, your own dear, dark, clever gipsy-face, looking at me me just as usual! It is so like home again to be here. How can we make it more like home still? I will put my father's portrait in your room instead of in mine—and I will keep all my little treasures from Limmeridge here—and we will pass hours and hours every day with them: four friendly walls round us. Oh, Marian!" she said, suddenly seating herself on a footstool at my knees, and looking up earnestly in my face, "promise me you will never marry, and leave me. It is selfish to say so, but you are so much better off as a single woman—unless—unless you are very fond of your husband—but you won't be very fond of any body but me, will you?" She stopped again; crossed my hands on my lap; and laid her face on them. "Have you been writing many letters, and receiving many letters, lately?" she asked, in low, suddenly-altered tones. I understood what the question meant; but I thought it my duty not to encourage her by meeting her half-way. "Have you heard from him?" she went on, coaxing me to forgive the more direct appeal on which she now ventured, by kissing my hands, upon which her face still rested. "Is he well and happy, and getting on in his profession? Has he recovered himself—and forgotten me?"

She should not have asked those questions. She should have remembered her own resolution, on the morning when Sir Percival held her to her marriage engagement, and when she resigned the book of Hartright's drawings into my hands forever. But, ah me! where are the faultless human creature who can persevere in a good resolution without sometimes failing and falling back? Where is the woman who has ever really torn from her heart the image that has been once fixed in it by a true love? Books tell us that such unearthly creatures have existed—but what does our own experience say in answer to books?

I made no attempt to remonstrate with her: perhaps because I sincerely appreciated the fearless candor which let me see what other women in her position might have had reasons for concealing even from their dearest friends—perhaps because I felt, in my own heart and conscience, that, in her place, I should have asked the same questions and had the same thoughts. All I could honestly do was to reply that I had not written to him or heard from him lately, and then to turn the conversation to less dangerous topics.

There had been much to sadden me in our interview—my first confidential interview with her since her return. The change which her marriage has produced in our relations toward each other, by placing a forbidden subject between us, for the first time in our lives; the melancholy conviction of the dearth of all warmth of feeling, of all close sympathy, between her husband and herself, which her own unwilling words now force on my mind; the distressing discovery that the influence of that ill-fated attachment still remains (no matter how innocently, how harmlessly) rooted as deeply as ever in her heart—all these are disclosures to sadden any woman who loves her as dearly, and feels for her as acutely, as I do. There is only one consolation to set against them—a consolation that ought to comfort me, and that does over to a new page; and my pen shall let Laura's husband wipe his present.

The two guests—the Count and Countess Fosco—come next in my catalogue. I will dispose of the Countess first, so as to have done with the woman as soon as possible.

Laura was certainly not chargeable with any exaggeration in writing me word that I should hardly recognize her aunt again when we met. Never before have I beheld such a change produced in a woman by her marriage as has been produced in Madame Fosco. As Eleanor Fairlie (aged seven-and-thirty), she was always taking pernicious nostrums, and always worrying the unfortunate men with every small accusation which a weak and foolish woman can impose on long-suffering male humanity. As Madame Fosco (aged three-and-forty), she sits for hours together without saying a word, or taxes up in the strangest manner in herself. The hideously ridiculous love-locks which used to hang on either side of her face are now replaced by stiff little rows of very short curls, of the sort that one sees in old-fashioned wigs. A plain unstrung pearl necklace lies in her bosom, and makes her look, for the first time in her life since I remember her, like a decent woman. Nobody (putting her husband out of the question, of course) now sees in her what every body once saw—I mean the structure of the female skeleton, in the upper regions of the clavicular-bones and the shoulder-blades. Clad in quiet black or gray gowns, made high round the throat—actress as that she would have laughed at or screamed at, as the whim of the moment inclined her, in her maiden days—she looks, and looks nothing else, her dry white hands (so dry that the pores of her skin look chalky) incessantly engaged, either in mechanical needlework, or in rolling up endless little cigarettes for the Count's own particular smoking. On the few occasions when I have seen her eyes out of her work they are generally turned on her husband, with the look of mute submissive inquiry which we see in the eyes of a dog or a cat, by a faithful dog. The only approach to an inward flutter which I have yet detected under her outer covering of repose, is the nervous hurry itself, once or twice, in the form of a suppressed eyelash, getting out of position. When she loses (the maids included) to whom the Count speaks, or on whom he looks, with any thing approaching to special interest expressed, except in this one particular, she is always, morning, noon, and night, in-doors and out, fair weather or foul, is cold and clammy to the metaphysician as the stone out of which it is cut. For the common purposes of society the extraordinary change thus implied in Mrs. Fairlie need not doubt, a change for the better, seeing that it has transformed her into a civil, silent, submissive woman, as the world goes. But, How far she is really reformed or deteriorated in her secret self is another question. I have once or twice seen signs in her which have made suspicion may have sealed up something dangerous in her, locked up under the seven-times-heated-ness of the freedom of her former life. It is quite possible that I may be altogether wrong in this idea. My own impression, however, is, that I am right. Time will show.

And the magician who has wrought this wonderful transformation—the accomplished artist who has tamed this once wayward Englishwoman till her own relations hardly know her again—the Count himself? What of the Count?

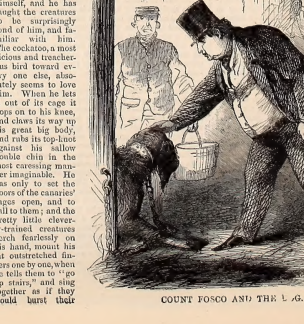
This, in two words: He looks like a man who could tame any thing. If he had married a tigress, instead of a woman, he would have tamed the tigress. If he had married we, I should have made his cigarettes as his wife does—I should have held my head on a platter, ready for use, as she holds hers.

I am almost afraid to confess it, even to these secret pages. The man has interested me, has attracted me, has forced me to like him. Is my short hair to be less admired, my straight into my favorable estimation—and how he has worked the miracle is more than I can tell.

It absolutely startles me, as I say it to my mind, to find how plainly I see him!—how much more plainly than I see Sir Percival, or Mr. Fairlie, or any other person of my own absent person of whom I think, with the one exception of Laura herself! I can hear his voice, as if he was speaking at this moment. I know what his conversation was yesterday as well as if I was hearing it now. How am to describe him? There are peculiarities in his personal appearance, his habits, and his amusements which I should blame in the boldest terms, or ridicule in the most merciless manner, if I had seen them in another man. What is it that makes me unable to blame them or to ridicule them in him?

For example, he is immensely fat. Before this time I have always cordially disliked corpulent humanity. I have always maintained that the popular notion of connecting excessive grossness of size and good-humor as inseparable allies was equivalent to declaring, either that no people but amiable people ever did fat, or that the decided addition of so many pounds of flesh has a directly favorable influence over the disposition of the person on whose body they accumulate. I have invariably combated both these absurd assertions by quoting examples of fat people who were as mean, vicious, and cruel as the leanest and the worst of their neighbors. I have asked whether Henry the Eighth was an amiable character? whether Pope Alexander the Sixth was a good man? Whether Mr. Murderer and Mrs. Murderess Manning were not both unusually stout people? Whether hired nurses, proverbially as cruel a set of women as are to be found in all England, were not, for the most part, also as fat a set of women as are to be found in all England? And so on, through dozens of other examples, modern and ancient, native and foreign, high and low. Holding these strong opinions on the subject with might and main, as I do at this moment, here, nevertheless, is Count Fosco, as fat as Henry the Eighth himself, established in my favor, at one day's notice, without let or hindrance from his own odious corpulence. What can it mean?

Is it his face that has recommended him? It may be his face. He is a most remarkable likeness, on a large scale, of the Great Napoleon. His features have Napoleon's magnificent regularity: his general mien recalls the grandly calm, immovable power of the Great Soldier's face. This striking resemblance certainly impressed me, to begin with; but there is something in him besides the resemblance which has impressed me more. I think the influence I feel myself ready to find is in his eyes. They are the most unfathomable gray eyes I ever saw; and they have at times a cold, clear, beautiful, irresistible glitter in them which forces me to look at him, and yet causes me sensations, when I do look, which I would rather not feel. Other parts of his face and head have their strange peculiarities. His complexion, for instance, has a singular sallow-fairness, so much at variance with the dingy-black color of his hair that I suspect the hair of being a wig; and his face, closely shaven all over, is smoother and freer from all marks of wrinkles than mine, though (according to Sir Percival's account of him) he is three-and-sixty years of age. But these are not the prominent personal characteristics which distinguish him, to my mind, from all the other men I have ever seen. The marked peculiarity which singles him out from the rank and file of humanity lies entirely, so far as I can tell at present, in the extraordinary expression and extraordinary power of his eyes.



His manner, and his command of our language, which greatly assist him, in some degree, to establish himself in my good opinion. He has that quiet deference, that look of pleased attention implying a listening to a woman, and that secret gentleness in his voice, in speaking to her (whether she be clever, or whether she be not), which, say what we may, we can none of us resist. Here, too, his unusual command of the English language necessarily helps him. I had often noticed the extraordinary aptitude which many Italians show in mastering our strong, hard Northern speech; but, until I saw Count Fosco, I had never suspected it possible that any foreigner could have spoken English as he speaks it. There are times when it is almost impossible to detect, by his accent, that he is not a countryman of our own; and, as for fluency, there are very few born Englishmen who can talk with the same command and repetitions as the Count. He may construct his sentences, more or less, in the foreign way; but I have never yet seen him at a loss for a word, or expression, or hesitate for a moment in his choice of a word.

All the smallest characteristics of this strange man have something strikingly original and perplexingly contradictory in them. Fat as he is, and old as he is, his movements are astonishingly light and easy. He is as noiseless in a room as we are (and, more than that, with all his look of unmistakable mental firmness and power, he is as nervously sensitive as a woman. He starts at chance noises as irritatingly as Laura herself. He winced and shuddered yesterday when Sir Percival beat one of his dogs, so that I felt ashamed of my own want of tenderness and sensibility by comparison with the Count.

The relation of this last incident reminds me of one of his most curious peculiarities, which I have not yet mentioned—his extraordinary fondness for pet animals. Some of these he has left on the Continent, and has brought with him to this house a cockatoo, two canaries, and a whole family of white mice. He attends to the necessities of these strange favorites himself, and has even taught the creatures to be surprisingly fond of him, and familiar with him. The cockatoo, a most vicious and treacherous bird toward every one else, absolutely seems to love him. When he lets it out of its cage it hops on to his knee, and claws its way up his great big body, and rubs its top-knot against his sallow double chin in the most caressing manner imaginable. He has only to set the door of the canaries' cages open, and to call to them, and the pretty little cleverly-trained creatures perch fearlessly on his hand, mount his fat outstretched fingers one by one, when he tells them to "go up stairs," and sing together as if they would burst their throats with delight, when they get to the top finger. His white mice live in a little pagoda of prettily painted wire-work, designed and made by himself. They are almost as tame as the canaries, and they are perpetually let out, like the canaries. They crawl all over him, popping in and out of his waistcoat, and sitting in couples, white as snow, on his extraordinary shoulders. He seems to be even fonder of his mice than of his other pets—smiles at them, and kisses them, and calls them by all sorts of endearing names. If it be possible to suppose an Englishman with any taste for such childish interests and amusements as these, that Englishman would certainly feel rather ashamed of them, and would be anxious to apologize for them in the company of grown-up people. But the Count, apparently, sees nothing ridiculous in the amazing contrast between his colossal self and his frail little pets. He would blandly kiss his white mice, and twitter to his canary-birds amidst an assembly of English fox-hunters, and would only pity them as barbarians when they were all laughing their loudest at him.

It seems hardly credible, while I am writing it down, but it is certainly true, that this same man, who has all the fondness of an old maid for his cockatoo, and all the small dexterities of an organ-boy in managing his white mice, can talk, when any thing happens to rouse him, with a daring independence of thought, a knowledge of books in every language, and an experience of society in half the capitals of Europe, which would make him the prominent personage of any assembly in the civilized world. This trainer of canary-birds, this architect of a pagoda for white mice, is (as Sir Percival himself was told me) one of the first experimental chemists living, and has discovered, among other wonderful inventions, a means of petrifying the body after death, so as to preserve it, as hard as marble, to the end of time. This fat, bland, elderly man, whose nerves are so finely strung that he starts at chance noises, and winces when he sees a house-spaniel get a whipping, went into the stable-yard, on the morning after his arrival, and put his hand on the head of a chained bloodhound—a beast so savage that the very groom who feeds him keeps out of his reach. His wife and I were present, and I shall not soon forget the scene that followed, short as it was.

"Mind that dog, Sir," said the groom; "he flies at every body!" "He does that, my friend," replied the Count, quietly, "because every body is afraid of him. Let us see if he flies at us." And he laid his plump, yellow-white fingers, on which the canary-birds had been perching ten minutes before, upon the formidable brute's head, and looked him straight in the eyes. "You big dogs are all cowards," he said, addressing the animal contemptuously, with his face and the dog's almost touching each other. "You would kill a poor cat, you infernal coward. You would fly at a starving beggar, you infernal coward. Any thing that you can get mastery unawares—any thing that is afraid of your big body, and your wicked white teeth, and your slobbering, blood-thirsty mouth, is the thing you like to fly at. You could throttle me at this moment, my pretty, miserable baby! You daren't touch much as look me in the face, because I'm not afraid of you. Will you think better of it, and try your teeth in my fat neck? Ah! not you!" He turned away, laughing at the astonishment of the men in the yard; and the dog crept back meekly to his kennel. "Ah! my nice waistcoat!" he said, pathetically. "I am sorry I came here. Some of that brute's slobber has got on my pretty cream-waistcoat." Those words express another of his incomprehensible oddities. He is as fond of fine clothes as the veriest fool in existence; and has appeared in four magnificent waistcoats already—all of light garish colors, and all immensely huge even for him—in the two days of his residence at Blackwater Park.

COUNT FOSCO AND THE L. G.

His tact and cleverness in small things was quite as noticeable as the single but inconsistencies in his character, and the childish triviality of his ordinary tastes and pursuits.

I can see already that he means to live on excellent terms with all of us during the period of his sojourn in this place. He has evidently discovered that Laura secretly dislikes him (she confessed as much to me, when I pressed her on the subject),—but he has also found out that she is extravagantly fond of flowers. Whenever she wants a nosegay he has got one to give her, gathered and arranged by himself; and, presented to my amusement, he is always cunningly provided with a duplicate, composed of exactly the same flowers, grouped in exactly the same way, to appease his icily jealous wife, before she can so much as think herself aggrieved. His usual argument of the Countess (in public) is a sight to see. He bows to her; he habitually addresses her as "your ladyship;" he carries his cravings to pay her little visits on his fingers, and to sing to her; he kisses her hand, when she gives him his cigarette-case, he presents her with sugar-plums in return, which he puts into her mouth physically, from a box in his pocket. The rod of iron with which he rules her never appears in company—it is a private rod, and is always kept up stairs.

His method of recommending himself to me, is entirely different. He has discovered (Heaven only knows how) that ready-made sentiment is thrown away on me; that I detest flattery of every sort. And he flatters me to my heart's content! Yes! I can find him out when I am away from him: I know he flatters my vanity, when I think of him at home, in my own room—and yet, when I go down stairs, and get into his company again, he will blind me again, and I shall be flattered again, just as if I had never found him out at all! He can manage me as he manages his wife and Laura, as he managed the blood-hound in the stable-yard, as he manages Sir Percival himself, every hour in the day. "My good Percival! how I like your rough English home!" "My good Percival! how I enjoy your solid English sense!" He puts the rudest remarks Sir Percival can make on his effeminate taste and unmanly quietness of style from him in that manner—always calling the baronet by his Christian name; making him with the extremest politeness; putting him on the shoulder; and bearing with him benignantly, as a good-humored father bears with a wayward son.

The interest which I really can not help feeling in this strangely original man has led me to question him a little about his past life. Sir Percival either knows little, or will tell me little, about it. He and the Count first met, many years ago, in Italy, under the dangerous circumstances to which I have alluded elsewhere. Since that time they had been perpetually together in London and Paris, and in Vienna—never in Italy again; the Count having, oddly enough, not crossed the frontiers of his native country for the last ten years. Perhaps he has been made the victim of some political persecution? At all events, he seems to be patriotically anxious not to speak of any of his own countrymen who may happen to be in England. On the evening of the day when he asked how he and were from the nearest town, and whether we knew of any Italian gentlemen who might happen to be settled there. He is certainly in correspondence with people on the Continent, for his letters have all sorts of odd stamps on them; and I saw one of them this morning, waiting at his place at the breakfast-table, with a huge official-looking seal on it. Perhaps he is in correspondence with the government? And perhaps that is hardly to be reconciled either with my other idea that he may be a political exile.

How much I have to love written about Count Fosco! And what does it all amount to?—as poor, dear Mr. Gilmore would ask, in his impenetrably business-like way. I can only repeat that I do assuredly feel, even on this short acquaintance, a strange, half-willing, half-unwilling fascination for the Count. He seems to have established over me the same sort of ascendency which he has evidently acquired over Sir Percival. Free, and even rude, as he may occasionally be in his manner toward his fat friend, Sir Percival is nevertheless afraid, at times, plainly see, of giving any serious offense to the Count. I wonder whether I am afraid, too? I certainly am not a man, in all my experience, whom I should be so sorry to have for an enemy. Is this because I like him, or because I am afraid of him? Chi sa?—as Count Fosco might say in his own language. Who knows?

2d.—Something to chronicle to-day besides my own ideas and impressions. A visitor has arrived—quite unknown to Laura and to me; and, apparently, quite unexpected by Sir Percival, too.

We were all at lunch, in the room with the new French windows that open upon the verandah, and the Count (who devours pastry as I have never yet seen it devoured by any human beings but girls at boarding-schools) had just aroused us by asking gravely for his fourth tart, when the servant announced the visitor.

"Mr. Merriman has just come, Sir Percival, and wishes to see you immediately."

Sir Percival started, and looked at the man with an expression of angry alarm which silenced us all.

"Mr. Merriman?" he repeated, as if he thought his own ears must have deceived him.

"Yes, Sir Percival: Mr. Merriman, from London."

"Where is he?"

"In the library, Sir Percival."

He left the table the instant the last answer was given, and hurried out of the room without saying a word in any of us.

"Who is Mr. Merriman?" asked Laura, appealing to me.

"I have not the least idea," was all I could say in reply.

The Count had finished his fourth tart, and had gone to a side-table to look after his vicious pet cockatoo. He turned round to us, with the bird perched on his shoulder.

"Mr. Merriman is Sir Percival's solicitor," he said, quietly.

Sir Percival's solicitor. It was a perfectly straightforward answer to Laura's question; and yet, under the circumstances, it was not satisfactory. If Mr. Merriman had been specially sent for by his client there would have been nothing very wonderful in his coming town to obey the summons. But when a lawyer travels from London to Hampshire simply to pay a visit, and when his arrival at a gentleman's house is entirely unexpected by the gentleman himself, it may be safely taken for granted that the legal visitor is the bearer of some very important and very unexpected news—news which may be either very good or very bad, but which will not, in either case, be of the common, everyday kind.

Laura and I sat silent at the table for a quarter of an hour or more, wondering privately what had happened, and waiting for the chance of Sir Percival's speedy return. There were no signs of his return; and we rose to leave the room.

The Count, attentive as usual, advanced from his corner in the window, carrying the fat cockatoo, with the bird still perched on his shoulder, and opened the door for us. Laura and Madame Fosco went out first. Just as I was on the point of following them he made a sign with his hand, and spoke to me, before I passed him, in a whisper.

"Yes," he said, quietly answering the unexpressed idea at that moment in my mind, as if I had given it utterance in the plainest language—"yes, Miss Halcombe; something has happened."

I was on the point of answering, "I never said so." But the vicious cockatoo ruffled his clipped wings, and gave a screech that set all my nerves on edge. I drew back, and made me only too glad to get out of the room.

I joined Laura and Madame Fosco in the hall. The thought in her mind was the same as the thought in mine, which Count Fosco had surprised; and, as I passed them, they whispered to almost the echo of his. She too said to me, secretly, that she was afraid something bad happened.

THE FIRST IMPRESSION.

I WAS passing a farm-house in the suburbs of an active young city, when something about it attracted my attention. It was a large house, with a Similar patriarchal buildings I had often seen. Gambrel-roofed; prolific of additions of various sizes; a picturesque portico in front; chimneys suggestive of age and corpulence; brown; moss-flecked in the tips of the roof-shingles; blue bushes hiding the white wooden foundation; red-currant bushes nestling close to the walls, waiting patiently for the time when they should be ripe; thrifty sage loved in spite of their thorns; flower plats, in circles and irregular curves, peopled by pretty, ripped and sisters; a "stoop" with seats on each side; and pansy in its age like an English squire; on the right a well-sweep—

This last item I have command of a paragraph; for it is one of my idiosyncrasies to admire the whole fraternity. I like the well-sweep for its evident cheerfulness. I like it through its usefulness. Standing stiffly in its place, looking gravely at the stars, bowing now and then when hospitably famous, and always ready to take to the natural inclination of its vertebræ, it is the very personification of a grave, conscious dignity. This one was apparently new. It had a fresh-colored coat of paint. Its posture was at the reasonable angle, forty-five degrees. An antique moss bucket, in a pendent, it was not; but it was neat, and within the summits of a neatly-thinsel curb. Between it and the house, were various young fruit trees and vines, answering as a partial foil to the too impudent stare of passers. In fact, it was as cosmetic as appropriately decorated. Cheerful, kind, and courteous a well-sweep as you will find doing the squeuse honors at any farm-house in the land.

As I have confessed, all this I admire; and many might apply to many homesteads of my acquaintance. And yet this one fixed itself like a welcome-host in my mind. I had passed it, waved waves of my memory, and remained there for days. The next time I passed I leaped the fence, and called down the depths of the well, and, like a kind, and courteous a well-sweep as you will find doing the squeuse honors at any farm-house in the land.

As I have confessed, all this I admire; and many might apply to many homesteads of my acquaintance. And yet this one fixed itself like a welcome-host in my mind. I had passed it, waved waves of my memory, and remained there for days. The next time I passed I leaped the fence, and called down the depths of the well, and, like a kind, and courteous a well-sweep as you will find doing the squeuse honors at any farm-house in the land.

I was out shooting wild pigeons one day—I do not count them now, and I wonder very much that I could do it then—and I was passing through a farm upon my old friend the brown house. The sun was gilding the tops of the trees, and only the tops. The day had been bright and warm—the month was June—and the evening breeze from southwestern meadows entered windows and door-ways with a cool and grateful fragrance. Through an open door near the rear of the farm-house I caught a glimpse of the well-sweep. I left my gun and shot swayed to and fro with the gentle evening breeze; an old man, with locks as snowy as the cloth, was lifting his hand and bowing his head in reverent invocation. The picture was a pleasant, not to say a hallowing one. Continuing my walk to the other side of the house, and giving my accustomed bound, I marched along with the free carelessness of youth, turned the corner of a grape trellis, and—

The well-sweep was doing obeisance at the back of as pretty a cluster of clinging fingers and as beautiful a pair of arms, displayed by the falling drapery, as had ever kindled my admiration. I am not remarkable for presence of mind, but I remember thinking on the instant that if Providence had made me a well-sweep instead of an engraver, I should have come down with much less reluctance than the grim old star-gazer evinced. The old man's prayer had begun. I was slightly embarrassed. She was watching the descent of the bucket. Golden ringlets; a neat and beautifully-fitting chintz, covering a full, but not loose aprons, amounting to the neck, which housewives wear for protection during the lighter labors of the kitchen; a slightly pink flush—as I thought—to the not ungraceful effort, while the blush of exercise mounted to and tinted the alabaster of her neck, the features hidden by the bucket. Such was the apparition close before me.

Backsaws are often ungracious and obstinate. In the present instance the intractable thing refused to dip and fill. I could not shake and retreat like a coward. I, a native of the country, under no temptation, with the least dash of manliness in my temperament, could have done no less than I did. Stepping forward, and grasping the rope gently, I said, in such tone as a union of gallantry, deference, and frankness produced, "Let me help you." The young girl gave a momentary start of surprise, uttered a bit of an exclamation, lifted her head, tossing the tresses from brow and cheeks, and looked at me with a face—I will not describe it minutely, but her mien united self-possession and courtesy—as disdaining to be overmuch startled, and willing to meet the emergency with generous politeness. The effort at self-control sent back the flush of exertion till the lily superceded the rose. There are emergencies in which the mind seizes and sets great questions instantaneously. Within the compass of a second I had taken my impression of the face before me.

The taper fingers unclasped. "Thank you," she said, and stepped back, leaving down. I filled the bucket, drew it up, poured carefully from its brim till the table-pitcher, which, kneeling gracefully upon the ground, I had filled from lightning fingers, was full to overflowing. "Thank you," she repeated in the same musical tone; and only adding, but with a slight increase of color, "I send you a glass," entered the house. A boy of ten, bright-eyed and active, came with a goblet. I drank, returned it, and went away.

My mood was changed. Instead of bounding over the fence, I surmounted that obstacle to my progress by a gentle and gentleman-like manner. I thought upon the vision—upon contour, motion, features. Never before or since was my memory so powerful. I could not tell for the life of me what I had done through it!

That night, for my evening's lesson, I turned to the story of Rebekah by the well of Mesopotamia, and thought it very beautiful indeed.

I have not fallen in love since. I love at first sight" in its ordinary sense, and can only account for the conclusiveness of this "impression" through the following fact: I am sure to see my emergency may rouse the soul and bring it flashing from the features, as lightning reveals whole landscapes at a flash which might escape our eyes through the slow and measured marching of the dawn.

LITERARY.

A NEW AND SUPERB NATIONAL WORK is now in preparation. Mr. Lossing, the well-known author of the "Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution," published by the Messrs. Harper, is actively engaged in the collection and arrangement of materials for a complete illustrated history of the last war between the United States and Great Britain, to be entitled THE PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812. He expects to visit the important localities of the country of that war during the ensuing season; and, preparatory therefor, he has opened correspondence with reliable sources. In a circular prepared for that purpose, he says:

My plan is to give a complete History of the War—Political, Social, Historical, Biographical, and Pictorial—drawn from the most authentic sources opened by both parties in the contest, including its relative antecedents and consequents, and its connection with events of later years. It will be comprised in a single volume of at least eight hundred pages, uniform, in every particular, with the "Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." It will also be published by the same house, Messrs. Harper and Brothers.

To obtain much of the material for my FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION, I visited every battle-field, and conversed with our War for Independence, in the old Thirteen States and Canada; made sketches—board and reduced traditional and documentary history. Reminiscences—in a word, gleaned from the broad field where others had reaped before me, and from the fields I added to their store. I am pursuing a like course in the prosecution of my labors for the WAR OF 1812, and in GREAT BRITAIN. To facilitate my labor, I respectfully ask your kind response to each of the following questions as your memorandum, and return the circular, shall allow:

I. Is there any locality in your vicinity made memorable by an event connected with the War? If so, what is it? Near what city, village, or post-office is it? and by what public conveyance can it be reached?

II. Have you in possession, or are you cognizant of unpublished documents of historic value, which may be copied briefly for my use? publication in my work? If so, what? and how may such copies be obtained?

III. Are there veterans of the War, reliable as traditionary witnesses, residing in your vicinity? If so, what are the names of such persons, and their addresses?

IV. Have you in possession, or do you know of any pictorial sketches of military movements; fortifications; portraits of military officers; medals, particular localities, such as battle-grounds, head-quarters of officers, etc., etc., of the War?

V. Do you possess, or can you furnish, a brief biographical sketch of any man or men distinguished in the War, which has not been published? If so, of whom?

These questions are merely specific and general. I shall feel grateful to you for any historical information that may suggest itself to your mind.

In all cases the just rule will be observed, to give full credit to the source whence information shall be obtained; and a reciprocity of favor will be cheerfully accorded, if opportunity shall occur.

All documents, drawings, maps, or engravings which may be placed in my hands, shall be carefully kept from loss, and returned to the owner as soon as copied, if required, by such conveyance as he may direct.

I shall be glad to receive from you, as soon as you will regard this communication with favor; for I desire to make the work as full, truthful, and available as the degree of patient labor, artistic skill, and literary taste which I possess, will permit.

From address me at Poughkeepsie, Duchess county, New York, or through the Publishers, Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS, New York City.

Very respectfully yours, etc.,

BENSON J. LOSSING.

THE NEW BREAKER FROM CALIFORNIA.

Hon. Milton S. Latham was inaugurated governor of California on the 9th, nominated by the Democratic State convention on the 20th by the United States senate, and elected to that office on the next day. The vote stood—Latham 62,007; Downey, 57; Independents (Anti-Lecompton Dems.), 15—D. C. Shaft (Rep.), 2. Mr. Latham was a resident of San Francisco on the 5th of Washington. He is elected to fill the term of the late Senator Broderick, which expires in 1863, and will supercede Mr. Hunt, who was appointed by the Governor of California to the vacancy of the Legislature. Mr. Latham was a member of the House of Representatives in 1853–4, and resigned himself with the office of Secretary of State, but emigrated to Alabama in 1844, and from there to California. His election to the United States Senate was a surprise, not only to his competitors, but to the public.

LOSS OF THE "NORTHERNER."

The overland mail brings intelligence of the total loss of the steamer Northerner, Captain Dall, on Point Arena, off Cape Mendocino, while on the passage from San Francisco to the northern ports. Captain Dall was saved and the first and third officers, second engineer, pilot, fourteen of the crew, and eighteen passengers were lost. The mails were saved.

RIOT AMONG THE MARYLAND SECESSIONISTS.

On February 15, in the Maryland House of Delegates, resolutions were adopted condemning the course of Hon. Henry Winter Davis in voting for Mr. Pennington for Speaker of the House of Representatives as an act deserving of censure, in being in opposition to the sentiments of the people of the entire State. The resolutions were adopted by a vote of 44 and dissenting votes by the American delegates voted for the censure.

A resolution was also adopted for appointing a committee to wait on Governor Hicks, to inquire whether the newspaper statement that he had sent his Secretary of State to Washington to congratulate Mr. Pennington on his election was correct. Several members declared that they were authorized to say that the statement was unfounded; but the resolutions, notwithstanding, was published.

CONVICTION OF STEVENS.

The trial of Stevens, at Charlestown, was concluded on Saturday. No new evidence was adduced. The speeches of counsel were mostly of a political character. Mr. Sennott, counsel for the prisoner, going into a history of the late Congress of the Republican party. The jury was out fifteen minutes, and returned with a verdict of guilty on all the counts. The prisoner was unaffected by the announcement.

THE NEW LEGISLATURE.

The Kansas Legislature is burdened with business, which called extra sessions the members, who are, for the most part, inexperienced in legislation. After much debate on Indian, the Free-banking Slavery in the House passed by a vote of 39 to 6. The Territorial Census, just published, shows a population of 107,000 against a vote of 70,000 to 79,000. A Personal Liberty bill is now before the House, but its fate is deemed extremely doubtful.

PROPOSED MEDIATION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND CHINA.

The Chamber of Commerce, at a special meeting held on Thursday, adopted a memorial to the President of the United States, asking for the exercise of such friendly assistance with that of Great Britain for the restoration of peace with China, as might be deemed consistent with dignified, and proposing to abolish the practice of conditions that a vessel would of itself be sufficient to repeat private property in time of war. The documents were ordered to be printed.

VERDICT ON THE ELM STREET CALAMITY.

The Jury who investigated the Elm Street calamity yesterday, after a verdict censuring Mr. Wood, in favor of the building, for omitting to construct an iron stairway, or otherwise provide for the escape of the inmates, in case of fire, and called upon the Legislature to stringently enact that all such building to be occupied by a number of families shall be over five stories in height, and that all of them be provided with ample fire-escape ways, with doors opening upon them from each story.

SHOCKING DEATH OF HYDROPHOBIA.

About the beginning of November last Melissa Carter, of Hockory Grove township, Iowa, was bitten on the arm by a dog. The Davenport (Iowa) Gazette thus describes the result: "Last week she complained of a pain in her back and general indisposition. Showing her dog wound to one of her school companions last week, she said it was still painful, and her sores looked inflamed. Saturday afternoon she lay in bed. Sunday morning last she was taken convulsions on the sight of water. Her convulsions afterward were for a few minutes to over an hour in duration, and the case sensible hours before. During these spasms she snatched at every thing violently, chewed a napkin, and appeared to be made more frantic by the appearance of water, even by the lamplight. At times she shrieked fearfully, yet did not appear conscious. It was a horrid spectacle. Monday morning, during her rational moments, she called the family around her, and bade them an affectionate farewell, being fully sensible of her hopeless condition. Her convulsions gradually became weaker, and on Monday evening at half past five o'clock she quietly died. We learn these particulars from fugitive items we find in the Democratic, the letter of whom was with her almost constantly from Sunday morning till the hour of her death. Her death occurred about nine weeks after the date of the bite. The dog was also insensible to water, and became very bitey by this dog, nor any cattle, etc. The dog, a very large one, appeared perfectly well yesterday, and was utterly unknown in the neighborhood."

ACCIDENT TO MRS. BUCHANAN.

About half past eleven o'clock on Wednesday morning a sad accident occurred to Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher, residing in the avenue in the city of Brooklyn. The facts are as follows: Mrs. Beecher left home yesterday morning for the Long Island Rail Road depot, intending, taking two of her children with her in the wagon. All went on well until reaching the corner of Clinton and Heights, when the horse took flight and galloped wildly down Hicks Street. Mrs. Beecher, with admirable courage to have preserved her presence of mind, for on arriving at Pulaski Street she immediately saw that the only chance it would be to attempt to turn the horse either up or down the street, and therefore, with a firm hand, she attempted to push him straight ahead. The result shows that this course was equally if not more successful as to have turned and trusted to the chance of the horse being stopped by the Fulton ferry gates, which come into force against the Long Island Bank building, the consequence following such a catastrophe would have been. Beecher and one of the children quite seriously, and the other child slightly. The former was thrown violently up and conveyed to a drug store in the neighborhood, where an examination proved that her left leg was in two pieces of a very serious nature. It is said by those who witnessed the accident that Mrs. Beecher's head struck against the stone steps of the bank, which present a sharp angle.

ELOPEMENT AND REMORSE.

We read in the Chicago Herald: "A few days ago, one of our city merchants, a married man, absconded, thrown around him by an unsuiting wife, received upon leaving with a young lady of this city. It has been for very long time despotically sustain. He recently packed his trunks, and was preparing to start for New York, Boston, Albion, and St. Louis Railroad, and the young lady had secured tickets for Cincinnati, where she was to meet him. Word was sent to the wife of his intended flight, and the gentleman, who was entirely unconscious that his movements were watched, was followed. He wished to purchase a ticket for Cincinnati, but was informed by the time he had reached ——, a little station, a few miles this side of Albion, that the train had passed. He had not the moral courage to reveal his feeling to the guilty partner of his flight, and, becoming a deputy sheriff of this county, he begged him to extricate him from his predicament. His friend, the Sheriff, acted with reasonable demand, and when the absconding husband had seated himself in the train with his wife, who was reading a bogus warrant, arrested him and took him out of the car just as the train was moving, and refused to pursue her journey alone."

THE TERRIBLE FATE OF A ROPE DANCER.

On Saturday night, about 11 o'clock, a sad accident occurred at the Varieties Garden, No. 40 Bowery. Mrs. Josephine Diamond, a young and interesting female of German denomination was Mademoiselle Josephine Loverette, was announced to appear in the evening performance of a rope ascension from the stage to the gallery. She was to go up the rope attached to the stage, and when she got to the end of the rope was attached, to the stage, when the rope drew back and she descended in a sitting posture on the foot-lights, and was immediately in a there. The performance was suddenly suspended. The bowels and the head of the unfortunate woman, who was a musician in the orchestra, jumped up from their seats, and the other musicians, and, aided by employes of the theatre, who rushed from the rear, carried the unfortunate woman behind the scenes. In her fright the sufferer rushed wild, at about, hastily and unconsciously, and fell to the floor, and in this way very vestige of clothing was destroyed, and was carried home in a carriage to No. 48 Bayard Street, and attended by doctors; but her injuries were of such a serious nature that she died early on Sunday o'clock on Sunday morning, when she died. The unfortunate woman was but recently married. She was born in Livingston County, New York, in 1837, and took to the stage as a profession. It is said by her friends that she might not only support herself, but furnish assistance to her parents, who resided in Germany at the time. She has had engagements as a ballet dancer at Laura Keene's and Wallack's theatres. She appears to have always objected to her performing on the rope, fearing that some evil would befall her. Many such presentiments, which had often been expressed, was recalled to the mind of the sufferer when the performance was first announced, for almost the last words she uttered were, "Mother, I have to do this against my wishes, but I wanted to make money for you and the children."

PERSONAL.

Señor De Oviedo and his fair American bride left the St. Nicholas Hotel on Saturday, at one o'clock, and embarked on board the Quaker City steamer, bound for Havana, and a visit to his estate on the "ever faithful island." Many of the guests of the hotel and friends took leave of them on board the steamer, wishing them a happy voyage and safe return. Señor De Oviedo has a half that Señor De Oviedo has passed in the city and suburbs as he was not recently married. Among the large orders for the sun-staring of steam and other machinery for the Japan steamer is an order for the manufacture of his expensive for articles of taste and luxury—has a manner to suit the most fastidious. His establishment is palace, and handsome profits for those who have had his patronage.

Cardinal Antonelli passed the evening of December 31 at the palace of the Tuileries. The Emperor arrived at Rome, to see the old year out and the new year in. The principal attendance and guests of the Cardinal Antonelli for his distinguished guests, comprising several members of the Sacred College and the French and Austrian Embassadors, was the performance of a celebrated conjuror, who is now giving his performances at one of the principal salons in Rome. The Cardinal Secretary of State occupied the centre of the room, and other two guests were opposite the Emperor of Negro, and condescended to the Emperor's left, and the remainder of the suite in various tricks.

The Chicago Indiana Herald says that a school teacher in Union County was dunked by his scholars on the 3d of last month, his birthday, and on leaving the hall, days. They insisted that he should treat or take a dunking. He refused, and they put him in a stream near by, cut a hole in the ice, and put him in and pulled him out about a dozen times. The teacher had no change of clothes. It cost each one of the young gentlemen $5. The teaching came to Dan.

Nicholas Longworth has now in his cellar four hundred and sixty thousand bottles of wine. When it is remembered that there are but four other wine merchants of importance in Cincinnati, some idea may be formed of the extent to which the grape is cultivated in that vicinity.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

The opening of the English Parliamentary session of 1860 took place on the afternoon of January 24, the royal speech being delivered by commission.

The interest of the day bordered the assemblage of a large concourse of spectators to witness the royal procession from Buckingham Palace to the House of Parliament.

The Queen left the palace about half past one o'clock and arrived at the entrance to the House of Lords shortly before two.

On alighting, her Majesty proceeded to the robing-room, and in a very few minutes entered the House, accompanied by his Royal Highness the Prince Consort and the great officers of State.

The Queen having taken her seat on the throne, a copy of the Royal Speech was handed to her by the Lord Chancellor, and which her Majesty read.

AFFAIRS OF EUROPE.

"My relations with foreign Powers continue to be on a friendly and satisfactory footing.

"At the close of last session I informed you that overtures had been made to me to ascertain whether, if a convention should be signed by the great Powers of Europe for the purpose of settling arrangements connected with the general peace, I would consent that a plenipotentiary would be sent by me to assist at such a congress. I have since received a formal invitation from the Emperor of Austria and from the Emperor of the French to send a plenipotentiary to a congress to consist of the representatives of the eight Powers who signed those treaties of Vienna of 1815 the object of the acts of such Congress being stated to be to receive communications of the treaties concluded at Zurich, and to deliberate—associating with the above-mentioned Powers the Sardinian and the Ottoman States—and of the Two Sicilies—on the means best adapted for the pacification of Italy, and for the consolidation of the future welfare of that state.

"Desirous at all times to concur in proceedings having for their object the maintenance of peace, I accepted the invitation. I have since received a note known that in such a Congress I should steadfastly maintain the principle that no decision should be allowed be employed to impose upon the people of Italy any particular government or form of government.

"Circumstances have arisen which have led to a postponement of the meeting of that Congress and having therefore for its meeting; but whether in Congress or in separate negotiations, I shall not fail to use my best endeavors to dispose of Italy freedom from foreign interference by force of arms, and I trust that the relations of peace and the relations of the Italian peninsula may be peacefully and satisfactorily settled.

"Papers on this subject will soon be laid before you.

"I am in communication with the Emperor of the French with a view to extend the commercial intercourse between my subjects and his, and I am also still closer the bonds of friendly alliance between them.

"A Treaty of Commerce between Spain and Morocco I endeavored by friendly means to prevent a rupture. That Treaty has been concluded.

"I will direct papers on this subject to be laid before you.

THE NEW WAR WITH CHINA.

"My Embassador to the Imperial Majesty of the Emperor of the French having, in obedience to their instructions, proceeded to the mouth of the Pei-ho river, in order to proceed to Pekin for the purpose of the ratification of the Treaty of Tien-tsin, in pursuance of the 60th article of that Treaty, other further progress was opposed by force, and a conflict took place between the Chinese forces and those of my allies, in which the naval forces by which the Plenipotentiaries were escorted.

"This unlooked for event has for the moment interrupted the treaty, but, after sustaining a severe loss, very completed to me.

"I am preparing, in concert and co-operation with the French Emperor, for the renewal of hostilities, and for this redress and a fulfillment of the stipulations of the Treaty of Tien-tsin.

"I will be gratified to me no if the prompt cessation of the effusion of blood in the seven-days' conference which will be made by the Plenipotentiaries shall obtain the object of their mission.

"I have directed that papers on this subject shall be laid before you.

THE SAN JUAN AFFAIR.

"An unauthorized act committed by an officer of the United States in regard to the Island of San Juan, between Vancouver's Island and the main land, might have led to a serious collision between my forces and those of the United States; but the moderation which has been prevented by the judicious forbearance of my naval and civil officers in the island, and by the temperate and conciliatory provisional arrangement proposed on the main by the governor of Vancouver's Island.

"I trust that the question of boundary, out of which this untoward event has arisen, will immediately be in a manner conformable with the just rights of the two countries, as defined by the Treaty of Washington of 1846.

THE INDIAN MUTINY.

"The last embers of disturbance in my East Indian dominions have been extinguished. The Indian Army has made a powerful progress through the districts which had been the chief scenes of disorder, and, by a judicious combination of firmness and generosity, by activity has almost everywhere restored the habits of unanimity established. I have received from my Viceroy the most satisfactory reports of the loyalty of the Indian subjects, and of the good feeling evinced by the native chiefs and by the great majority of the people. The attention of the Government in India has been directed to the development of the internal resources of the country; and I am glad to inform you that an improvement has taken place in the financial prospects.

HOME AFFAIRS.

"My LORDS AND GENTLEMEN.—I have accepted with satisfaction the offer of the services of the Militia—the service which I have received from my subjects. This manifestation of their zeal has added an important element to our system of national defense.

"Measures will be submitted to you for amending the laws which regulate the representation of the people in Parliament, and for the local representation on a more broader and firmer basis.

"I recommend to your consideration the improvement of the law of bankruptcy, and particularly the establishment of a uniform tribunal of law, the consolidation of the statutes, and such a further fusion of law and equity as may be found practicable. And, in every suit, the rights of the parties may be satisfactorily determined by the tribunal which the suit is commenced.

"I am deeply gratified to observe that the great interest of the country is rapidly in a state of thriving condition; that pauperism and crime have diminished; and that the moral condition of my people, both in the United Kingdom and in my colonies and possessions beyond the seas, is steadily advancing."

The speech concluded with the usual expressions of contentment, of order, and of obedience to the law.

"With deep regret I announce to the Assembly Inter of nations for these inestimable blessings, I fervently pray that his best endeavors may guide your deliberations for the advancement and consolidation of the welfare and happiness of my people."

DEATH OF CAPTAIN HARRISON.

Captain Harrison, the well-known commander of the Great Eastern, has died on board the ship lying off Southampton. He was crossing the Solent from his residence at Hythe to the ship, when he was seized with the 31st ultimo, in his own gig, in company with Dr. Watson, the surgeon of the Great Eastern. Captain Jury, the chief pacer, and a son of the latter. The boat was manned by six pilots belonging to Hythe, and the crew-swain of the Great Eastern. The weather was very squally, and as the boat neared the Southampton docks Captain Harrison ordered the sail to be lowered, but it stuck fast, and a heavy gust of wind caused the boat to capsize. Captain Harrison clung to the boat for a few minutes, making desperate attempts to right it, but he became exhausted and fell back into the waves. He was picked up about twelve minutes afterward floating a foot below the surface of the water, with his arm cast loosely over the boat. All possible energetic efforts were made by an less than ten medical men to restore animation, but all were unavailing. The deceased was supplied without any stock whatever. Ogden, the coxswain, and Captain Jury's son also fell victims to the disaster, although the latter survived for a time some days longer. The event created a painful sensation throughout England, owing to the high esteem in which Captain Harrison was held. Warm eulogies were being passed upon him, and his death was generally regarded as a very serious blow for the Great Eastern enterprise.

A NEW SUBSCRIPTION FOR COBDEN.

The London Economist alludes to the proposal that the Right Hon. Richard Cobden lose best nearly all his private fortune by investments in American railroad securities, and says that the sum of £40,000 in some from £50 to £500 have been subscribed to repair his loss.

FRANCE.

THE COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH ENGLAND.

A commercial treaty between France and England was signed at Paris on the 23d. The terms were not authorized by the English Chancellor of the Exchequer to be submitted his budget to Parliament. The treaty is declared to be instantaneously promulgated in the Paris Moniteur.

The treaties were afford as to the provisions of the treaty.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times learns on good authority that the treaty of Commerce between France and England contains the principles of free trade. He also states that English coal will be admitted duty free, and that the duty on iron will be reduced.

The Paris correspondent of the Spectator says that the effective modification of the following objects: A complete and unlimited free admission of coal and British iron; high duties, rates and direct and indirect between both countries, rates and the respective existing duties between the English and French ships from all tonnage dues in both England and France.

Another letter-writer maintains that the duty on manufactures will be reduced to a much lower rate, not exceeding 30 per cent, 25, or 21, 20.

The Paris Pays says that the conclusion of the treaty will be received with joy in France and England, negotiations with other powers will be continued, and commerce will receive a new impulse.

MORE CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE POPE.

The Liverpool Post contains the following:

The following correspondence is addition to that the following statement in true:

"I am in receipt of a letter which has written a second letter to the Pope. It was brief and to the point. The Emperor of the French is willing and anxious to remain as hitherto the stalest son of the Church, and will continue to be obedient to the Holy Father in all things spiritual; but if his Holiness opposes the late annexations, let him not expect help from the French.

"The Pope having called for the withdrawal of the French troops from Rome, the Emperor, in the same letter, says that they shall be withdrawn to His Holiness' protection, but that the Emperor will withdraw a month's notice to be given to any attempt to assault in the Eternal city."

THE TRADE OF FRANCE.

The Paris Moniteur of the 16th ultimo publishes the following statement of the trade of France for 1859, which amounted to 1,914,614 000 francs, being an increase of 276,016 000 francs on 1858. The items are given in francs: Import duty on foreign sugar, 12,050,000 francs; import duty on foreign coffee, 8,000,000 francs; 3,452,000 francs; sundry duties and receipts, 9,564,000 francs; import duty on spirits, 4,000,000 francs; salt duties, 1,496,000 francs; sale of tobacco, 147,000 francs; stamp duties, 56,000,000 francs; postage, navigation dues, 857,000 francs; stamp duties, 821,000 francs; registration duties, 106,000,000 francs; mortgages, 150,000 francs; transit charge on foreign letters, 50,000 francs; duties on mines, 1,000,000 francs; navigation duties, 15,000,000 francs; duty on letter-paper, 2,350,000 francs; sundry receipts, 1,000,000 francs; sale of gunpowder, 597,000 francs. The increase in the receipts of 1858, as compared with 1857, was 41,721,000 francs.

AMERICAN BELLES IN PARIS.

Of a late ball at the American Embassy a letter-writer thus speaks:

"Among the distinguished ladies present, and who attracted considerable attention through the entire evening, were Mrs. Mayor Wood, Winfield Scott, and Mrs. Winston's clock, leaning upon the arm of Beverly Tucker, Esq., Mrs. Mayor Wood's dress for evening was very rich.

"American titled nobility was represented by the Countess Dina, a daughter of Mrs. Mayor Wood, in a new array, who was married in Paris about five years since; and who, with her husband, the Count, attracted by the liveliness and interest of the reception.

"Among the ladies of the younger age and grace and vivacity and fine dresses, it may appear invidious to select any ladies for particular notice, but the writer must say that who, as there always are on such occasions, attracted greater admiration than the two daughters of Mrs. Winthrop Porter, of Boston, dressed in a robe of simple white, with no ornament but bright blue ribbons, and the latter in set off her beauty.

"Miss Blatchford, of New York, dressed in white, with elegant trimmings of blue, was thought to be the best dressed lady in one of the finest-looking rooms in Paris.

"Miss Thorne, of Louisiana, divested in pink, was very appreciable and greatly.

"The Misses Hutchinson, of New Jersey, sisters.

"Miss Hall, of Washington, was handsomely and highly intelligent lady, drew around her a crowd of admirers.

"Miss Allen, of Philadelphia; Miss Wolf, Mrs. Deeds, Mrs. Cunningham, an American lady, and a host of artist of considerable repute; Meadames Forseni, Lemire, Bonfils, Bonfils, Mrs. Bonfils, Madame Brett, were all very much admired.

"The Imperial Prince corps was represented by Mr. Calhoun, Chargé d'Affaires, and the gay and amiable Mr. Wilson, Secretary of Legation.

"The army by Major Crittenden, Captain J. W. Todd, Captain Ingalls, and Captain Pegram, all very appointed in uniform, the blue coats and brass buttons proving an agreeable relief to the eye of fashion.

"Then the dentistical profession—quite an important one in Paris—was represented by Messrs. Brewster, Hewitt, Davis and Thomas W. Evans, dentists to the Emperor, who, surrounded by a number of ladies, was conversing, and both of whom were Imperial decorations: and by Messrs. Fowler, Gage, and Spooner.

ITALY.

A LETTER FROM GARIBALDI.

The following letter was addressed by General Garibaldi to Colonel Sumner, who had made him a present of a hunting rifle:

"Caprera, December 15, 1859.—An adoptive citizen of the great Republic, proud of belonging to the universal cause of the republican sword with gratitude, in the name of my country, your benevolent and generous offer.

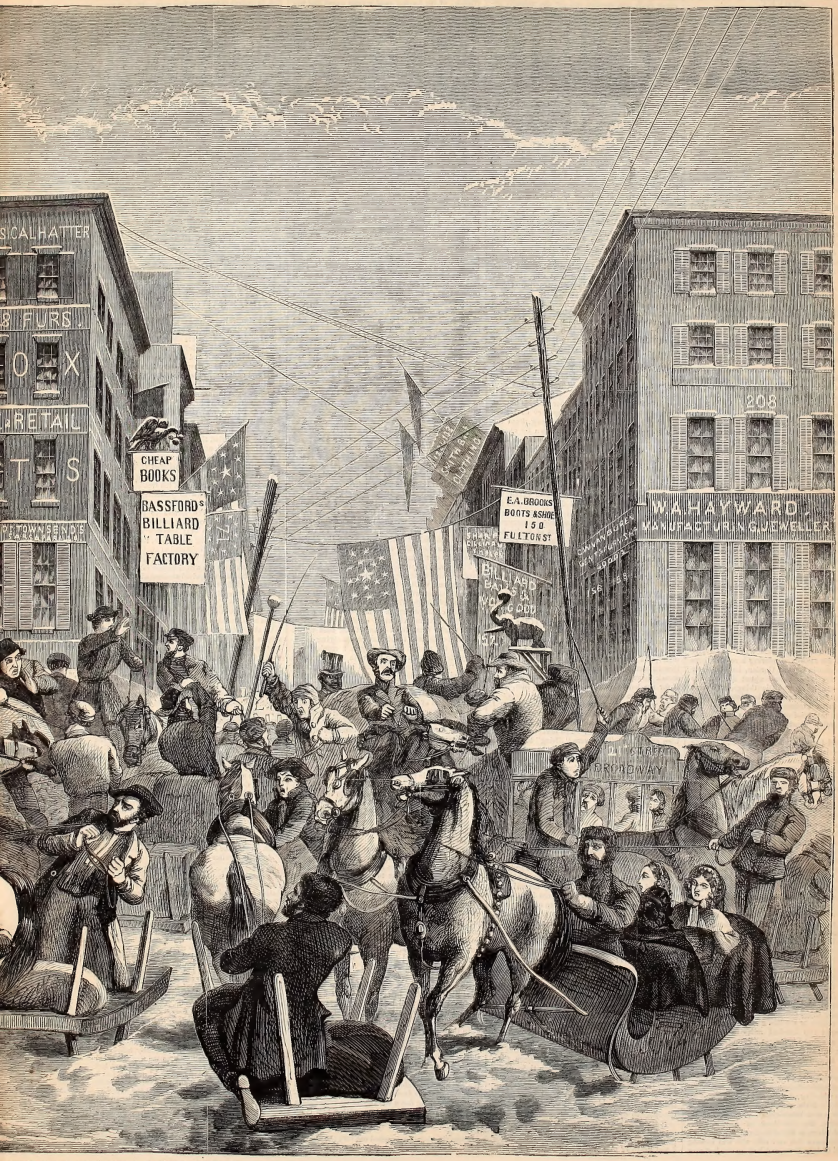
"Your present will be to me a dear pledge of union only as the material support sent by a brave man to a people struggling for its independence, but as the particularly moral aid of the great American nation.

"Please, Colonel, to receive the affection, your devoted friend,

"FROM, January 16, 1860." G. GARIBALDI.

CHINA.

PROGRESS OF OUR SQUADRON.



A naval letter from China, dated at Hong Kong on the 30th of November, published in the London Times, says:

"The American flag-officer Tatnall, in the United States steamer Powhatan, has been succeeded by flag-officer Stribling, in the United States steamer Hartford.

"Mr. Ward has arrived here from Shanghai. The treaty with the United States has been ratified. Before the ratification of the treaty, no doubt, some curious articles compose it. The sale opportunity of smuggling opium into China, and the consequent lowering of the two ports, Swatow and Taiwan, in Formosa.

VIEW OF BROADWAY, OPPOSITE

FULTON STREET, NEW YORK.

BROADWAY, OPPOSITE FULTON STREET.

THE scene represented in the paper of the present week is one that will at once be recognized by every one who has visited New York. Broadway, opposite Fulton Street, is, in its way, the most striking place in the United States. No other spot conveys so good an idea of the bustle and the stir of the great commercial city of America. Even in pleasant weather, when the streets are dry, and there is no temptation to encumber them with unusual vehicles, there is always a monstrous crash, and throng, and hurry, and noise, and clutter opposite Barnum's. But when snow has fallen, and has begun to melt; when, in addition to the omnibuses, the especially crowded with sleighs, and the sleighing is so bad that many of these look as though they could not possibly be dragged through the mud; when the Fifth Avenue slime render walking a trial to booted men, and a cruel punishment to ladies; when, between the feet of long files of cabs and the dread of soiling white underskirts, fair politeness suffer the agonies of death in endeavoring to cross Broadway at this exact point; when the shouts of policemen mingle with the roar of omnibus-drivers, the shrieks of girls, the shrill cries of mischievous boys, the hoarse horns on the Museum balcony, and perhaps the hoarse rattle of a fire company in the distance, the scene has become one to be never forgotten. As such we hand it down to posterity.

THE Uncommercial Traveler.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

ALLOW me to introduce myself—first, negatively.

No landlord is my friend and brother, no chambermaid loves me, no waiter worships me. No boots admires and envies me. No round of beef or tongue or ham is expressly cooked for me, no pigeonhouse is especially reared for me, no botticelli-puddlement is personally addressed to me, no hotelkeeper-puppets is set apart for me, no house of public entertainment in the United Kingdom greatly cares for my opinion of its brandy or its sherry. Now I put down these things as what I am usually rated at a low figure in the bill; when I come home from my journeys, I find them all remarkably low. I always forget about prices, and should have no idea, if I were put to it, how to vituperate a waiter into endurable humility. It doesn't work. As a town traveler, I am never to be seen driving a vehicle externally like a young and volatile pianoforte tuna, and internally like an over-tea'd widow in a number of fat boxes are taking in layers. As a country traveler, I am rarely to be found in a gig, and am never to be encountered by a pleasure train, waiting on the platform of a branch station, quite a Dervid in the midst of a light Stonehenge of cymbals.

And yet—preceding now to introduce myself positively!—I am both a town traveler and a country traveler, and I am both by sea and land. Relatively speaking, I travel for the great house of Human Interest Brothers, and have rather a large connection in the fancy-goods way. Literally speaking, I am always wandering here and there from my rooms in Covent Garden, London—now about the city, now about, now into the country by-roads—seeing many little things, and some great things, and because they interest me, I think may interest others.

These are my brief credentials as the Uncommercial Traveler. Business is business, and I start.

Never had I seen a year going out, or going in, under circumstances of lighter heart. Seven hundred and fifty-nine had but another day to live, and truly its end was Peace on that sea-shore that morning.

So settled and orderly was every thing seaward, in the bright light of the sun and under the transparent shadow of the clouds, that it was hard to imagine the bay otherwise, for years past or to come, than it was that very day. The Tug Steamer lying off the shore, the Pilot Lighter lying still nearer to the shore, the boat alongside the Lighter, the men in the boat, the captain aboard the Lighter, the methodical figures at work, all slowly and regularly heaving up and down with the breathing of the sea, were features as much a part of the nature of the place as the tide itself. The tide was on the flow, and had been for some two hours and a half; there was no visible obstruction in the sea within a few yards of my feet: as if the stump of a tree, with earth enough about it to keep it from floating, were left in the water, had slipped a little from the land—and as I stood upon the beach and observed it dimpling the bright smooth surface of coming in, I saw it move.

Orderly, to quiet, to regular—the rising and the falling of the Tug steamer, the Lighter, and the boat—the turning of the windlass—the coming in of the tide—as myself seemed, to my own thinking, any thing but new to the spot. Yet, I had never seen it in my life, a minute before, and had traversed many hundred miles to get at it. That very morning I had come bowling down, and straggling up, hill-country roads; looking back on snowy summits among coarsens peasants, well to do, driving fat pigs and cattle to market; noting the neat and thrifty dwellings, with their unusual quantity of clean white linen drying on the bushes; having windy weather, suggested by every cotter's little rick, with its thatch straw-ridged and extra straw-ridged into overlapping compartments, like the back of a rhinoceros. Had I not given a lift of fourteen miles to the Coast-Guardsman (lit and all), who went to the bis spell of duty there, and had we not just now parted company? So it was; but the journey seemed to glide down into the placid sea, with other chafe and trouble, and for the moment nothing was so calmly and monotonously real under the sunlight as the gentle rising and falling of the water with its freight, the regular turning of the windlass aboard the Lighter, and the slight obstruction on very near my feet.

Oh reader, haply turning this page by the fireside at Home, and hearing the night wind rumble in the chimney, that shore presents to me the uppermost fragment of the Wreck of the Royal Charter, Australian liner, and passenger ship. Remembered well, that struck here on the terrible morning of the twenty-sixth of last October, broke into three pieces during the strength of the gale, at least five hundred human lives, and has never stirred since!

From which point, or from which, she drove ashore, stern foremost; on which side, or on which, she passed the little island in the bay, for hers beneficial to have been driven on each side her; these are rendered bootless questions by the darkness of that night and the darkness of death. Here she struck.

Even as I stood on the beach, with the words "Here she went down!" in my ears, a diver in his grotesque dress dipped from over the side of the boat alongside the Lighter, and drooped to the bottom. On the shore by the water's edge was a rough tent, made of fragments of sail, where other divers and workmen sheltered themselves, and where they dried and cleaned their clothes and refreshed at mid-day. Chronic-like with rain and wash beef, to the destruction of their frail chimney. Cast up among the stones and boulders of the beach, were more relics of the last vessel, and masses of iron twisted by the fury of the sea into the strangest forms. The timber was already blanched and dry, like drift-wood, and even these objects did no violence to the prevailing air the whole scene wore, of having been exactly the same for years and years.

Yet only two short months had gone since a man, living on the nearest hill-top overlooking the bay, had been startled out of sleep by that day-break by the wind that had begun to strip his roof off, and getting upon a ladder with his nearest neighbor to secure the chimney-pots, by force for keeping his house over his head, saw, from the ladder's elevation as he looked over the hill-crest toward the shore, a troubled object close in with the land. And he and the other descended to the beach, and finding the sea momentarily casting over a great broken ship, had clambered up the stony ways like staircases without stairs, on which the wet was like grease, and had secured as fruit hangs on boughs, and had given the alarm. And so, over the hill-slopes, and past the waterfall, and, as I have described, past the land drains off into the ocean, the scattered quarrymen and fishermen inhabiting that part of Wales had come tumultuously, as they had visions of clergyman among them. And as they stood in the leaden morning, stricken with pity, leaning hard against the wind, they saw that vessel's cargo blew in with the salt foam and remained upon the land when the foam melted, they saw the ship's lifeboat, with the crew of the beach of wreck; and first, there were three men in her, and in a moment she capsized, and there were but two; and again, she struck by a vast mass of water, and there was but one; and again, she was thrown outward, and that one was gone. A man struck through the broken planks and waving as if for the help that could never reach him, went down into the sea.

It was the clergyman himself from whom I heard this, while I stood on the shore, looking in this kind whither the ship had gone to the spot where the boat had been. The divers were down then and busy. They were "lifting" to day, the gold found yesterday, and the silver and many thousand pounds. Of three hundred and fifty thousand pounds worth of gold three hundred thousand pounds worth, in round numbers, was the total then recovered. The great bulk of the remainder was surely and steadily coming up. Some loss of sovereigns was to be expected, and was paid for. A first sovereign had drifted in with the sand, and been numbered for and with the beach, like the shells; but more other golden treasure would be found. As it was brought up it went aboard the Tug steamer, to be weighed and counted once if. So tremendous had the force of the sea been when it broke the ship, that it had beaten one great integer of gold, into a mere strange mass not much a part her solid iron work: in which also several loose sovereigns that the ingot had swept in before it had been forced into the solid mass, and which the iron had been liquid when they were forced there. It had been remarked of such bodies come ashore, too, as had been cast up, months after the ship had been stunned to death, and not suffocated. Observation, both of the internal changes that had been wrought in them, and of the external impression, showed death to have been thus merciful and easy. The report was brought while I was lidding such discourse on the beach, that no more bodies had come ashore since last night. It began to be very painful whether more were to come to be thrown up until the northeast winds of the early spring set in. Moreover, a great number of the passengers, and particularly the women and children, after yawning open, and would keep them down. A diver made known, even then, that he had come upon the body of a man, and had sought to release it from a great superincumbent weight; but that, finding he could not do so without mutilating the remains, he had left it where it was.

It was the kind and wholesome face I have made mention of as being then beside me that I had purposed to myself to go home by Wales. I left some of it. I had heard of that clergyman as having buried many scores of the shipwrecked people; of his having opened his house and heart to their agonized friends: of his having used a most sweet and patient diligence, for weeks and weeks, in the performance of the forlornest offices that Man can render to his kind; of his having most tenderly and thoroughly devoted himself to the dead, and to those who were sorrowing for the dead. I had said to myself, "In the Christmas season of the year I should like to see that man!" And he had swung the gate of his little garden in coming out to meet me not half an hour ago.

So cheerful in the good faithless of affectation, as true practical Christianity ever is! I read more of the New Testament in the fresh, frank face going up the village, than I have in five minutes. I had have read in anathematizing discourses (albeit put to press with enormous flourishing of trumpets) in all my life. I had supposed of the Sacred Book in the cordial voice that had nothing to say about its owner than in all the would-be celestial pairs of bellows that have ever blown conceit at me.

We climbed toward the little church at a cheery pace, among the loose stones, the deep mud, the wet, coarse grass, the oozing water, and other obstructions from which frost and snow had lately thawed. It was a mistake (my friend was glad to tell me on the way) to suppose that the peasantry had shown any superstitious avoidance of the drowned; that they had kept away from the wall, and had assisted readily. Ten shillings had been paid for the bringing of each body up to the church, but the way was not to be earned for money. (a which it was wrapped in a sheet) were necessary, and three or four men; and, all things considered, it was not a great price. Wages were none the richer for the wreck; for it was the season of the herring-shoal—and who could cast nets for fish, and find dead men and money in them, at once?

He had the church keys in his hand, and opened the churchyard-gate, and opened the churchdoor; and we went in.

It is a little church of great antiquity; there is reason to believe that some church has occupied the spot there from time out of mind. The pulpit was gone, and other things usually belonging to the church were gone, owing to its living congregation having been set for its neighboring school-room, and yielded it up to the dead. The very Communion-table was shouldered out of their places, in the bringing in of the dead; the black wooden tables on which they were painted were taken away, and the pavement arranged below them, and on the stone pavement all over the church, were the marks and stains where the drowned had lain. Those marks! The eye, with little or no aid from the imagination, could yet see how the bodies had been turned, and where the head had rested, and where the feet. Some faint traces of the wreck of the Australian ship may be discernible on the stone pavement of this little church, hundreds of years hence, when the digging for gold in Australia shall have long and long ceased out of the land.

Fortyodd shipwrecked men and women lay here at one time, awaiting burial. Here, with weeping and wailing in every room of his house, my companion had striven for hours, solemnly, surrounded by eyes that could not see him, and by hearts that could not speak to him, patiently examining the tattered clothing, cutting off buttons, hair, marks from linen—any thing that might lead to subsequent identification. Sometimes, after looking for a scar, a bent finger, a crooked toe, comparing letters sent to him with the ruin about him. "My boy Arthur, aged seven, has a gray eye and a pleasant smile," one sister wrote. Oh, poor sister! well for you to be far from here, and keep that as your last remembrance of him!

The ladies of the clergyman's family, his wife and two sisters-in-law, came in among the bodies often. In the church, they were laid out for love to do so. Any new arrival of a bereaved woman would stimulate their pity to compare the description brought with the dead faces. Sometimes they would go back able to say, "I have found him," or, "I think she lies there." Perhaps the nearest spot to the pulpit of all that lay in the church, would be led in blindfold. Conducted to the spot with many compassionate words, and encouraged to look, she would sink down, in a piercing cry, "This is my boy!" and drop insensible on the insensible figure.

He soon observed that in some cases of women the identification of person, though complete, was quite at variance with the marks upon the linen; this led him to notice that even the marks upon the linen were sometimes inconsistent with one another; and he began to understand that they had dressed in great haste and agitation, and that their clothes had become mixed together. The identification of many of the dead was rendered extremely difficult, in consequence of a large proportion of them being dressed alike—in clothes of one kind—which had been supplied by slop-sellers and outfitters, and not made by single garments, but by hundreds. Many of the men were brothers, going to or returning from the diggings for the price of the birds; other hall bills of exchange in their pockets, or in belts. Some of these documents, carefully unwrinkled and dried, were little less fresh in appearance than day than the present page will be, under ordinary circumstances, after having been opened three or four times.

In that lonely place it had not been easy to obtain even such common commodities in towns as ordinary disinfectants. Pitch had been burned in the church, as well as the ordinary at hand, and the frying-pan in which it had bubbled over a bracket of coals was still there, with its ashes. Hard by the Communion Table were some boots that had been taken off the drowned and preserved—a goldigger's boot, cut down the leg for its removal—a trodden-down man's ankle-boot, with a buff cloth top—and others—soaked and sadly, weedy and silt.

From the church we passed out into the churchyard. Here there lay, at that time, one hundred and forty-five bodies that had been identified at the wreck. Of these, all but carried there, when not identified, in graves containing four each. He had numbered each body in a register describing it, and had placed a corresponding number on each coffin, and over each grave. Identified bodies he had buried singly, in private graves, in another part of the church-yard. Several bodies had been exhumed from the graves of four, as relatives had come from a distance and seen his register; and, when recognized, these had been exhorted in private graves, so that the mourners might erect separate headstones for the remains. In all such cases he had performed the funeral service a second time, and the ladies of his house had attended. There had been no offense in these cases when they were brought again to the light of day: the discovery Earth had already absorbed it. The drowned were buried in their clothes. To supply the great fashion demand for coffins, he had got all the neighboring people handy at tools to work the livelong day, and Sunday's likewise. The coffins were homely formed; I had seen two, waiting for occupants, under the lee of the ruined walls of a stone hut on the beach, within call of the tent where the Christmas Feast was held. Similarly, one of the graves for four was lying open and ready, here in the church-yard. So much of the scanty space was already devoted to the wrecked people that the villagers had begun to express uneasy doubts whether they themselves could lie in their own ground, with their forefathers and descendants, by-and-by. The church-yard being but a step from the clergyman's dwelling-house, he overlooked the latter. The white surplice was hanging up near the door, ready to be put on at any time for a funeral service.

The cheerful earnestness of this good Christian minister was not boisterous as the circumstances out of which it shone were sad. I never have seen any thing more delightfully genuine than the calm dominion by himself and his household of all they had undergone as a simple duty that was quietly done and ended. In speaking of it, they spoke of it with great compassion for the bereaved, but had no stress upon their own hard share in those weary weeks, except as it had attached many people to him in particular, and elicited many touching expressions of gratitude. This clergyman's brother —himself the clergyman of two adjoining parishes, by the bye—had sixty-four of the bodies in his own church-yard, and who had done to them all that his brother had done as to the larger number —must be considered as included in the family. He was there, with his neatly-arranged papers, and made no account of his trouble than any orderly else did. Down to yesterday's postward, my clergyman alone had written one hundred and seventy letters in this matter, to bereaved friends of the lost people. In the absence of all self-assertion, it was only through my now and then drawing him into question, in which direction arose, that I became informed of these things. It was only when I had remarked again and again, that I could see in the future of the case one of death he had been required so closely to familiarize himself with for the soothing of the living, that he had casually spoken of the hard, unadorned fact of his cheerfulness, "indeed, it had rendered him unable for a time to eat or drink more than a little refreshment of tea, and a piece of bread."

In this noble modesty, in this beautiful simplicity, in the serene avoidance of the least attempt to "improve" an occasion which might be supposed to have sunk of its own weight into my heart, I went away happily down, in a few steps, from the church-yard with its new grave, which was the type of Death, to the Christian dwelling near it, with it, which was the type of Resurrection. I never shall think of the former without the latter. The two will always rest side by side in my memory. If I had lost a new dear to me in this unfortunate ship—if I made a voyage from Australia to look at the grave in the churchyard—I should go away thankful to God that that house was so close to it, and that its shadow by day, and its domestic lights by night, fell upon the spot where the mother had so tenderly laid my dear one's head.

The references that naturally arose out of our conversation to these descriptions sent down of shipwrecked persons, and to the gratitude of relations and friends, made me very anxious to see some of those letters. And as I presently seated before the wreck of papers, all bordered with black, and from them I made the following few extracts.

A mother writes:

REVEREND SIR,—Among the many who perished on your shore was numbered my beloved son. I was only just recovering from a severe illness, and during that time fiction has caused a relapse; so that I am unable at present to go to the scene of my sorrow, my child's bed and last. My darling son would have been sixteen on Christmas-day. He was a most amiable and affectionate child, early taught the way of salvation. We fondly hoped that, as Christ was born in the middle of autumn to his profession, but "it is well," "I feel assured my dear boy is now with the redeemed. Oh, he did not wish to go home with regret. On the fifteenth of October I received a letter from him from Melbourne, dated August twelfth; he wrote in high spirits, and in conclusion he says: "Pray for a fair breeze, dear mamma, and I'll not forget to write for it: and, God permitting, I shall see you and all my little pets again. Good-by, dear mother—good-by, dearest parents. Good-by, and with love to all." Oh, it was cruel, and an eternal farewell. I do not apologize for thus writing you, for oh! my heart is very much given going astray!

A widow writes:

Left in such a state as I am, my friends and I thought it best that my dear husband should be buried where he lies, and, much as I should have liked to have had it otherwise, I must submit. I feel, from all I have learnt of you, that you will see it done decently and in order. Little dear it signifies to us, when the soul has departed, where this poor body lies; but we who are left behind would do all we can to show how we loved them. This is decided me: but it is God's hand that inflicts us, and I try to submit. Some day I may be able to visit the spot, and see where he lies, and erect a simple stone to his memory. Oh! it will be long, long before I forget that dreadful night. In there were a thing in the vicinity, or any shop in Bangor, to which I could send for a small picture of Moelfre or Llanallgo Church, a spot now sacred to me?

Another widow writes:

I have received your letter this morning, and do thank you most heartily for the interest you have taken about my dear husband, as well for the sentiments yours contains, extolling the spirit of a Christian who can sympathize for those who, like myself, are broken down with grief.

My God bless and sustain you, and all in connection with you, in this great trial! Time may roll on, and bear all its sad train with it, but your sad account of the person will stand in history; and, as successive years pass, many a widow will think of your sad calamity, and the tears of gratitude flow down many a cheek, the tribute of a thankful heart, when other things are forgotten forever.

A father writes:

I am at a loss to find words to sufficiently express my gratitude to you for your kindness to my son Richard upon the melancholy occasion of his visit to his dear brother's body, and also for your ready attention in pronouncing over the sacred burial service over my poor unfortunate son's remains. God grant that your prayers over him may reach the Mercy Seat, and that his soul may be received (through Christ's intercession) into heaven!

His dear mother begs me to convey to you her heartfelt thanks.

Those who were received at the clergyman's house write thus, after leaving it:

DEAR AND NEVER-TO-BE-FORGOTTEN FRIENDS,—I arrived here yesterday morning without accident, and am about to proceed on my home by railway.

I am overpowered when I think of you and your hospitable home. Words could speak, but cannot express what my heart. I refrain. God reward you with the same measure you have dealt with!

I consecrate no names, but embrace you all.

MY BELOVED FRIENDS.—This is the first day that I have been able to express my bitterness about a funeral, which will explain the reason of my not writing sooner.

If I could only have had my last melancholy hope realized in seeing once the body of my beloved and lamented son, I should have returned home somewhat comforted; but now I could but have increased my distressingly resigned.

I fear now there is but little more to say, and that is on our without hope.

The only consolation to my distressed mind is in my having been so kindly allowed by you to know the matter in your hands, by whom I well know that every thing will be done for the son he, according to arrangements made before I left the scene of the awful catastrophe, both as to the identification of my dear son, and also his interment.

I feel most anxious to hear whether any thing fresh has transpired since I left you; will you add another to the many deep obligations I am under to you by writing to me? And should the body of my dear son and relative made son be identified, let me hear from you immediately, and I will instantly return.

Words can not express the gratitude I feel I owe to you all for your benevolent aid, your kindness, and your sympathy.

MY DEARLY BELOVED FRIENDS.—I arrived in safety at my house yesterday, and a night's rest has restored and tranquillized me. I am again repeat that hospitality has no words by which I can express my sense of obligation to you. You are enshrined in my heart of hearts.

I have seen him! and can now realize my misfortune more than I have hitherto been able to do. Oh, the bitterness of the cup I drink! But I bow submissive. God must have done right. I do not want to feel less, but to acquiesce more.

There were some Jewish passengers on board the Royal Charter, and the gratitude of the Jewish people is fervent and expressed in the following letter, bearing date from "the Office of the Chief Rabbi:"

REVEREND SIR.—I can not refrain from expressing to you my heartfelt thanks on behalf of those of my flock whose relatives have unfortunately been among those who perished at the late wreck of the Royal Charter. You have, indeed, by your kind act left all of your kindness to the living and the dead.

You have not only acted kindly toward the living by receiving them hospitably at your house, and energetically assisting them in the mournful duty, but also toward the dead, by exerting yourself to have our co-religionists buried in our ground, and according to our rites. May our heavenly Father reward you for your acts of humanity and true philanthropy!

The "Old Hebrew congregation of Liverpool," thus expresses itself through their secretary:

REVEREND SIR.—The wardens of this congregation have learned with great pleasure that, in addition to those individual attentions, at the scene of the late disaster to the Royal Charter, which have received universal approval, you have very benevolently employed your valuable efforts to assist such members of our body as have sought the bodies of lost friends to give them burial in our consecrated grounds, with the observances and rites prescribed by the ordinances of our religion.

The wardens desire me to take the earliest available opportunity to offer to you, on behalf of our community, the expression of their warm acknowledgments for your kind thanks, and their sincere wishes for your continued welfare and prosperity.

A Jewish gentleman writes:

REVEREND AND DEAR SIR,—I take the opportunity of thanking you right earnestly for the promptness you displayed in answering my note with full particulars concerning my much-lamented brother, and I also herein beg to express my sincere regard for the willingness you displayed and the fatherly you afforded for getting the remains of my poor brother exhumed. It has been to us a most sorrowful and painful event, but when we meet with such friends as yourself, it is a measure, somehow or other, stolen that mental anguish, and makes the suffering so much easier to be borne. Considering the circumstances connected with my poor brother's fate, it does, indeed, appear a hard one. He had been away in all seven years; he returned four years ago to see his family. He was then engaged to a very amiable young lady. He had been very successful abroad, and was now returning to fulfill his sacred vow; he brought all his property with him in gold unlearned. We heard from him when the ship stopped at Queenstown, when he was in the highest of hope, and in a few short hours afterward all was washed away.

Mournful in the deepest degree, but too sacred for quotation here, were the numerous references to these miniatures of women's memories that the necks of rough men (and found there after death), those locks of hair, those scraps of letters, those many, many gifts memorials of hidden tenderness. One man cast up by the sea bore about him, printed on a perforated lace card, the following singular (and unavailing) charm:

A BLESSING.

May the blessing of God await thee. May the sun of glory shine around thee. May joy and peace of pleasure, honor, and happiness be ever open to thee. May no sorrow distress thy days; may no grief disturb thy nights. May the pleasure of heaven kiss thy cheeks, and the pleasures of imagination attend thy dreams; and when angels of peace waken their tired of earthly joys, and the curtain of death gently closes around thy last sleep of human existence, may the hand of God attend thy bed, and take care that the expiring lamp of life shall not receive one rude blast to hasten on its extinction!

A sailor had three devices on his right arm. "One device on the Cross, the forehead of the crucifix and the vesture stained red; on the lower part of the arm, a man and woman; on one side of the Cross, the appearance of a half moon, with a face; on the other side, the sun; on the top of the Cross, the letters I.H.S.; on the left arm, a man and woman dancing, and an effort to represent the female's dress; under which, initials." Another seaman "had, on the lower part of the right arm, the device of a sailor and a female; the man holding the Union Jack with a streamer, the folds of which were forced back, and the end of it was held in her hand. On the upper part of the arm, a device of Our Lord on the Cross, with stars surrounding the head of the figure, and one large star on the side in Indian ink. On the left arm, a flag, a true lovers' knot, a face, and initials." This astonishing work of art had the reputation of the miraculous curing of a mutilated arm, when such surface was carefully scraped away with a knife. It is not impossible that the perpetuation of this marking custom among seaman may be referred back to their desire to be identified, if drowned and hung ashore.

It was some time before I could sever myself from the many interesting papers on the table, and that I broke into the dread drama with the kind family before I left them. As I had brought the Coast-Guard down, I took the Preventive Service with his leathern wallet, walking-stick, bugle, and tarrier dog. Many a heart-broken letter had he brought to the Rectory, and many were the months many a benignantly painstaking answer had he carried back.

As I took along I thought of the many people, inhabitants of this mother country, who would make pilgrimages to the little church-yard in the years to come; of the many, in the lands of the wrists of all the wreck of letters I had left upon the table; and I resolved to place this little record where it should, however, be unobtrusive. Epitaphs, inscriptions, and the like, will do a great deal for Religion, if, dare say, and Heaven grant they may! but, I doubt if they will ever do their Master's service half so well, in all the time they last, as the Heavens have done in their use in this bleak spot upon the rugged coast of Wales.

Had I lost the friend of my life in the wreck of the Royal Charter, and had I lost the greatest, the more than friend of my life; had I lost my maiden daughter, had I lost my hopeful boy, had I lost my little child; I would have laid him where that wreck so busily and gently in the church, and say, "None better could have touched the form though it had lain at home." I could have felt that it could be thankful for it: I could be content to leave the grave near the house the good family pass in and out of every day, undisturbed, in the little churchyard where so many are so strangely brought together.

Without the name of the clergyman to whom—I hope, not without carrying comfort to some heart at some time—I have written, my reference would be as nothing. Where is the Reverend Stephen Rose Hughes, of Llanallgo, near Moelfra, Anglesey. His brother is the Reverend Hugh Robert Hughes, of Penrhos Alligo?

LOVE'S YOUNG DREAM.

Time little maid was standing
And did the little maiden know
Afar the strains of music
Came floating from the town.
And did the little maiden know
The thought that made me tremble so?

I saw the silken lashes
That hid her tender, tender eyes;
We listened to the music
That floated through the skies.
But did the little maiden know
The reason why I trembled so?

I longed with utter longing
To clasp her dainty, dainty waist:
Could ever such bliss be mine
Such bliss was not for me.
And did the little maiden know
The thought that made me tremble so?

All tremulously bending
Her lily, lily hand I took
Her slender form enfolding.

One only word I spoke:
It was so sweet to let her know
The reason why I trembled so.

OLD REES.

HE was a little man, with high shoulders and stiff knees, and wore the livery of the dockyard house,* a long frieze coat, with the badge of the charity on the sleeve. As he walked slowly toward me, with the weight of nearly seventy years on his shoulders, I had time enough to perceive that something ailed him. As he came nearer, I perceived that his cheeks were very pale, his eyes dim, and that his whole bearing betokened sadness. As he passed by the arbor, instead of his usual "Good morning, Sir!" he silently took off his hat, and stumbled against the threshold.

"How goes it, Rees? Is any thing the matter with you, my friend?" I asked.

The old man looked up, astonished at the sound of that word "friend;" perhaps now, in his sixty-ninth year, he heard it applied to himself for the first time. Then his features passed over his thin features; his gray eyes first lighted up, and then grew dim with tears. His whole countenance said, "Yes, Sir!" but his lips uttered only these words: "Hearken, Sir. Do you know little Rotas?"

I answered that I had not that honor.

"Did not Mr. Peter ever show him to you? The whole town knows little Rotas. He collects plenty of cash, I can tell you."

"But what about this man?" I asked.

"He is a man at all; he's a dwarf, a regular dwarf, Sir; you might show him at a fair; but he's a wicked little wretch: he lives in the asylum, but he comes out in the day-time a madman. He makes a great deal of money by his hump. When the children are coming home from school, they surround him, and call out Rotas dances for them. He jumps about a stick like a monkey, and makes his hump look enormous. I have a hump, Sir, but mine is a slight one. I perceived that Rees was less jealous of the hump in itself than of the cents which it brought.

"I wish, Sir, I were a melancholy tune vi "I wish I had a hump. I should then have nothing to do; I could get plenty of cents by making the people dance to my tune. But Rotas is a drinking," he said, changing his tone, as he took down the coat, and pulled it up with much care—"no, I would not drink."

"Ah, 'he continued—" ah, Sir, you do not know it, but I am very unhappy and than angry. Little Rotas has done me a great injury; little Rotas is very spiteful. People," he continued, as he stopped to pick up a pebble, "people think him mad, but he is only wicked. You know that in the asylum we are all poor people—as poor as those in the churches—but there are others earn a little money, but it does us no good; we are obliged to bring it all to the father, and every week he gives us a trifle for our pocket-money. But, first at all quite right, Sir; for when I shall become old, and no longer able to earn a cent, I shall still get my little allowance. But little Rotas, by continually dancing out a colored pocket-handkerchief, and tapping the cover of his snuff-box: " I bought them with my pocket-money.

"Rotas," he went on, "receives his allowance also. But what does he do for it? Rotas does nothing but make people spill up a few words in the street. He pretends to be a half-idiot; and when he gets a few cents from the children for dancing, he runs away to the town. But that is his affair," continued Rees, "and why need he have ruined me? You don't know what he did; I'll tell you, Sir. I had, by a great deal of money—I had twelve guilders."

"And how did you get them, Rees?"

"Honestly, Sir. I went to Rotas up while I was messenger to an apothecary. Sometimes when I carried a bottle of medicine to some country-house in the neighborhood of the town, the master or the mistress would say: 'Give the poor man a tencent piece; 'tis but weather.' And so by degrees I scraped together my twelve guilders. It was against the rules of the house; but I hid them near my heart."

"And wherefore? Had you really need of the money, or was it only for the pleasure of keeping it?"

"Ah, Sir," said the old man, shaking his head, "if I may make bold to say so, rich idlers can't understand it. No messenger of the council can understand it, for they have no care about such things. Living and dying, every thing goes well with them. But listen, Sir. We are well-off in the house: the council are kind to us. On fast days we get buttered rolls; and every three weeks an ox is portioned out by the will of some great nobleman who died long ago. We always get the meat chopped up into small pieces; and the managers of the asylum look after the cook, and the meat's tongue. We are very well-off; but a man, Sir, can't help thinking of his death.

"I trust you will be well-off also after your death, Rees," I replied.

"I hope so, Sir; in heaven there is nothing but happiness. But that is not what I meant. I want to have my body provided for—do you perceive?"

"How do you mean, Rees?"

"I'll tell you, Sir. As soon as we are dead they lay us on straw, and then us in the linen of the house, just as when we were alive. Then they carry us to the church-yard, and bury us in the common grave-yard. That is what I do not like. I want, when I am dead, not to have any charity-clothes about me."

He paused for a moment, and his eyes filled with tears. "I long," he resumed, "to lie in my own coffin—I can't well explain it—as I saw my father lie in his with his own clothes. I have never had a shirt which belonged to me—I would fain have a winding-sheet of my own."

I was greatly moved. Speak not of prejudices!

* An alms-house in Holland, for the reception of old men or women.

The rich of this world have them by hundreds. This poor man could cheerfully endure every thing—meagre food, a hard bed, and, for his age, hard labor. He had no home; he was to have no special grave; all he desired was the assurance that his last vesture should belong to him.

"You see, then, Sir," he continued in a somewhat hoarse voice, "what the twelve guilders were for. It was a large sum; but I wanted something besides—I wished to be interred decently. I don't well understand these things, but I calculated four guilders for the linen, two guilders for the men who should bear me, and half a guilder each for the twelve men who should follow me to the grave. Was not that all well arranged? The apothecary's apprentice wrote down all the directions for me on a piece of paper. I wrapped up the twelve guilders up in it, and sewed the whole in a little leathern bag, which for the last thirty years I have worn next my heart. And now it is all gone!"

"But Rotas steal it?" I inquired.

"No," replied Rees, rousing himself from the painful reverie in which his own last words had plunged him; "but he discovered I had it. His bed is next mine; so perhaps he saw it when I was dressing or undressing; or perhaps, during an illness that I had, I may have talked of it in my sleep, for it was always in my thoughts. Last Tuesday, you may remember, Sir, it rained all day, and Rotas could not go singing about. The weather was so bad that the children could not stop in the street to look at him. All his pocket-money was gone, and he had to ask begging alms from me. "Rees," said he to me after dinner, "I have six cents." "Rotas," I replied, "I won't lend you money to spend in drinking." "Rees," said he, "I must have them." "Not from me," said I. "Rees," said he, "if you don't give me the money, I'll tell the father what you have hidden under your clothes." I felt that I grew as pale as a sheet, and I handed him the six cents. But I could not help crying. "Rotas, you're a rascal," I whisper that vexed him or not, I can't tell; but yesterday he got drunk; and while they were fastening the log to his leg, he shouted like a madman: "Rees has money—Rees has money! inside his coat!" Then he fell down. But I cannot tell me this when I came in. It was bedtime, and we all undressed in the men's dormitory. Rotas was already in bed, lying there like a pig. As soon as the others were asleep, I slipped the little bag from off my neck, and was going to hide it in the straw of my bed; but before I had time to do so, the door opened, and in came the father, with a lantern in his hand. I fell back on my pillow, with the little bag in my hand, and stowed it the light like an idiot. I felt every one of the father's footsteps fall on my heart. "Rees," said he, lending over me, "I have no money, and I know very well it is quite against the rules of the house to keep it concealed." And he took the little bag out of my hand. "It is only for a time!" I cried, and I fell on my knees in the bed; but it was no use. "I will take care of it for you," said the father; and he opened the bag, and counted over the money carefully. My own dear burial money! I had not had it for more than a year and a day; thirty years before, when I sewed it up. "I want to you," cried I again, "that I will spend it on nothing but my burial." "Oh!" said the father, "I am of that for you," said the father, and went away with the money and the lantern. "Rotas," I called out after him, "I told you the truth!" and closed my eyes all night. That's all, Sir, I have to tell.

"Why do you not address a petition to the council?" I asked.

"No, no!" sobbed he, fumbling with his hand inside his vest, as though still searching for his money. "They will never restore it to a poor devil."

"Come, Rees," said I, "you must and shall recover your money. I will speak to the gentlemen of the council, and we will see whether the rule can not for once be evaded in favor of an honest, industrious man like you. Cheer up, Rees, you shall get your guilders again."

"Shall I?" said the poor man, encouraged by my confident tone. "shall I really get it?"

I promised to do what I could, and made the requisite application. The president sent for the father, and ordered him to secure the property of the council. It was a most formal and solemn affair. First of all, Rees was summoned into the board-room, and then desired to wait outside; then the father was called in, and in like manner dismissed. Immediately ensued a grave deliberation, which lasted for an hour, and at which the result was, that the president referred the decision to the wisdom of the council; and the councilors, not to be outdone in politeness, graciously themselves ready to be guided entirely by the opinion of the president.

However, as the matter could not rest there, the president at length delivered the decision in the words:

"That, in one point of view, it is right to restore the sum of money in question to Rees, on account of our old servant's character, and that the understanding that he will keep this money till his death, as safely as our excellent and indefatigable honorary treasurer, Mr. Van Beuningen, has always bowed—" but, on the other hand, it would not be well to encourage Rees in the idea that his money could possibly be safer in his own custody than in that of the before-named excellent treasurer."

Such was the categorical sentence of the president. The secretary, with some show of justice, ventured to observe that the decision was hardly consistent with equity, and demanded that the question "to restore or not to restore," should be put to the vote. Whereupon the treasurer had the magnanimity voluntarily to cede his right to the administration of the sum in question, and it was unanimously resolved that Rees should receive back his twelve guilders, wrapped up, as before, in their little leathern bag.

Two years longer old Rees wore his money next his heart. Last year, I visited the church-yard of D——, and it was sweet to me to know that there, in the common grave, slept a man who, through my means had been decently borne to his last home by twelve comrades of his choice, and who had breathed his last in the cherished certainty of wearing his "own shroud."

Perhaps Old Rees, in his dying hour, had a kindly thought of me.

POPE PIUS THE NINTH.

THE critical condition of affairs in Italy has again brought the Pope to the surface, and we accordingly publish his portrait from a late photograph. It is of historic character at the present time.

Pope Pius the Ninth was born at Senegalia in 1792, and is consequently at the present time about 68 years old. His family was ancient and wealthy; his name is Mastai Ferretti. In early youth he was destined for the army, and it is said—though this has been denied—that he served some time in a regiment of dragoons. However this be, he fell in love, when a very young man, with a beautiful English girl, who refused to marry him unless he would become a Protestant. Declining to pay this price for a wife, and unable to bear the mortification of losing her he loved, Mastai resigned his commission, entered the Church, and won golden opinions by his fervor, zeal, and intelligence. At the age of thirty he was dispatched to Chili to reorganize the Church there, which had been thrown into disorder by the revolution. This mission he fulfilled with such success that, on his return, he was intrusted with an important post in the Government at Rome. He shortly afterward became Papal nuncio at Naples. There he won no little fame by the courage and disinterested kindness which he displayed toward the sick; the cholera was raging among the lazzaroni, and many priests, overcome by terror, refused to perform their offices to the dying. Mastai not only spent his whole time at the bedside of the sufferers, but sold his plate and cartiages and devoted the money to their use; preferring, as he said, "to walk on foot so long as the poor of Jesus were dying in the streets."

Under Gregory XVI. Mastai Ferretti, who had been appointed a cardinal, administered the diocese of Imola, in the Romagna, and by his skill and conciliatory policy contrived to soothe much of the discontent which prevailed in that region. On Gregory's death he was summoned to Rome to assist at the conclave which was to elect a new Pope. It was generally understood that Gregory's successor was to be Cardinal Lambruschini; Cardinal Ferretti was one of the scrutineers. On the third ballot he was elected Pope. His excitement when, as scrutineer, he made the astounding discovery, was so great that he fainted.

As Pope, Pius IX. commenced his career nobly. He liberated the thousands of political prisoners who had been thrown into jail by Gregory. He reformed many departments of the Government. He encouraged the national Italian feeling. He spoke openly against the Austrian domination. So novel a stand for the head of the Church attracted the world's attention. Pius became the most popular man in Europe, and the excitable Italian people ripened for revolt. The French revolution of 1848 kindled the flame. Then Pius tried to stem the tide by reactionary measures. It was too late. He refused to be a party to any revolutionary proceedings, and appointed the most unpopular noble in Rome—Count Rossi—to be his Prime Minister. It was fatal. The Romans rose, murdered Rossi, took the government into their own hands, and imprisoned the Pope, who was only too glad to fly some time afterward, in the disguise of a Bavarian valet.

He made his escape to Gaeta, where for some months he held his court. Although the Austrians and their deputies allies having begun to crush out revolution, Pius was restored by the French and Neapolitans. Ever since then he has been upheld on his throne by a French army. Were the French to leave Rome the old man's head would not be safe for an instant.

It is time to say no more, since his restoration to power, Pope Pio Nono has evinced very little of the spirit which once won for him the good will of liberal men throughout the world. Prior to 1850 his rule was despotic and as inefficient as that of any of his predecessors; robbery was an everyday matter in the Papal States; murder was common; and the jails, which contained but few assassins and thieves, were crammed with respectable persons accused of political offenses. When the war broke out the sympathies of the Pope were openly manifested on the side of tyranny and foreign domination; Pius was an Austrian to the backbone. Hailing from heaven above, he could not, of course, be expected to share the feelings of the Romans about Italian nationality. It needed more watchfulness than ever, on the part of the French General, to prevent the Pope's subjects sacking the Vatican.

When the war ended, the Emperor of the French proposed an Italian Confederation with the Pope at its head. To this Pius agreed; but with senile fatuity insisted, that, before any new arrangement were made, foreign troops should invade the revolted Romagna, and reduce to submission those of his subjects who, disgusted by the crimes of his government, and especially the massacre of Perugia, had expelled his legates and declared their independence. This was too much even for the Emperor of Austria—far too much for Louis Napoleon. The request of the Pope was accordingly declined. Upon which the old man refused to have any thing to do with the Confederation.

Matters stand thus at present. On New-Year's Eve Napoleon wrote the Pope a wise, calm, and temperate letter, advising him to submit to fate, and to recognize the independence of the Romagna. On New-Year's Day, Pius, in the speech to the French general, called Napoleon a hypocrite, and all the other hard words he could remember. The world, judging between the two, does not decide in favor of the Pope.

As we said a few words since, the Papacy is a respectable institution, which many wise persons are out of regard for the past, would like to preserve from entire destruction. In his proper sphere the Pope can be of great use to civilization and Christianity. But if he can only be maintained by bombarding cities and slaughtering people who seek their mere rights; if the existence of his spiritual authority be inseparable from the perpetuation of the most loathsome and degrading despotism in Europe; it is not likely that the generous sentiments which induce men of all religions to feel sympathy for the Pope will stand the test, and our generation will probably see the overthrow of an institution which claims to date from St. Peter, the only saber man in the room, and from him the company shaded down to Mangles, and imbecility through all grades of woeful unhelpfulness. Luke Green was the only saber man, I said. And this is true, meaning by sobriety freedom from liquor. For otherwise he seemed almost a madman. Finding it impossible to pull the door open, he first ran to the window, and peered anxiously down for an instant in perfect silence, as if not enduring to trust his eyes against his desire, when they told him that there was no portico roof upon which he could jump, nothing to break a fall of forty feet if he sought to get down by that way. But in less time than it has taken to relate this the mad fever-fit passed over, and the before-time coolness returned. Returning to his old manner, save that the placid eye now burned steadily with a strange unpleasant fire, he very coolly took a broad and heavy hunting-knife from the wall, where it hung as one of the sporting ornaments to Mr. Todds's room, inserted it between the door and the side-post, and throwing all his weight into one lunge against the handle, burst out the socket that received the bolt, and flung the door wide open.

Then whispering hurriedly to Todds, the sereest of all present, both from his naturally hard head and the present excitement, that no one must follow him, he was soon on the track of the fugitive, separated from him only by a little more than a hundred seconds.

And now with great pleasure leaving the party, some of them consoling over Luke Green, some of them vituperating Ernest, many of them with difficulty restrained by Mr. Todds from joining the pursuit with line and cry, and all finally conciding to take a little more punch by way of comforting their sympathy, we follow the two who took their sudden departure before us, and in the order of their exit, into the open air.

The moment that Ernest reached the street he walked very quietly around the nearest corner, and then, seeing that the way was clear as far as the eye could reach, all Chesewick having been fast asleep since midnight, now two hours ago, made at his utmost speed for his lodgings. Letting himself in softly with his night key, he hurried to the chamber provided for little Filkins, woke him, told him to dress himself more rapidly than that operation had ever been performed in his life, and to meet him at the willow clump just across the brook, which we before indicated as the observatory of Nora Manton. Then putting into a valise the little rosewood box which held his relics, and which through all his life - journeying had never once left him, the letter-book, and a bundle of papers carefully sealed and tape-bound, he passed out of the back door, across the little yard that led to the water, then by stepping-stones over the brook, and rested at last, sitting down on the broad roots of the tree appointed for his tryst with little Filkins.

Thus situated, it was impossible for any one from the house to see him, the yellow-brown, burly trunks of the clump giving no relief whatever in that dim night light to his face as it looked between them, while he could see with perfect ease up into his own window, and hear with distinctness, should that be necessary, any thing that might be said loudly on the other side of its lifted sash.

Probably, thought he, Luke Green will make directly for my rooms. Probably also, he will find some difficulty in discovering the house, knowing it only by hearsay—call that two minutes' delay. He is infuriated, but—no, I don't think he will dare to break the front door, he will ring—count three minutes more for arousing some one to let him in: he will then, I suppose, sit down in my arm-chair, finding that I am not in, and wait till I return. Myself find plenty to amuse him till then! At any rate, Filkins has five minutes to dress in the bushes as I told him, he will reach here before Green comes. Heavens grant he may!

As these ideas revolved rapidly through his mind, he believed he heard the front bell of the old house ringing. He listened—it did ring—it was pulled again and again—it rang violently. There could be no doubt who was at the door, and he almost stilled the beating of his heart to hear what would come next, to know how little Filkins would get off.

Of a sudden the bell stopped, and in a moment more he heard loud voices in his own room. A broad lamplight flared through his window, striking the willow for an instant and making Ernest stoop still lower that he might not be discovered. Then two figures appeared at the window, both in earnest conversation — they turned about and faced him, with the lamp directly on their faces.

One was Luke Green, his under-jaw set as if it were holding the thumb of his enemy, his eyes shining with a cold, merciless, motionless glare, like the glint of a moon-struck iceberg. The other was—Gracious Heavens! could the fellow be mad?—little Filkins! But not as natural—in the same dress which he had worn when that day he appeared before Ernest—the bravo's long cloak wrapping him from head to foot, the venerable beard and wig sitting snugly to his face—the little man was talking in his most voluble manner, and gesticulating like one frenzied. He would certainly betray himself, and then, he was in Luke Green's power. What could that poor little mas ker do, if unmasked, against the superintendent's infinite calmness? He would be crouched like a robin's leg in the mouth of a cat. "God help him!" said Ernest, almost resolved to go to his help before the crisis came; "how could he risk it?"

CHAPTER VI.—(Continued.)

ABOVE strain there was rattling and pounding of the door in great measure. There was fury and consternation; there was astonishment of the blankest kind; there was a whirl and clash of all sorts of fierce emotions. Luke Green was

"HE STRETCHED OUT HIS HAND, AND CAME TOWARD ME LIKE A TIGER."

Leave the little holder of responsibility alone for that. The light moved away, and with it Ernest saw Green disappear from the room. Little Filkins leaning on his arm and going gingerly, like a rusty-jointed old man, the right hand firmly grasping the knotty cudgel with which he had arrived that afternoon. Ernest had listened intently, but not one word had he heard from which to gain a clew as to how matters were shaping, so low had little Filkins spoken, with all his volubility.

The light did not return. At last Ernest gave up expecting it, and leaned his mind no more, resolutely banishing the thought of what had become of his zealous little conjdutor, and saying to himself, "If it is best that he should be kept, he will be kept safe. I have done all I can do—let me not throw off of its balance by vexatious rumpings the mind that may presently need to be calm for some new exigency." With this very philosophical reasoning, and determining to wait at the willow for Filkins until that event, he should be made absolutely dangerous by the perfect breaking of the now painfully burnished jaw, he steadily turned his thought out of its recent channel.

CHAPTER VII.

IN WHICH THE EX-SECOND BOOK-KEEPER BALANCES PART OF HIS ACCOUNT WITH THE SUPERINTENDENT.

THE young man grew quite shorebird in this thinking, and, meanwhile, the sky, which waits not for even those who love it best, grew nearer and nearer—and that degree of light which it would have been dangerous for Ernest to remain in, when lo! he was hurried with one leap back into this world of sense wherein our physical legs must walk, albeit those of Messeigneurs our souls find in quite other paths the highest delectation. Behind him there came a splashing, a puffing, and an inarticulate vagrant noise generally, which, in a more Oriental region, would have indicated the passage of a small herd of elephants across a body of water. Ernest drew himself closer behind the willow clump, that the invader, if hostile, might not see him, and waited to know what would follow. What next thing perceptible was a venerable beard spread out upon the surface of the brook like some rare and luxuriant specimen of sea-weed—long black cloak floating above the ripples below it—and entangled in all, the face of little Filkins looking out in the most imploring and abject manner for help. He had slipped off the stepping-stones in his haste to get across, and was now on all fours in the bed of the brook, crawling ashore as well as he could with his embarrassment in the way of costume thick upon him.

"Phew!" cried little Filkins, warping himself in by aid of a long willow root-fibre and clinging up by Ernest's hand—"phew! isn't responsibility a weight, though? I was awful scared for fear you'd go off without me; but I came as quick as I could, and—missing a stone, went down, kersazzle! Water is awful wet, ain't it? Bad as liquor to stand up under when there's too much of it. But never mind; 'I'll try it on,' as the Dutchman said when they asked him if he could pass the bottom of a lager barrel before sundown.' Take it all in all, I don't dislike responsibility; but Lord! ain't it a weight?"

"I'm very glad you're here," said Ernest; "I shouldn't have been able to wait much longer. From what I know of Luke Green he will not be very much in haste to invoke the civil aid in our pursuit, the majesty of the law being an exceedingly disagreeable acquaintance in prospective if he expects to get his deserts, as I judge from a few recent indications; but he is quite desperate just now, and would not hesitate at any means lying in his own private power to stop us. And though I can not say that I should run from him if he confronted me on the road I was taking, I should still prefer to let him choose a road that didn't intersect mine. So far I have got along without resorting to the defences I did possess, though, if the key hadn't been on the outside of Teddy's door to-night fortunately, Green might have come after me quickly enough to make it necessary to show them."

"What was the row? What are the defences?" said Filkins; "what are they?"

"I never show them unless it is necessary," replied Ernest.

"Lord, what a responsibility!" exclaimed the little man.

"We must now," continued Ernest, "strike right across the fields for Duxbury station; it's just four miles by the road, and we shall have to climb fences a good deal this way, we won't shorten that distance much. The down nightowl train reaches here half past four, and Green will, most like, go down to see if I get on. It's half past three now by my watch, and I suppose we had better all be eight or ten minutes it takes to run between here and Duxbury for difference of time-pieces. Can you walk four miles an hour?"

"If I can't I can trot it. Jehoshaphat! I feel so responsible I could go there with you on my back in about fifteen minutes."

"I thought responsibility was such a burden," said Ernest, smiling.

"Responsibility," rejoined the little man, assuming that thoughtful manner which was his wont when about to become metaphysical and didactic—"responsibility is a steam-engine. It's a devilish heavy thing of itself, a great, thumping, lazy, overgrown, unwieldy machine; looking for all the world like a cooking-stove belonging to the Goliath family, on wheels. You look at it, you've struck a big thought for the prevailing impression. It don't look as if there was any go in it; but there is—great guns, Jiminy! how it does squizzle! Well, d'ye see? I'm responsibility; you're steam. By Julius Cæsar, I could go any where for you, Beckford!"

Ernest's only answer for a moment was to take the hand of the excited little man, and, by a side him and give it a most affectionate squeeze, which was reciprocated warmly. And then, as they strode briskly along, Ernest told Filkins, in all its risks, more and more behind them, he said:

"I have never been happier at the result of any word I ever spoke than I have been in what I said to you once. Now, how came my dear fellow! And now, how in the world did you manage with Green? How did you stay so long? And—but, no, we are here at all? Tell me all about what has happened."

"Well, you see, in the first place, I had hardly got my wind after that run when they drove in he shed about five minutes longer than my body —and didn't exactly understand who it was you said would be there. Then I thought of what you must have said to me out of the way, and when I must hurry to be out of the way of, when of a sudden there came a pull at that front bell as if some gentleman of an impatient turn of mind was trying to jerk the front of the house off like a blower from a grate and thought that was the handle. Now, I'm a man of many wits, confused, that's Beckford come back again; so I just teetered up from my stage breeches as quick as I could, and clapped on my beard and wig to look scrumptious, and threw the cloak around me to hide my body as much as could, taking the lamp in my hand, ran down stairs to let you in. Just then I thought who it was you said was coming after you, and I'm a man not to mizzle back and let the house do its own dooropening! But he'd seen me through the sidelights already, and was pounding at it not to go straight on. I was on the third step from the bottom, and between that and the door this chap opened into my body like a ticket that Green would know the humble individual you had with; and he, he's not in that walk of life you know—stocks and dividends, up there at noses at ten and sugar; so says I, I'll be old Spicer, and see this jig by the name of me for any thing else. So I hobbled to the door, and tried to look as I thought a small grocer would be kind of bowed down with responsibilities, while I was pretending to fumble for the key. I ain't sure whether I did old Spicer natural; but at any rate he did, for when I got the door open and saw Green never looked as if he suspicioned any thing but only said, 'Does a young gentleman named Beckford live here?' Lord, how he shut his teeth on the Beckford; as if it were a gum ring and he a baby teething, and how awful white he was in the face! 'Yes, Sir,' says I, making believe cross as a hen with her head cut off; 'and a pretty time of night this is to call on him!' 'Is he in?' said Green. 'No, he isn't!' I answered very short, for he husky as I could. I was afraid he'd be smelling the flask that he had heard my voice before. 'Do you know where he is?' he went on, just as calm and steady as could be, like a person asking questions in a Sunday-school. Now what the deuce could I tell him? I didn't know any thing about where you'd spend your evening, how you'd meet Green, or what the matter was between you and him. I only guessed by the little I caught from you, when I stood blinking at the lamp you'd swung me up, that you weren't particular to entertain him just now. And the remarkably kind and anxious way he asked after you, as if you were just getting over a sickness and he'd brought you some calves-foot jelly, strengthened me in the opinion that, as the poet says, affection could brook delay."

"Was he alone?"

"I guess so. I didn't see any body with him, and he didn't mention any one."

"Very well, I hardly expected he'd care to bring his friends. But I interrupted you?"

"Oh, all right! I was going on to say that the next thing was to think where I should tell him you were. The fancy came into my head that I'd play him a little trick, that would be for the benefit of both of us, take him off of your track and come up with him, very mildly, on some odd scent I've got against him. Not that any trick would pay every thing up I owe the scurvy rascal! Lord, no! But to go on: I said to him, in a sort of broken-down voice, and like an old gentleman that hated dreadfully to go up stairs, 'Well, come up to Mr. Beckford's room, and sit down, and I'll see if I can find out where he has gone. He's a very good lodger, that young man is, and he always leaves a note to me in his room somewhere, when he's going to stay out all night, to tell me where he sleeps, and how much he's coming back, so that my mind may be easy, in case of accident, you know! With that we went up into your room together, he looking at me pretty sharply over his shoulder, for I made him go ahead. I tell you, I ain't the man that like's to have Luke Green behind me! When we got up there I fussed around every where, making believe look for the note which had got mislaid, probably, and all the time thinking where I'd take him to find you. 'Let me help you,' says Luke Green, in oh! such a helpful voice, like a mother! 'No, thank you,' says I, very crusty, 'I can look myself.' No trouble in the world,' said he, gentle as before, and began to rummage the room, gliding about all over like a cat. Pretty soon he stooped down, and what do you think he brought out from under the bed?"

"I'm sure I can't tell. A pair of old boots, perhaps."

"No! boots aren't a circumstance. Falstaff's stomach! I left it there, you know, this afternoon; and out it came with those goggles of mine on you'd see. 'Why, I declare,' says he, and I, just as soon as I could catch my breath, 'to go and muss over a gentleman's life-preserver that he values as much as his own life when he goes a fishing.' 'And I suppose,' answered Mr. Green, with the pleasantest cool smile of his whole face, 'you can't drink water and sugar with and make it very good lemonade—' I suppose these are what he sees on his eyes to keep off the glare of the water!' holding up the goggles at the same time. I felt so flummixed for a minute for fear that, not swallowing the life-preserver, he would get to suspicion every thing, that I didn't know whether I stood on my head or my feet. But then I had an idea stuck into me and pretended to find the note. 'Sit down,' says I, 'and let me see what he says.' Then I pretended to read something like this: 'Dear Mr. Spicer, I expect to spend the night till quite late with Luke Green.'

"'No Master!' asked Green, rather sharply. 'Devil a Mister,' says I, and went on. 'And I'm not through with him—if I'm not assassinated by that time, for he's a d—d rascal—'

"'Does it say that?' cried Green, starting to his feet, and the blood there was left in his face going out of it—'does it say that? Let me see the letter!' and he stretched out his hand, and came toward me like a tiger. I put my hand behind my back, leaned against the wall, and looking him full in the eye with an astonished sort of gaze, said, 'Why, do you know this Green?'

"Oh no,' says Green, sitting down quietly and putting on a face like a deacon, with an effort that took all the ice and brass that even he has; 'only I thought it was queer language for a lovely Christian character like Mr. Beckford to use.'

"That was a little too much for my constitution, from him—such a lovely Christian character himself—and—forgive the expression—but I swore a little out. Then came a sight that I'll bet nobody but me ever saw. You've seen the Alps, haven't you?"

"Yes."

"Well, I've seen Luke Green blush. He actually did do that thing; and then said he, 'Mr. Spicer, I apologize, Mr. Spicer!' in a confused sort of way. I pretended to be reading the piece of paper I had in my hands very hard, and then gave a tremendous laugh to cover the first. 'I was laughing,' says I, 'to think what a way that Beckford is—Hoh-hoh-he!' 'What's the matter?' says he, very sympathizingly; 'I enjoy a joke myself.' 'And you're sure you won't tell any one?' 'Perfectly! oh, of course not.' 'Well, you see, he says this Green, whoever he is, may come for him some time within the course of the next twenty - four hours, and he don't care to see him. So I'm to tell him that he's gone to — but, oh! I mustn't mention it, though I oughtn't to tell you any thing about this.' 'Oh, certainly, mum's the word!' 'My dear Mr. Spicer, how absurd!' says Green, hardly able to keep his face ice over and boiling - water heart of his; 'I don't recollect having ever heard of the individual. Is he a Hartford Green? or is he one of the Greens of Cambridge? — My name's Simmons — Alonzo Simmons, of Mobile. I married Ernest's father's sister, and I'm anxious to see him because I leave in the early train and I shall miss him now.' As he said this the reprobate wiped his eyes with his handkerchief as if snatching the tears of disappointed consanguinity. I let him think he'd fooled me, whatever comfort that was to him, and went on to say, keeping up a simple, halfsilly, and cross - old - man's voice, 'Oh, well, then there can't be any harm in telling you. Mr. Beckford tells me to say to this Green that he's gone to New York, and all the time, d'ye see, he'll be really only twenty miles from here, out in the country, at the Corn and Pumpkin Tavern, in Huddlesfield! Hn-jhn! ho-ho—he-he! First-rate,' says I, 'sain't it? Capital,' said Green; 'I never heard of any thing so good. How this Green will be sold, hah!' 'Is this Green really such a great rascal?' said I, innocent as a baby. 'Any body that can be made such a great fool,' said he, smiling like a death's-head with his teeth shut tight, 'oughtn't to be a great rascal, by common philosophy.' With that he concluded that he would leave—told Mr. Spicer to give Mr. Beckford his uncle Alonzo's love (which duty that venerable grocer now performs with sympathetic tears in his eyes)—and then started down stairs, as nearly on the spring as consistent with your father's sister's husband's dignity, I waited till he got out of sight down the street —and then stole over to the back wall of Grant's livery stable yard. I thought I hadn't misseed my fist, and sure enough there he came, around by the side streets, two minutes after. I heard him order a chaise to be put into a light wagon for Huddlesfield—saw him start— and by this time he's breathing the gray mare that Bradley hired a sulky with last summer up Newmile Hill. You know the rest. I came to the willow as quick as possible, refreshing myself with a bath on the way. I think I shouldn't tell you about there being no danger of seeing Green in getting on the cars at Chewsick, because the walk down here is just what I wanted —being damp, and also full of responsibility. In fact, I don't feel as if I could sit still! Well, what do you think of the night's work? Pretty good, heh? If a fellow, to quote Mr. Green, could make 'a great fool out of a great rascal' every day, wouldn't it be worth while to be responsible all the time?"

It is a great sin, verily, O brother Bee-Line, I agree with thee, to encourage that in others which thou wouldst not do thyself; but hear thou never—I put it to thy candor—felt thy ribs titillated with a not undelectable sympathetic exhilaration, and the muscles of thy mouth draw up reluctantly in spite of worldly lickerishness at the corners, as thou readest in Liber Genesis, cap. xxx., of one Jacobus, and Laban, in the matter of certain ring-streaked, spotted, and speckled animals of a domestic nature, he obtained the windward side of that famous knave Laban, and got his rights by a species of redress which, if not known to Blackstone, was still a most felicitous short cut across the school-moralities to natural justice? Thou wouldst not, O Bee-Line, have played the scurvy fathers-in-law that Laban did, but dost then not somewhat rejoice when Jacob has got well through with it; clap the hands at the adroit patriarch across the gulf of a few thousand years or so, and cry "Hurrah! Evoe Jacobe! Good for thee, thou trump and father of the faithful!"

Then blame not Ernest Filkins, although he might not have taken that method to outwit Luke Green, his only answer to little Filkins's happy wit was a sermon but a short length, and a hug which showed the small repositor of responsibility in what estimation his patron held the qualities of sincere faithfulness, quickwittedness, and personal, grateful affection.

Thus they reached Duxbury, and together took the train.

"DOES A YOUNG GENTLEMAN NAMED BECKFORD LIVE HERE?"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"I SEND you," writes a friend, "the following extract from an advertisement, picked up in a country town some years ago, for preservation. Its author was the eldest son of a worthy baptist minister, and at one time considered a wealthy farmer, in one of our river counties:

"'The subscriber will offer for sale on the 12 day of April 1[illegible] at 10 o'clock on that day the following articles Two to horse sleys as one pleasure slay two logs chain on one slay one set of Plow Gears Work . . . . . and other article to numerous too mention will be sold on 6 months for approve notes And sum under one dollars cash down one cent."

"The legal profession in the West are not ignorant of the real importance of the imaginary ornaments of their duties of the peace. There is a type of this class residing within a hundred miles of this place, whose proceedings are sometimes sufficiently rich to merit reporting.

"A constable's unlawful eyebrow was arraigned before the Squire, charged with 'assaunt and battery.' It appeared from the statement of the prosecutor that his victim pushed the prosecuting witness down, seized him by the hair, and literally pulled one side of his head bald. After argument of the learned counsel, it was decided by his Honor that the action could not be sustained, for the reason that pushing was not assaulting, and that pulling was not battery. The prisoner was discharged.

"At another time a man was brought before him charged with perjury. It appeared from the evidence that the defendant, in compliance with the laws of this State, had entered a certain complaint or declaration in a civil action, which complaint he knew at the time contained material allegations which were false. The defendant admitted that he knew the allegations sworn to by him were not true, but he justified himself by declaring that the practice in lawsuits was to let the lawyer put any and every thing in the declaration, whether it was true or not—like they did in New York—and that swearing to it was no part of his form. The Squire was not satisfied with the explanation, and the prisoner was discharged."

A fond parent sends this smart saying of his little four-year old:

"Little Charlie came to the table very hungry, and he had his fork in a potato, and the potato transferred to his plate, before he thought of the usual 'blessing.' Looking up to his father he says, 'Pa, you takes to Heaven while I nourishes myself.' His hunger made him wish to improve every moment."

EPITAPH ON A TOMB-STONE IN THE OLD GRAVE-YARD IN MODERN CITY.

"My son, thou hast gone to sleep
In the fair-fabled West.
Thy friends, they for you do weep
Who made in the East."

Aunt E——— was trying to persuade little Eddy to retire at sundown, using as an argument that the little chickens went to roost at that hour. "No," says Eddy, "I see the old hen always goes with them." Aunty tried no more arguments with Eddy.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR A MISSISSIPPI SCHOOL-TEACHER.

A roving young gentleman, without employment and money, concluded to take to school-teaching as a means of livelihood. Accordingly he applied to the trustees of a country school, when the following conversation took place:

TRUSTEE. "What studies do you teach?"

The applicant indicated his qualifications by the following reply:

"I can teach anything you want—from A, B, C to a good game of draw-poker."

He was immediately accepted and inducted.

An old man died lately, selling, in Knoxville, Tennessee, a lot of books, part of the effects of a college professor lately deceased. One of the purchasers, he stated when he was, and was told it was a Greek Lexicon. "Here, gentlemen," he says, "here, Lexington. What do you want for this for Lexington? It is not Lexington in Kentucky, nor Lexington in Virginia, but it is a Greek Lexington."

On the line of the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad, and over the first crevasse, is a bridge of some length. For greater safety the Company require the trains to be moved at speed only a crawling. To prevent which a ganger, a sign-board is put, and beside the track, some distance from the bridge, is marked "Slow." Some one either a wag or a deepest, creditor of the corporation, has added, in chalk, a word "pay," and produced a "Down."

"Going to leave, Mary?"

"Yes, mum, I am, and I'm very much discontented."

"If there is any thing I can do to make you more comfortable, let me know."

"No, mum, it's impossible. You can't alter your figger so that it can be more to my taste. Your dinners suit me, and I can't appear on Sundays as I used at my last place, where missis's clothes fitted tarrify."

What part of a ship is like a farmer?—The tiller.

If corses were hereditary, they might pr yarly be called patrimonial ashers.

"That's a flume of mine," as the bellows said to the fire.

What is the oldest tree in England?—The e, ve-tree.

As a specimen of the utility of logic, we give the following:

A sharp student was called up by the worthy professor of a college, and asked the question,

"Can a man see without eyes?"

"Yes, Sir," was the prompt answer.

"How, sir?" said the astonished professor, "can a man see without eyes? Pray, Sir, how do you make that out?"

"He can see with one, Sir," replied the ready-witted youth; and the whole class shouted with delight at his triumph over metaphysics.

Emily Smith, a young lady over 5 years of age, great book-worky, and every body but knows she ought indeed to be married, but is suprised that no young man is so foolish to his car as husband needs. Monsieur is not particularly struck with charms. We will give a specimen number. A few years ago G——— was engaged to a young man who was in one of our city theatres, in the manager of which in the very model of deportment—a perfect Crystal Palace. On a particular night G——— had laid out upon a table at the wing certain "properties" he would use in the progress of the piece, to their they would be ready when he should come quickly from the stage. Among other things was his property nose, rendered almost on duty, cause across these properties, and, supposing them not of since, returned them to the property room. Presently G——— jumped off to his table: it was empty! A table stood near Mr. Manager. Horror and astonishment written all over him G——— screamed out,

"Where's the blasted shose?"

"Where's my blasted shose?" echoed Mr. Turvydrop, with a Chesterfieldian courtesy, addressing a boy standing by.

G——— stared, and bellowed, "Where's the d—n fakements?"

"My G——— requires the d—n fakements," repeated Turvydrop.

G——— stared fiercely again the emblem of enmity, and then, time being up, leaped back on the stage with a single shout of derision. There are no words to express that sort of language in wood.

Let friendship creep gently to a height: if it rush to it it may soon run itself out of breath.

A High Rent.—A hole in the crown of your hat.

Why are Commerce shanks like dead persons?—Because we can not make them here.

A friend was remarking the other day about Shakespeare ascribing grammar to some when he makes Mark Antony say, "This is the most unkindest cut of all." Upon which a commuter replied by saying that Antony being a Roman could not be expected to understand English grammar correctly!

"Well, farmer, you told us your place was a good place for hunting. Now we have tramped it for three hours and found no game."

"Just so. I calculate, as a general thing, the less game there is the more hunting you have."

An editor says that the only reason why his house was not blown away during the late gale was, because there is a heavy mortgage upon it.

Mr. Sergeant Gardiner, being lame of one leg, pleading before the late Judge Fortescue, who had little or no hair upon the top of his head, the sergeant had his wig because of it.

"Oh, my lord," said the sergeant, "have but a little patience, and I'll prove every thing as plain as the nose in your face!"

A lecturer, addressing a Mechanics' Institute, contended, with tiresome prolixity, that "Art could not improve Nature," when, to the great delight of his audience, set the room in a roar by exclaiming, "How would you like a new nose, Sir?"

"Why are you like a crazy man, my dear?" asked a fond wife of her husband. "Upon my life, I am getting herself closer to him, and putting on one of her sweetest smiles, "because she said I am your other self, and you are now beside yourself."

The "Young Men's Debating Society" having discussed the question, "Which does more harm when it goes out?—have got a new and more exciting one up, "When a house is burning down, does it burn up, or does it burn down?" There is to be a warm debate on this question.

The Southern Presbyterian tells the following of two Charleston darkeys: "Our friend Hughes, whose beautiful residence on Meeting Street does not command the most hurried passer-by to escape without at least one look and admiration, has taken into his employment two orderly slaves, related a short time since the following illustrative anecdote:

"Immediately opposite the front door, and in full view from the dining-room, is a large colored copy of Correggio's and its environs—the city occupying the central and most conspicuous place in the picture. As negro boys stopped to admire it, and, not suspecting that any one was listening, made their remarks thereon. Sez Sam, 'what dat hanging up dere?' 'Why, Sam, you not know? Dat de world.' 'Well, what dat dem in de middle?' 'Why, boy, you not know dat sudder? Dat's de Mediterranean Sea!'"

An editor and a young schoolmistress were engaged in a conversation the other day, when the following passed between them:

EDITOR. "Miss, when are you going to get married?" SCHOOLMISTRESS. "Why, Sir, I'm sure I don't know. Can you advise me?"

EDITOR. "Well, as that's my intention, suppose we marry?"

SCHOOLMISTRESS. "Well, I don't know whether that would be a chance or not!"

A gray hair was copied among the raven locks of a fair friend of our own. "Ah," said she, "every gray hair is a sorrow." "Indeed," replied the gentleman, "then how many sorrows must you have!" "Oh, a great many!" she exclaimed. "If I pull it out ten will come to the funeral." "Then," said he, "you must let it alone in silent discovery." "Pooh! it not nevertheless," said the darkhaired beauty, "I can not see it unless I procure a looking glass for the purpose!"

A gentleman in a steamboat asked the man who came to collect the passage money what was the matter with a sailing blown up as the steam made such a horrid noise. "Why, Sir," replied the sharp collector, "unless you refuse to pay your fare."

Dr. Abell, of Kentucky, besides being an inveterate punster, cultivates a taste for fine fare. On the other day, as he was engaged in changing the position of a magnificent turkey at Washington's birthday dinner, a lady of five years old, once trudging through the room with her hat and apron, full of nuts, stopped to see and asked,

"Pa, is that a nord that holds up that picture?"

"No, my son, it's tyre."

"Well, I know it's a nord, 'cause, pa, it's a strong likeness, and it might break the tape."

Two bodies of men, the one being hopeful went out whistling "Pop goes the Weasel."

The memory of a good deed is a perpetual joy to us and even the memory of a bad one brings a not unhappy satisfaction. Many an old man luxuriates still upon a rich repast devoured fifty years ago; and it can't get him the nightmare now.

COCKNEY CLERICUS.—"Jack," said Robins, "which vessel would you sooner go to, Hosford or 'Redberg'?" "Hosford, dooms, he is sure, you know, to be preserved Jack." "Yes, and I prefers a-dentistry to baldness."

What tree represents a person who persists in incurring debts?—Willow (will owe).

$1000 PROCLAMATION!

Liberal Rewards Medical Cures by the application of

Prof. DEGRATH'S

ELECTRIC OIL

ON MAN AND BEAST.

To the inhabitants of Philadelphia and vicinity.

I propose to cure, gratuitously, instantaneously, individuals afflicted with Deafness, Headache, Neuralgia, Chill Fever, Ague, Rheumatism, and all Sores and Pains.

I propose to check and effectually dissipate more ache and pain, and to accomplish nearer and more perfect equilibrium of all the circulating fluids in the human system, than can be effected by any other or all other methods of medical aid in the same space of time, the most obstinate and inveterate cases.

I do not propose to cure every disease, but all such are not curable by any combination of medical appliance. My operates on chemical and electric principles, and is, therefore, applicable to the cure or natural restoration of any organic derangement arising from an improper exercise of nerve-vital fluen ces.

I want the masses to join in this matter—the well as the sick—because I can benefit any so, all are alike interested.

ELECTRIC OIL.

The cures made by PROF. DEGRATH, with his "ELECTRIC OIL," are so near miraculous as to resemble the miracles of the Saviour, because of similar cases in ancient times by the anointing with oil, and these cures are so wonderful in their appearance, as satisfying and mitigating of human ill, as to call upon public functionaries, as to call upon public functionaries, as to call upon public institutions for the sick and suffering, to look well into the well-attested cures of the wonderful virtues of this "Electric Oil."

Professor Degrath, therefore, has deposited $100 with the Mayor, to be forfeited if the "Electric Oil," sold at Philadelphia, fails to cure a single case of Rheumatism, or Sore, or Pain, or Ache, or Limb, Flux, Sores or Burns, Fever Sores, Ulcers, Caked Breast, Sore Nipples, Scrofula, Glandular Swellings, Goitre, Swellings in the Joints, Sprains, Bruises, Sores on man or beast, or Scratches and Wounds of any description.

WARRANTED TO

Cure Fever, Croup, Diphtheria, and Colds, from 10 minutes to one day.

Cure Deafness in two or four days.

Cure Sprains, Wounds and Bruises, from one to three days.

Cure Inflammation in one day.

Cure Neuralgia or Tic Doloreux in ten minutes.

Cure Hemorrhage, Scrofula and Abscess, in ten days.

Cure Swelling of the Neck in one day.

Cure Felons, Broken Breast, Salt Rheum, in three to six days.

Life and Times
of
GEN. SAM. DALE,
The Mississippi Partisan
By J. F. H. CLAIBORNE
Illustrated by JOHN M'LENAN.

12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

We doubt not that this work will be one of thrilling interest, and will command a large sale throughout the whole country. Col. Claiborne, already well known as the State, is peculiarly fitted for a literary labor of the kind—whether as an epistolary, political, or biographical writer, he seems able to charm with the ease, grace and polished eloquence of his pen. SAM. DALE was a man of no ordinary parts, and his name and fame may be esteemed as forever fixed in having such a faithful chronicler.—Mississippian.

The Hon. Mr. Claiborne, late a member of Congress from Mississippi, has rescued from oblivion the pioneer life—the Indian fights—the daring exploits—the heroic character—the dauntless courage and devoted patriotism of Gen. DALE, whose name was familiar as a household word to all the early log-cabin settlers of the Southwest, as well as a terror to the Indian tribes, whose "means of war" this "terrible partisan" are yet "afraid of" of the venerable men who still linger here and there, memorials of a glorious, heroic, and dangerous past! Thanks to Mr. Claiborne for this book. It will be thousands of readers in the South and West; and the hunters of Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, and Mississippi, will live their lives over again and have their youth renewed as they bend over its exciting pages, and read of scenes of "trouble times," "when the war whoop waked the sleep of the cradle."—Cov. Cleveland Leader.

II.
LUCY CROFTON.
A NOVEL.
By the Author of
"Margaret Maitland," "The Laird of Norlaw," "The Days of My Life," &c.

12mo, Muslin, 75 Cents.

This is a charming novel. The characters are excellent; the plot is well defined and new, and the interest is kept up with a vigor which is almost new with its theme days. The author deserves our thanks for one of the most pleasant books of the season.—London Herald.

This book will be read with profit as well as pleasure. Throughout there will be found these delicate touches and accurate renderings of the lights and shades of feminine character, for which the author is remarkable.—London Post.

It is a charming book; a pretty story evenly told, and taken a grade of affectation in it from first to last: gentle, interesting, natural, and not weak.—London Literary Gazette.

The personages are painted not in black and white, but in flesh color, as human nature should be. There is no affected or exaggerated sentiment in the story—it all appears true.—London Athenæum.

One well-told tale like Lucy Crofton is better than a whole year's produce of the literary shoddy mills, made up in yards of those volumes. Not least among the attractions of this story is the language in which it is told —clear, expressive, graceful, and free from jargon of all kinds. It is another example of the well-known fact, that when clever women condescend to write pure vernacular English, they write it surpassingly well. There is a purpose in reading such language skin, and delicate in degree, to that of hearing it uttered by the sweet voice of a woman. We might quote to proof almost any passage taken at random from the volume.—London Spectator.

The character of Lucy Crofton is drawn with consummate skill, and laid bare to us by those graphic touches, those little units which make up a great whole, and which we feel to be very natural.—London Critic.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

FROM HALSTED'S late TREATISE on MOTOPATHY, — "Mr. H. —, aged 39, had been in such ill health as to oblige him to relinquish business for two years. His diseases were liver complaint, dyspepsia, and nervous debility. He was much emaciated,—had little or no appetite. His mental faculties were also considerably impaired; there was a partial loss of memory, and an inability to converse coherently more than a few minutes at a time. Self-destroying habits had conspired to render his case almost hopeless. His sleep was much interrupted. His improvement under treatment exceeded expectation. In three months, all symptoms of dyspepsia and liver complaint had disappeared. His appetite was good, and his sleep seldom disturbed. His nervous excitability remained, and his memory, though improving, was still treacherous. He remained under treatment for six months, and left cured. His memory was, perhaps, a little less retentive than in early youth, but with fair mental activity and good bodily health."

This Treatise may be obtained, on return of mail, by inclosing 25 cents to H. HALSTED, M.D., Round Hill Water Cure, Stamford, Conn.

Scrofula, or King's Evil

One quarter of all our people are scrofulous: their persons are invaded by this lurking infection, and their health is undermined by it. To cleanse it from the system we must renovate the blood by an alterative medicine, and therefore it is healthy food and exercise. Such a medicine we supply in the most effectual remedy which the medical skill of our times can devise for this every where prevailing and fatal malady. It is combined from the most active remedials that have been discovered for the expurgation of this foul disorder from the blood, and the renewal of the system from its destructive consequences. Hence it should be employed for the cure of not only scrofula, but also those more affectious which arise from it, such as ERUPTIVE and SKIN DISEASES, ST. ANTHONY'S FIRE, ROSE, or ERYSIPELAS, TUMORS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES, BOILS and ULCERS, TETTER and SALT RHEUM, SCALD HEAD, RINGWORM, RHEUMATISM, SYPHILITIC and MERCURIAL DISEASES, DROPSY, DYSPEPSIA, DEBILITY, and, indeed, ALL COMPLAINTS arising from VITIATED or IMPURE BLOOD. The popular belief in "impurity of the blood" is founded in truth, for scrofula is a degeneration of the blood. The particular purpose and virtue of this Sarsaparilla is to purify and regenerate this vital fluid, without which sound health is impossible in contaminated constitutions.

AYER'S
Compound Extract of Sarsaparilla,

Winant's Excelsior Billiard Tables

Manufactory 71 Gold Street, N. Y.

From the NEW YORK COURIER AND INQUIRER, May 17, 1859.

PREVIOUS SERIES — Against patent Medicines most persons are justly prejudiced. Health is too valuable to be trifled with, and no one possessing ordinary common sense would ever think of using a patent medicine of which one can know nothing save what is asserted by the maker of it, a person who, for all he knows, may be an arrant rogue. The Peruvian Syrup can not be placed in this category. There is every reason to believe that there is no quackery in it. It is a solution of the protoxide of iron, prepared by one of the best physicians now well known in Boston, and are gentlemen upon whose statements the most implicit reliance can be placed. The fact that the syrup is a panacea, but that in all those diseases in which the use of iron is indicated it will be found most efficacious. The diseases in which iron is prescribed by physicians are many, and though this remedy is regarded as one of the most useful in the pharmacopeia, yet the manner in which it is usually given is injurious, for the reason that it is sometimes difficult to find it in a state in which the stomach can digest it. It is generally carried by the acids of the stomach into the system, and so unbearable will the blood in the form of protoxide, even if administered in small doses, that it would prove the most unnecessary labor. The protoxide, however, is said to be a very safe preparation, and liable to be converted into another form by the absorption of oxygen from the air. In the Peruvian Syrup the protoxide of iron is so combined by chemical ingenuity as to remain permanent, without undergoing any decomposition.

Pamphlets containing numerous certificates of cures from eminent men, and others, can be had on application to the Agents, or to

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

EVER COPY A NUMBER A YEAR.

The First Number of the Fourth Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY appeared on the 4th January, 1860. Each year, over 4,500,000 Numbers of HARPER'S WEEKLY were sold, nearly half of which were bound for New York families. In commencing the new volume, the proprietors desire to say that HARPER'S WEEKLY has attained its present POSITION, in the first place, and before any thing else, a FIRST-CLASS NEWSPAPER, containing as much reading matter equal to the daily press in fullness of description, and superior to the daily press as contained in permanent interest. How far they have attained their aim, the three volumes now published will show. The Illustrations in the Third Volume will bear evidence to the fidelity with which the most important events of the past year has been related and illustrated in the pages of HARPER'S WEEKLY. The Illustrations of Harper's Ferry Insurrection, the Indian War, the Great Eastern Steamship, the Harper's Ferry Outrage, the Kansas Expedition, the Paraguay Expedition, China, etc., etc. The value of the paper can be best realized by comparing what it did not give with and by trying to conceive how little people would really know of passing events if they had to rely on written descriptions alone. In this respect, the arrangements for the coming year are more complete than they have been heretofore. HARPER'S WEEKLY has regular artist correspondents in almost every quarter of the globe, and commands the pencil of the first artists at home. It will endeavor, in order to present its readers with a complete illustrated history of our age, continue to transfer to its pages the best and most generally interesting pictures from foreign illustrated journals. In a word, the substantive in HARPER'S WEEKLY will be nothing to its pages next year an accurate, well-drawn, well-engraved, and well-printed picture of every memorable event which occurs, and a portrait of every man who attracts the general attention of the people of this country.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue, as heretofore, to publish the best Tales and Novels by native and foreign authors. It has already published A Tale of Two Cities, by CHARLES DICKENS, and Adam Bede, originally drawn for HARPER'S WEEKLY; What will he do with it? by BULWER LYTTON; Framley Parsonage, by WILKIE COLLINS; Lois the Witch, by MRS. GASKELL; A Good Fight, by JOHN CASTLEMON; and Orley Farm, by CHARLES WILLIAM LEVER; it is now publishing The Uncommercial Traveller, by CHARLES DICKENS; Framley Parsonage, by TROLLOPE, and The Women in White, by WILKIE COLLINS; The New Partner, by CHARLES C. BURLEIGH; My Five Years in Utah, by LEVI KELLOGG, both of which are illustrated by Engravings; and The Mistress of the Mansion, by ELLA RODMAN, illustrated by WINSLOW HOMER, Esq., Original Stories, and Sketches of Travel, Adventure, etc., of equal merit will be commenced, it being the intention of the publishers to present in the columns of HARPER'S WEEKLY a series of fictions that is written here or abroad. It is hardly necessary to add, that the Serial Stories which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY are purchased from their authors before publication, and are not stolen from the daily issues.

In addition to serials, each number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will contain a short complete Story by the first foreign author. In respect to these tales, as with the serials, the publishers will endeavor to get the best that can be obtain, without regarding their origin.

The other departments of HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue to receive careful attention at the hands of the publishers.

in four months from publication.

From Marian Harland, author of "Alone," "Hidden Path," &c.

"I speak my honest sentiments when I pronounce 'Beulah' the best work of fiction ever published by a Southern writer. To my mind, no American authoress has ever produced a greater book. There is a life-time of thought and research, of struggles of mind and heart, in 'Beulah.' I have read every word with intense interest. The character-painting is fine, the description of passing events and scenery graphic and striking; but to me the chief charm of the book lies in the vivid portraiture of the doubts, the conflicts, the yearnings, and the final triumph of a great soul seeking for truth. If the public can appreciate a thoroughly good work, they will thank you for having given them 'Beulah.'"

CLARK MILLS'S STATUE OF WASHINGTON.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

CLARK MILLS'S STATUE OF WASHINGTON.

WE engrave on the preceding page Clark Mills's Equestrian Statue of Washington, which is to be inaugurated on 22d inst. at the federal capital. It is proposed that the pedestal (which will be submitted for the adoption of the next Congress) shall be of marble, about twenty-five feet in height, to be divided into three stories, illustrating the three great epochs in the history of the country, the figures to be executed in bronze. The first story is to represent the country as it appeared on its first discovery, when inhabited by the Indians: the second story, its general aspect under the changes wrought by the hand of civilization; the third and last story, the great revolutionary struggle—to be surmounted by the colossal statue of Washington.

The first story is seen in low relief. The Indian is represented as engaged in his favorite sports—capturing the buffalo, pursuing the moose and deer, and cultivating his corn and tobacco. The first panel of the second story is in high relief. The white man appears cutting his way into the dense forest, with rage and perseverity beaming on his countenance. In a corner of the same panel, the Indian is seen retiring—looking wistfully back, both to leave his hunting-ground, but obliged to fly before the face of civilization. In the second panel, the white man has cleared away the forest, erected his log cabin, and is cultivating his ground, symbolic of which are seen his axes and plow. To show some of the difficulties which he had to encounter, here are there, from behind the trees, the Indian is seen shooting him down with the very rifle which the white man taught him to use. This leads to a war. The next panel shows the battle with the Indians—man to man, arm to arm—but the white man is represented as gaining the ascendency. The next presents the symbols of his progress in agriculture, commerce, and the arts, and his augmented power and independence. At this stage fresh difficulties arise, and these are the troubles with the mother country. The next succeeding panel exhibits the three shiploads of tea in Boston harbor, and white men, dressed as Indians, throwing the tea overboard. The next panel is the signing of the Declaration of Independence. This brings us to the third epoch, the Revolutionary War.

The third story is in full relief. Washington's Generals appear of the size of life. Eight of them are mounted on horseback; the rest are represented in groups, as if in consultation, holding a council of war.

The crowning figure in this great historical representation is the statue of the Father of his Country, represented as he appeared at the battle of Princeton, &c., after attempting several times in vain to rally his troops, he put spurs to his horse and dashes up to the cannon's mouth. His terror-stricken troops and recoils, while the balls tear up the earth beneath his feet; but Washington, cool, calm, collected, and dignified, believing himself safe in the instrument in the hands of Providence to work out the great problem of liberty, remains firmly seated, like a god upon his throne. The position of the hero at this moment of imminent peril to his life contrasts admirably with the fearful agitation manifested by his noble but unreasoning horse, who is sustained by none of the considerations which impart courage to the hero and the Christian.

"DAISIES."

BY C. M. WEBB.

OUR Lillie loved the spring-flowers,
And often told their praises;
She loved the early blossoms,
But most of all the daisies;
And when the twilight shadows
Came with the silent hours,
She prayed to leave her cradle,
And slumber with the flowers.

We pressed her eyelids gently,
And hushed the little lisper;
But the wish was heard in heaven,
And the angels caught the whisper:
So when the wondering sunbeams
Were lost in leafy mazes,
We laid our little Lillie
To sleep among the daisies.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

WE can not approve the course of the United States Senate in tacking to the deferred Post-office Deficiency Bill a provision abolishing the franking privilege: for the simple reason, that the payment of a just debt should not be rendered contingent on the success of a doubtful reform movement. But no person who holds sound views of public policy can question the soundness of the principle involved in the Senate's scheme for the abolition of Congressional franking.

The franking privilege was created in the mistaken notion that it was for the public interest that members of Congress should be enabled to receive and to dispatch letters and printed documents without incurring expense. It was assumed that the public had not the means or sense enough to pay for what it wanted in the shape of Congressional documents, and that members of Congress, in communicating with their constituents or the public at large, ought to be enabled to do so without charge.

There are a few cases in which the above principle may hold good. When a member of Congress writes to seek information of a citizen as a distance, or when a citizen volunteers such information as may be useful to a member in legislating for the public good, it would be unjust to throw either upon the member or the citizen the expense of postage. Some communications between members of Congress and private citizens should still be carried at the public expense.

But the necessity existing in this case is far from extending to the bulk of the matter which now passes through the mails under Congressional franks. Without referring to private parcels, which are notoriously carried great distances at the public cost, it is well known that the bulk of the franked matter now intrusted to the mails consists of Congressional speeches and electioneering documents. It is utterly unreasonable to seek to throw upon the public at large the duty of paying for the dissemination of such matter as this. To the public it is a matter of indifference which political party triumphs at elections, or what Congressional orator establishes the reputation for eloquence or patriotism. These considerations concern parties and individuals; and upon those parties and individuals the expense of their interests should fall. It is monstrously unjust to tax the people of the United States to pay for the transportation of party speeches or personal puffs. To collect money from the public to defray the carriage of Senator Sumner's anti-slavery harangues, or to tax the citizens of Massachusetts for the dissemination of Senator Toombs's appeals for a Southern confederacy.

The true plan would seem to be to modify—not to abolish—the franking privilege: to leave the citizens of each Congressional committee the privilege of franking, or receiving free of charge, all documents, printed or otherwise, which may be required for the purposes of his committee; and with regard to all other postal matter, to place it on the same footing as letters from merchant to merchant. If Senator Thurman does not like the public burden on the carriage of Senator Sumner's anti-slavery harangues, or to tax the citizens of Massachusetts for the disseminations of Senator Toombs's appeals for a Southern confederacy.

places, on a year ago last December was engaged in the casting of a huge cylinder, when an explosion took place, and the hot sand was blown into his eyes, burning the optic nerves, while a heavy piece of metal struck his body, causing a rupture. When he could move the company gave him some money—about a hundred and thirty dollars—and he made his way West from Baltimore, where he was injured, to consult some oculist of whom he had heard. All the last summer he was trying to get relief, but was gradually convinced that what he was told was true, and that his sight was gone forever. For some time he remained under the order the shock of this conviction, and then started from Chicago alone to make his way to New Hampshire, where he would find friends. I met him at Rome, in New York, and he said that he had come so far mainly on the kindness of conductors and inn-keepers. "They usually pass me on," he said, "and the hotel-keepers give me a bed and breakfast for nothing." When I asked him if he had no money at all, he said that at that moment he had none, and was going on to the next town where there were inn-works, for the owner generally made up a little sum among them to help him forward. When the conductor came the young man stated his case, and the inspector saw his honesty was so unavoidable that the conductor not only freely passed him, but returned and talked with him, and advised him where to go for the night upon arriving at the next town. Upon taking further, he said that it was very lonely and tedious to be so suddenly helpless, but that others were generally kind, and when he reached his friends in New Hampshire he should begin to learn some trade in which he might work in the dark. There was nothing querulous in his voice or manner, but the unique gravity of tone which is one of the tranquil sadness of his expression; for it seemed as if his power of smiling had gone with that of seeing.

He had a rough stroke upon arriving at the next town. It was late at night, and I found a men to show me the way to the nearest tavern. One of the blind man into the bar-room, when the landlord, a surly man—who evidently regarded our guide as a cheat—who brought him only customable customers—swore at him loudly for bringing a blind man into the house. The runner disdained himself, and I talked with the landlord, holding reason in my hand to which he soon yielded: but the runner refused even a penny for helping a blind man to the door.

There are plenty of blind men. The mishaps of every day and every hour. Then more should be pity. We who have all our senses and opportunities are sadly troubled if our rose-leaves are crumpled. And surely it is poor comfort, when we have broken an arm, to be told that we might have broken both legs, yet it will help us to bear our own griefs when we see others who think of the patient, silent heroism all around us.

THE LEGISLATURE UPON WOMEN'S RIGHTS.

PROBABLY we have all had our little joke at "Woman's Rights"—as if there were no such things, or as if they had all they were entitled to have: we may, of course, long for rights which are not offended, somehow, when Shakespeare makes Portia appear as the wise young Judge, although we know she is a woman disguised. We are not shocked to think of Hypatia lecturing in Alexandria; of Queen Elizabeth reviewing the troops at Tilbury; of Angelica Kauffman and Rosa Bonheur painting; of Mrs. Danner, the Princess Marie of Orleans, and Hattie Hosmer carving statues; or of Adelina Patti, Jenny Lind, and Adelaide Patti singing. We feel that they were all doing what they had the right to do, because they had the power of doing it well.

Will any political philosopher inform us why, if Rosa Bonheur should happen to marry (we use the best of women sometimes do) an idle, glossitude, vagabond husband, he should have the right to squander all the money she earned by her work for the gratification of his appetites, leaving her and her children, if she were unfortunate enough to have any, at the mercy of his caprice? And yet that has been virtually the state of things in this State, and in what the world itself, with amusing vanity, calls "the civilized world," down to the present time—modified now and then, but not in any radical manner.

That radical change, however, is now about to be made. Bills have been ordered to the third reading in the Houses of our Legislature—"unless fully recognize," says the Times correspondent, "the right of a married woman to the fruits of her own toil; giving her the exclusive control of her own earnings." This is simply just and honest, and it ought to have been done long ago. Moreover, it is the sign of the working of a principle which will lead to other great reforms in the relation of the sexes. To the women who have felt the grinding operation of the old system and have protested, as well as to those who spoke for them, we men have always been—we responded, "Come, come, strong-minded darling! go home and rock your children. Don't annex yourselves, dears, by meddling with things you know nothing about!" A poor mother-woman, who has toiled and drudged the whole week to earn money to buy food for her children, comes home on Saturday night, and the husband takes her wages to buy rum, and brings shame, and sorrow, and death into the house. She knows nothing about it, of course. She nurses herself of her sorrow, pales, and tries to feed and save her children. It is only husbands who understand these matters. Wives are fragile flowers committed to their tender nursing. The Heaven-appointed sphere of woman is home.

Very well. Let us grant that. But let us also take care that it be true. If her sphere be the home, she has the right to rule in it; and if she keep it going—if without her ways (overlooking for a moment the fragile flower theory) there be no home at all—surely she is to be sole arbitress of the disposition of those wages.

This is a truth so simple and lustrous that even legislating husbands have at length perceived it, and they are taking measures that it shall have the fortification of law. Of the ability and opportunity of women to earn wages Mrs. Dall has given the most interesting and striking details in her late calm little work of which the Lounger spoke nearly two months ago.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE FOR MARCH.

The Lounger has seen no better edited number of a magazine than Harper's for March. Mr. Stoddard's stirring ballad of "Valley Forge" is fully illustrated by Chapin's spirited picture. It would be hard to say whether the drawing was made for the poem or the poem for the drawing; in such stirred harmony have Poet and Artist wrought. Tennyson's classic poem of "Tithonus" is a notable feature of this number; but the Lounger has seen nothing, for a long time, in literature which Thackeray pays to Irving and Macaulay. Those who have been wont to look upon Thackeray merely as a humorist, or even as a satirist, may correct their notions by reading the touching record which he gives of the two men whose recent death has left such a void in the literature of our English tongue.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—R. IRVING P. "An Ode to a Friend's Old Hat" would provoke universal sympathy more than admiration. It is full of truthful feeling.

MY LADY'S SLIPPER.

I FOUND it at the foot of a rock beside an old forsaken saw-mill; originally the prettiest bit of delicate bronze hit in the world, ornamented with a beautiful velvet rouge, but now bleached and despanded with cruel clay, and with a slight rent on the left quarter, as though the foot it once encased had been forced to walk painfully, and left the little thing to perish. It was a mute appeal to my charity, and my Quixotic valor I lobed it out of the obstinate mire, with the eagle's beak that tips my walking stick, and proceeded to wipe away the dishonoring mark of its dishonor with my unread morning paper.

I suppose I had passed this old mill a score of times during the past three weeks, and yet I had never given it more than a careless glance until this very serene but sultry August morning, when the cool even sound of falling water had excited in a closer investigation of its peculiar beauties. The great mill-wheel was tufted with yellow moss; it ran up and down the rough boards in a green river between crevices; it overhung the roof; it twined itself around the stump of an aged elm, playfully entwined to get from one side to the other, then unsightly, and to cover the traces of decay with its tender fingers. There was also an abundance of drooping yellow lichen-work, and yet I had experiences a very agreeable sensation of inward satisfaction as my fingers met the crimson of bright crimson. SENATOR CLAY, OF ALABAMA.

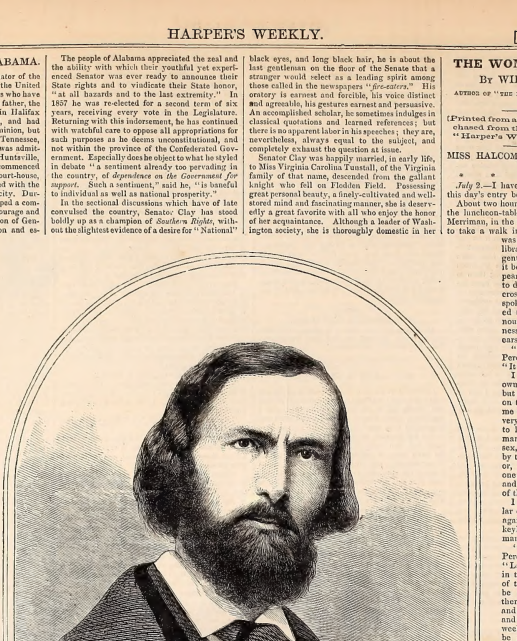
CLEMENT CLAIBORNE CLAY, a Senator of the State of Alabama in the Congress of the United States, is one of the three sons of senators who have been elected to seats in that body. His father, the Hon. Clement Comer Clay, was born in Halifax County, Virginia, December 17, 1789, and had strong ties to bind him to the Old Dominion, but an adventurous disposition led him to Tennessee, where he studied, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. In 1811 he removed to Huntsville, Alabama, then a mere village, where he commenced practice in the log cabin then used as a court-house, and where he has since resided, identified with the growth and prosperity of that flourishing city. During the Creek War he raised and equipped a company, which he commanded with such courage and zeal as to win the especial commendation of General Jesup, while he won the affection and esteem of those under him. On one occasion, finding that the provisions furnished were of such a bad quality as to endanger the health of his men, he at once ordered them to be burned, and had new supplies purchased with his private means.



The people of Alabama, appreciating Mr. Clay's talents and his devotion to the home of his adoption, have conferred upon him almost every office within their gift. He was a Member of the Territorial Council; he sat on the bench of the Circuit Court, of which he was Chief Justice from 1820 until he resigned in 1823; he was a Member and the Speaker of the State Legislature; he was a Representative in Congress from 1827 to 1835; he was Governor of the State in 1835 and 1836; in 1837 he was elected to the United States Senate; and he is now enjoying the evening of a well-spent life, esteemed throughout the Southern States as having invariably sustained the rights and upheld the honor of the land of his birth. A highminded politician, a judicious and well-read lawyer, and a scholar of varied attainments, he is none the less devoted to the attractions of home.

His son, Clement C. Clay, Jun., the subject of this sketch, derives his middle name of Claiborne from the family of his mother. He was born in 1819, in Madison County, Alabama; and in his case an old proverb is falsified, as he has ever enjoyed high "honor in his own country," which he has proudly clung to. Nature was no niggard in endowing him with intellectual abilities; neither was he unmindful, at an early age, of the obligations they imposed. He graduated with honor at the University of Alabama when in his sixteenth year.

When Mr. Clay senior was elected Governor of Alabama he appointed his son Private Secretary, and the young student was at once launched upon the troubled waters of political excitement. But he did not forsake his books—indeed he has never forsaken them; constantly adding to the stores of a most retentive memory, and securing to himself the grace of a wide cultivation, including power as well as the classics, the law, and political economy. His editorial contributions to the leading journal of the State at that time show the singular fearlessness and honesty which has since characterized his course, and has made him a statesman rather than a politician.

After his father was transferred from the Gubernatorial chair to the Senate of the United States Mr. Clay went to the University of Virginia, where he completed his legal studies. Returning to Huntsville he commenced practice, and with success; but his fellow-citizens soon insisted on electing him as their representative to the State Legislature, in which he served with credit in 1842, '44, and '45. In 1846 the Legislature elected him Judge of the Madison County Court, where he presided with dignity and courtesy until 1848, when he resigned, to resume his practice. In this he was eminently successful, possessing that rare legal perception which distinguishes the lucid expounder of the law from the accidental forms in which it is often obscured.

In 1853 Mr. Clay was elected a Senator from Alabama, and immediately took a high position among those of his peers who consider the attainment of political power as of minor importance compared with the honest expression of their sentiments. Regarding himself as the envoy of a sovereign State to the Council of the Confederation, he was ever ready to assert the rights of that State, as defined by Jefferson and by Calhoun. To quote his own words in an important debate, "Identified with Alabama," said he, "by my birth, education, interest, and affection—regarding her as 'my nurse in my mother and my grave'—indebted to her for the highest honors and greatest trusts she could bestow, and standing here as one of her commanders in this council-chamber of sovereign States, I feel it my duty as well as privilege to justify, as far as I can, all her acts relating to her sister States or to the Federal Government."

HON. CLEMENT CLAIBORNE CLAY, OF ALABAMA.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

Her acts in relation to the Federal Government have been characterized by a spirit of moderation and conciliation, which, while it has not failed to secure the respect of her sister States, has won the confidence of the Federal Government. Her claims to the public lands, her rights in the Territories, her position on the slavery question, have been ably and eloquently maintained by her Senators, and by no one more than by the subject of this sketch. Alabama has been fortunate in her representatives, and has never had reason to blush for the conduct of any of them.

Mr. Clay's speeches in the Senate have been numerous, and have always been listened to with attention. He has never spoken for mere effect, but has always had something to say, and has said it in a manner which has commanded the respect of his opponents. His speech on the Homestead Bill, in 1854, was a masterly exposition of the principles involved in that measure, and was regarded as one of the ablest arguments in favor of the bill. His speech on the Kansas question, in 1856, was a calm, dignified, and able vindication of the rights of the South in the Territories, and was listened to with profound attention by the Senate and by the crowded galleries. His speech on the Pacific Railroad, in 1857, was a clear and able exposition of the constitutional powers of Congress in relation to the subject, and was also listened to with attention. His speech on the Homestead Bill, in 1859, was a calm and able argument against the principles of the bill, and was also listened to with attention. His speech on the Harper's Ferry raid, in the Senate, he calmly narrated the provocations which he considered the Southern States had received, and then said, "I rise here to indulge in no menace. We have been menaced during this Congress, and often before, by our political opponents, with the halter and the hangman if we dare resist their authority, and refuse to submit to subjugation. I know that those who are foremost to threaten are generally hindmost to execute. I never have uttered, and never will utter any menace. I make no predictions, no promises for my State; but, in conclusion, will only say that, if she is faithful to the pledges she has made and principles she has professed—if she is true to her own interest and her own honor—if she is not recreant to all that State pride, integrity, and duty demands, she will never submit to an unjust and iniquitous sectional authority."

Senator Clay's personal appearance is that of a student rather than a politician. Tall, rather slender in form, with thoughtful features, keen black eyes, and long black hair, he is about the last gentleman on the floor of the Senate that a stranger would select as a leading spirit among those called in the newspapers "fire-eaters." His oratory is earnest and forcible, his voice distinct and agreeable, his gestures earnest and persuasive. An accomplished scholar, he sometimes indulges in classical quotations and learned references; but there is no apparent labor in his speeches; they are, nevertheless, always equal to the subject, and completely exhaust the question at issue.

Senator Clay was happily married, in early life, to Miss Virginia Carolina Tunstall, of the Virginia family of that name, descended from the gallant knight who fell on Flodden Field. Possessing great personal beauty, a finely-cultivated and well-stored mind and fascinating manner, she is deservedly a great favorite with all who enjoy the honor of her acquaintance. Although a leader of Washington society, she is thoroughly domestic in her habits, and noted for her sympathy with those in distress, her kindness to the sick, and her charity to those in want. Idolizing her husband, and devoted to the State of which he is a Senator, she is emphatically his help-mate, and should share his laurels, as she has done much to encourage and to aid him in obtaining them. Their only child died some years since.

Senator Clay purchased, a few years since, a romantic site on an eminence near Huntsville, called Menifauna, and has there erected a rural home, christened "Cozy Cot." It is described as a lovely retreat, with the delicious temperature attendant on its location, two thousand feet above the level of the sea, and commanding a panoramic view, almost unequaled, of the Huntsville land of the Tennessee River. Here, when released from his official duties, the Senator indulges in agricultural improvements, or joins his wife in her floral pursuits; enjoys the rare treasures of his valuable library, and dispenses the courteous, cordial hospitality found at a Southern Home.

* * * * * * *

July 2.—I have a few lines more to add to this day's entry before I go to bed to-night.

About two hours after Sir Percival rose from the luncheon-table to receive his solicitor, Mr. Merriman, in the library, I left my room, alone, to take a walk in the plantations. Just as I was at the end of the landing, the library door opened, and the two gentlemen came out. Thinking it best not to disturb them by appearing on the stairs, I resolved to defer going down till they had crossed the hall. Although they spoke to each other in guarded tones, their words were pronounced with sufficient distinctness of utterance to reach my ears.

"Make your mind easy, Sir Percival," I heard the lawyer say. "It all rests with Lady Glyde."

I had turned to go back to my own room, for a minute or two; but the sound of Laura's name on the lips of a stranger stopped me instantly. I dare say it was very wrong and very discreditable to listen—but where is the woman, in the whole range of our sex, who can regulate her actions by the abstract principles of honor, when those principles point one way, and when her affections, and the interests which grow out of them, point the other?

I listened; and, under similar circumstances, I would listen again—yes! with my ear at the keyhole, if I could not possibly manage it in any other way.

"You quite understand, Sir Percival?" the lawyer went on. "Lady Glyde is to sign her name in the presence of a witness—or of two witnesses, if you wish to be particularly careful—and is then to put her finger on the seal, and say, 'I deliver this as my act and deed.' If that is done in a week's time, the arrangement will be perfectly successful, and the anxiety will be all over. If not—"

"What do you mean by 'if not?'" asked Sir Percival, angrily. "If the thing must be done, it shall be done. I promise you that, Merriman."

"Just so, Sir Percival—just so; but there are two alternatives in all transactions; and we lawyers like to look both of them in the face boldly. If through any extraordinary circumstance the arrangement should not be made, I think I may be able to get the parties to accept bills at three months. But how the money is to be raised when the bills fall due—"

"Damn the bills! The money is only to be got in one way; and in that way, I tell you again, it shall be got. Take a glass of wine, Merriman, before you go."

"Much obliged, Sir Percival; I have not a moment to lose, if I am to catch the up-train. You will let me know as soon as the arrangement is completed? and you will not forget the caution I recommended—"

"Of course I won't. There's the dog-cart at the door for you. Jump in. My groom shall get you to the station in no time. Benjamin, drive like mad! If Mr. Merriman misses his train, you lose your place. Hold fast, Merriman, and if you are upset, trust to the devil to save his own."—With that parting benediction the baronet turned about and walked back to the library.

I had not heard much; but the little that had reached my ears was enough to make me feel uneasy. The "something" that "had happened" was but too plainly a serious money embarrassment; and Sir Percival's relief from it depended upon Laura. The prospect of seeing her involved in her husband's secret difficulties filled me with dismay, exaggerated, no doubt, by my ignorance of business and my settled distrust of Sir Percival. Instead of going out, as I had proposed, I went back immediately to Laura's room to tell her what I had heard.

She received my bad news so composedly as to surprise me. She evidently knows more of her husband's character and her husband's embarrassments than I have suspected up to this time.

"I feared as much," she said, "when I heard of that strange gentleman who called, and declined to leave his name."

"Who do you think the gentleman was, then?" I asked.

"Some person who has heavy claims on Sir Percival," she answered; "read who has been the cause of Mr. Merriman's visit here to-day."

"No you know any thing about those claims?"

"No; I know no particulars."

"You will sign nothing, Laura, without first looking at it?"

"Certainly not, Marian. Whatever I can harmlessly and honestly do to help him I will do—for the sake of making your life and mine love, as easy and as happy as possible. But I will do nothing ignorantly which we might one day have reason to feel ashamed of. Let us say no more about it now. You have got your hat on—suppose we go and dream away the afternoon in the grounds?"

On leaving the house we directed our steps to the nearest shade. As we passed an open space among the trees in front of the house there was Count Fosco, slowly walking backward and forward on the grass, sunning himself in the full blaze of the hot July afternoon. He had a broad straw-hat on, with a violet-colored ribbon round it. A blue blouse, with profuse white fancy-work over the bosom, covered his prodigious body, and was girt about the place where his waist might once have been with a broad scarlet leather belt. Nankeen trousers, displaying more white fancy-work over the ankles, and purple morocco slippers completed his lower extremities. He was singing Figaro's famous song in the Barber of Seville, with that cringing display of vocalization which is wrung from any other than an Italian throat; accompanying himself on the concertina, which he played with dramatic throwings-up of his arms, and graceful twistings and turnings of his head, like a fat St. Cecilia masquerading in male attire. "Figaro qua! Figaro la!" Figaro qua! Figaro giù!" sang the Count, jauntily tossing up the concertina at arm's-length, and bowing to us, on one side of the instrument, with the air, grace and elegance of Figaro himself at twenty years of age.

"Take my word for it, Laura, that man knows something of Sir Percival's embarrassments," I said, as we returned the Count's salutation from a safe distance.

"What makes you think that?" she asked.

"How should he have known, otherwise, that Mr. Merriman was Sir Percival's solicitor?" rejoined. "Besides, when I followed you out of the inhabited room, he told me, without a single word of inquiry on my part, that something had happened. Depend upon it, he knows more than we do."

"Don't ask him any questions, if he does. Don't take him into our confidence!"

"You seem to dislike him, Laura, in a very determined manner. What has he said or done to justify you?"

"Nothing, Marian. On the contrary, he was all kindness and attention on our journey home, and he several times checked Sir Percival's ourbreaks of temper in the most considerate manner toward me. Perhaps I dislike him because he has so much power over my husband than I have. Perhaps it hurts my pride to be under any obligations to his interference. All I know is, that I do dislike him."

The rest of the day and the evening passed quietly enough. The Count and I played at chess. For the first two games he politely allowed me to conquer him; and then, when he saw that I had found him out, begged my pardon, and, at the third game, checkmated me in ten minutes. Sir Percival never once referred, all through the evening, to the lawyer's visit. But either that event, or something else, had produced a singular alteration for the better in him. He was as polite and agreeable to all of us as he used to be in the days of his probation at Limmeridge; and he was so amazingly attentive and kind to his wife that even Jey Madame Fosco was roused into looking at him with a grave surprise. What does this mean? I think I can guess; I am afraid Laura can guess; and I am quite sure Count Fosco knows. I caught Sir Percival looking at him for approval more than once in the course of the evening.

3d. A day of events. I most fervently hope and pray I may not have to add, a day of disasters as well.

Sir Percival was as silent at breakfast as he had been the evening before on the subject of the mysterious "arrangement" (as the lawyer called it) which is hanging over our heads. An hour afterward, however, he suddenly entered the morning-room, where his wife and I were waiting, with our hats on, for Madame Fosco to join us, and inquired for the Count.

"We expect to see him here directly," I said.

"The fact is," Sir Percival went on, walking nervously about the room, "I want Fosco and his wife in the library, for a mere business formality; and I want you there, Laura, for a minute, too." He stopped, and appeared to notice, for the first time, that we were in our walking costume. "Have you just come in?" he asked, "or were you just going out?"

"We were all thinking of going to the lake this morning," said Laura. "But if you have any other arrangement to propose—"

"No, no," he answered, hastily. "My arrangement can wait. After dinner will do as well for it as after breakfast. Run along to the lake, eh? A good idea. Let's have an idle morning; I'll be one of the party."

There was no mistaking his manner, even if it had been possible to mistake the uncharacteristic readiness which its words expressed, to submit his own plans and projects to the convenience of others. His good-humored interest in finding an excuse for delaying the business formality in the library, to which his own words had referred. My best week within me as I drew the inevitable inference.

The Count and his wife joined us at that moment. The latter had brought a gorgeously-red tobacco-pouch, and her store of paper in her hand for the manufacture of the eternal cigarettes. The husband dressed, as usual, in his blouse and straw-hat, carried the gay little pagoda-cage, with his darling white mice in it, and smiled and bowed to us, with the bland amiability which it was impossible to resist.

"With your kind permission," said the Count, "I will take my small family, here—my poor little harmless pensioners—out for an airing along with us. There are dogs about the house, and shall I leave my forlorn white children at the mercies of my dog? I think not."

He chirruped paternally at his small white children through the bars of the pagoda; and we all left the house in a body.

In the plantation Sir Percival strayed away from us. It seems to be part of his restless disposition always to separate himself from his companions on these occasions, and always to occupy himself, when he is alone, in cutting new walking-sticks for his own use. He has a mania at cutting and lopping, at hazard, appears to please him. He has filled the house with walking-sticks of his own cutting, and yet he never takes up for a second time. When they have been used once, he throws them by as if exhausted, and he thinks of nothing but going on and making more.

The Count and Madame he joined us again. I will put down the conversation that ensued, when we were all settled in our places, exactly as it passed. It is a remarkable conversation, as far as I am concerned, for it has seriously disposed me to distrust the influence which Count Fosco exercises over my own better feelings. I intend, and to resist it, for the future, as resolutely as I can.

The boat-house was large enough to hold us all; but Sir Percival remained outside, trimming the last new stick with his pocket-axe. The three women found plenty of room on the large seat. Laura took her work, and Madame Fosco began her embroidery. I, as usual, had nothing to do. My hands always were, and always will be, as awkward as a man's. The Count good-humoredly took a stool, many sizes too small for him, and balanced himself on it with his back against the side of the shed, which creaked and groaned under his weight. He put the pagoda cage on his lap, and let out the mice to crawl over him as usual. They are pretty, innocent-looking little creatures, and the sight of them creeping about a man's body is, for some reason, not pleasant to me. It excites a strange, responsive creeping in my own nerves; and suggests hideous ideas of men dying in prison, with the crawling creatures of the dungeon preying on them unstarved.

The morning was windy and cloudy; and the rapid alternations of shade and sunlight over the waste of the lake made the view look doubly wild, weird, and gloomy.

"I call that picturesque," said Sir Percival, pointing over the wide prospect with his half-finished walking-stick. "I call it a blot on my property. In my grandfather's time the lake flowed to this place. Look at it now! It is not four feet deep anywhere, and it is full of eddies and pools. I wish I could afford to drain it, and plant it all over. My bailiff (a superstitious idiot) says he is quite sure the lake has a cause on it, like the Dead Sea. What do you think, Fosco? It looks just the place for a murder, doesn't it?"

"My good Percival!" remonstrated the Count. "What is your solid English sense thinking of? The water is too shallow to hide the body; and there is sand every where to print off the murderer's footsteps. It is, upon the whole, the very worst place for a murder that I ever set my eyes on."

"Humbug!" said Sir Percival, cutting away fiercely at his stick. "You know what I mean. The dreary scenery—the lonely situation. If you choose to understand me, you can—if you don't choose, I am not going to trouble myself to explain my meaning."

"And why not," asked the Count, "when your meaning can be explained by any body in two words? If a fool was going to commit a murder, your lake is the first place he would choose for it. If a wise man was going to commit a murder, your lake is the last place he would choose for it. Is that your meaning? If it is, there is your explanation for you, ready made. Take it, Percival, with your good Fosco's blessing."

Laura looked at the Count, plainly in her dislike for him appearing a little less plainly in her fear. He was so busy with his mice that he did not notice her.

"I am sorry to hear the lake-view connected with any thing so horrible as the idea of murder," she said. "And if Count Fosco must divide murderers into classes, I think he has been very unfortunate in his choice of expressions. He gives them as fools only, seems like treating them with an indulgence to which they have no claim. And to describe them as wise men, sounds to me like a downright contradiction in terms. I have always heard that truly wise men are truly good men, and have a horror of crime."

"My dear lady," said the Count, "those are admirable sentiments; and I have seen them stated at the tops of copy-books." He lifted one of the white mice in the palm of his hand, and spoke to it in his whimsical way. "My pretty little smooth white rascal," he said, "here is a moral lesson for you. A truly wise Person is a law to good Mouse. Mention that, if you please, to your companions, and never gnaw at the bars of your cage again as long as you live."

"It is easy to turn every thing into ridicule," said Laura, resolutely; "but you will not find it quite so easy, Count Fosco, to give me an instance of a wise man who has been a great criminal."

The Count shrugged his huge shoulders, and smiled on Laura in the friendliest manner.

"Most true!" he said. "The fool's crime is the crime that is found out; and the wise man's crime is the crime that is not found out. If I could give you an instance, it would not be the instance of a wise man. Dear Lady Glyde, your sound English common sense has been too much for me. It is checkmate for me this time, Miss Halcombe—ha?"

"Stand to your guns, Laura," sneered Sir Percival, who had been listening in his place at the door. "Tell him, next, that crimes cause their own detection. There's another bit of copy-book morality for you, Fosco. Crimes cause their own detection. What infernal humbug!"

"I believe it to be true," said Laura, quietly.

Sir Percival burst out laughing—so violently, so outrageously, that he quite startled us all—the Count himself not excepted.

"I believe it, too," I said, coming to Laura's rescue.

Sir Percival, who had been unaccountably amused at his wife's remark, was, just as unaccountably, in a violent fit of anger. He struck his new walking-stick savagely on the sand, and walked away from us.

"Bless our dear Percival!" cried Count Fosco, looking after him gayly; "he is the victim of English spleen. But, my dear Miss Halcombe, my dear Lady Glyde, do you really believe that crimes cause their own detection? And you, my angel," he continued, turning to his wife, who had not uttered a word yet, "do you think so too?"

"I wait to be instructed," replied the Countess, in tones of unusually strong reserve, addressed to Laura and me, "before I venture on giving my opinion in the presence of well-informed men."

"Do you, indeed?" I said. "I remember the time, Countess, when you advocated the Rights of Women—and freedom of female opinion was one of them."

"What is your view of the subject, Count?" asked Madame Fosco, calmly proceeding with her cigarettes, and not taking the least notice of me.

The Count smiled, and recited one of his white mice reflectively with his unoccupied little finger before he answered.

"It is truly wonderful," he said, "how easily Society can console itself for the worst of its shortcomings with a little bit of clap-trap. The machinery it has set up for the detection of crime is miserably ineffective—and yet only invent a moral sentiment, and hope that it works well, and you blind every body to the blunders of the hour the moment. — Crimes cause their own detection, do they? And murder will out (another moral epigram), will it? Ask Coroners who sit at inquests in huge towns if that is true, Lady Glyde. Ask secretaries of life-assurance companies if that is true, Miss Halcombe. Read your own public journals. In the few cases that get into the newspapers, are there not instances of slain bodies found, and no murderers ever discovered? Multiply the cases that are reported by the cases that are not reported, and the bodies that are found by the bodies that are not found, and what conclusion do you come to? This: that there are foolish criminals who are discovered, and wise criminals who escape. The hiding of a crime, or the detection of a crime, resolves itself into a trial of skill between the police on one side, and the individual on the other. When the criminal is a brutal, ignorant fool, the police, in nine cases out of ten, win. When the criminal is a resolute, educated, high-intelligent man, the police, in nine cases out of ten, lose. If the police win, you generally hear all about it. If the police lose, you generally hear nothing. And on this tottering foundation you build up your comfortable moral maxim that Crime causes its own detection! Yes—till the crime you know of. And what of the rest?"

"Devilish true, and very well put," cried a voice at the entrance of the boat-house. Sir Percival had recovered his equanimity, and had come back while we were listening to the Count.

"Some of it may be true," I said; "not all of it may be very well put. But I don't see why Count Fosco should celebrate the victory of the criminal over society with so much exultation, or why you, Sir Percival, should applaud him so loudly for doing it."

"Do you hear that, Fosco?" asked Sir Percival, with a sneer. "Take my advice, and make your peace with your audience. Tell them Virtue's a fine thing—they like it, and I can promise you."

The Count laughed inwardly and silently; and two of the white mice in his waistcoat, alarmed by the internal convulsion going on beneath them, darted out in a violent hurry, and scrambled into their cage again.

"The ladies, my good Percival, shall tell us about virtue," he said. "They are better authorities than I am; for they know what virtue is, and I don't."

"You hear him?" said Sir Percival. "Isn't it awful?"

"It is true," said the Count, quietly. "I am a citizen of the world, and I have met, in my time, with so many different sorts of virtue, that I am puzzled, in my old age, to say which is the right sort and which is the wrong. Here, in England, there is one virtue. And there, in China, there is another virtue. And your John Redglishman says my virtue is the genuine virtue. And John Chinaman says my virtue is the genuine virtue. And I say Yes to one, or No to the other, and am just as much bewildered about it in the case of John with the top-boots as I am in the case of John with the pigtail. Ah, nice little Mouse! come kiss me. What is your own private notion of a virtuous man, my pet-pet-pretty? A man who keeps you warm and gives you plenty to eat. And a good notion, too, for it is intelligible, at the least."

"Sir, a man," said the Count, "interposed. "Accepting your illustration, surely we have one unquestionably virtue in England which is wanting in China. The Chinese authorities kill thousands of innocent people, on the most horridly frivolous pretexts. We, in England, are free from all guilt of that kind—we commit no such dreadful crime—we abhor reckless bloodshed with all our hearts."

"Quite right, Marian," said Laura. "Well thought of, and well expressed."

"Pray allow the Count to proceed," said Madame Fosco, with stern civility. "You will find, young ladies, that he never speaks without having excellent reasons for all that he says."

"Thank you, my angel," replied the Count. "Have a bonbon?" He took out of his pocket a pretty little inlaid box, and placed it open on the table. "Chocolat à la Vanille," cried the impenetrable man, cheerfully rattling the sweetmeats in the box, and having all stored, Clarefred by Fusco as an act of homage to the charming society.

"FIGARO QUA! FIGARO LÀ!" ETC.

"Be good enough to go on, Count," said his wife, with a spiteful reference to myself. "Oblige me by answering Miss Halcombe."

"Miss Halcombe is unanswerable," replied the polite Italian—"that is to say, so far as she goes. Yes! I agree with her. John Bull does abhor the memory of John Chatterton. He is the quickest old gentleman at finding out the faults that are his neighbors', and the slowest old gentleman at finding out the faults that are his own, who exists on the face of creation. Is he so very much better in his way than the people whom he condemns in their way? English society, Miss Halcombe, is as often the accomplice as it is the enemy of crime. Yes! yes! Crime is in this country what crime is in other countries—a good friend to a man and to those about him as often as it is an enemy. A good rascal provides for his wife and family. The worse he is, the more he makes them the objects for your sympathy. He often provides, too, for himself. A profligate spendthrift who is always borrowing money, will get more from his friends than the right honest man who only borrows of them once, under pressure of the direst want. In the one case, the friends will not be at all surprised, and they will pay. In the other case, they will be very much surprised, and they will hesitate. Is the prison that Mr. Secretary lives in, at the end of his career, a more uncomfortable place than the work-house that Mr. Honesty lives in, at the end of his career? When John-Howard-Philanthropist wants to relieve misery, he goes to find it in persons where crime is everywhere, and in those rare cases where virtue is wretched too. Who is the English poet who has won the most universal sympathy —who makes the easiest of all subjects for pathetic writing and pathetic painting? That nice young person who begun life with a forgery, and ended it by a suicide—your dear, romantic, interesting Chatterton. Which gets on best, do you think, of two poor starving dress-makers—the woman who tells temptation that it is honest, or the woman who falls under temptation, and steals? Come all honest people, and thank me for making of that second woman's fortune—it advertises her from length to breadth of goodhumored, unmistakable Englishness—and she is relieved, as the breaker of a commandment, when she would have been left to starve, as the keeper of it. Come, my jolly little Monsoe! Be—be presto! pass! I transform you, for the time being, into a respectable lady. Stop there, in the palm of your hand, my dear, and—and listen. You marry the poor man whom you love, Mouse; and one half your friends pity, and the other half blame you. And you—on the contrary, you sell yourself for gold to a man you don't care for; and all your friends rejoice over you; and a minister of public virtue sanctions the base horror of the vilest of all human bargains; and smiles and smirks afterward at your table. If you are quite enough to make him to breakfast. Hey! presto! pass! Be a mouse again, and speak. If you continue to be a lady much longer, I shall have you telling me that Society abhors crime—and then, Mouse, I shall close if your own eyes and ears instantly of any use to you. Ah! I am a bad man, Lady Glyde, am I not? I say what other people only think; and when all the rest of the world is in a conspiracy to accept the mask for the true face, mine is the rash hand that tears off the plausible pasteboard, and shows the bare truth underneath. I will get up on my big elephant's legs before I do myself any more harm in your sensible estimation—I will get up and walk the little airy walk of my own. Dear ladies, as your excellent Sheridan said, I go—and leave my character behind me."

He got up, put the cage on the table, and paused for a moment to count the mice in it. "One, two, three, four—Ha!" he cried, with a look of horror, "where, in the name of Heaven, is the fifth—the prettiest, the whitest, the most amiable of all—my Benjamin of mice!"

Neither Laura nor I were in any favorable disposition to be amused. The Count's gibing cynicism had revealed a new aspect of his nature from which we both recoiled. It was natural in impossible to avoid a mental distress of no very large a man at the loss of so very small a mouse. We laughed, in spite of ourselves; and when Madame Fosco came to set the example of leaving the best-house empty, so that her husband might search it to its remotest corners, we rose also to follow her.

Before we had taken three steps the Count's quick eye discovered the lost mouse under the seat that we had been occupying. He pulled aside the bench, took the little animal up in his hand, and suddenly stopped, with his back turned, looking intently at a particular place on the ground just beneath him.

We had no idea what fresh agitin his hand should so that he could hardly put the mouse back in the cage, and his face was of a faint livid yellow hue all over.

"Percival!" he said, in a whisper. "Percival! come here."

Sir Percival had paid no attention to any of us for the last ten minutes He had been entirely absorbed in writing figures on the sand, and then rubbing them out again, with the point of his stick.

"What's the matter now?" he asked, lounging carelessly into the boat-house.

"Do you see nothing there?" said the Count, catching him nervously by the collar with one hand, and pointing with the other to the place near which he had found the mouse.

"I see plenty of dry sand," answered Sir Percival; "and a spot of dirt in the middle of it."

"Not dirt," whispered the Count, fastening the other hand suddenly on Sir Percival's arm, and shaking it in his agitation. "Blood!"

Laura was near enough to hear the last word, and by an instinct she interpreted it. She turned to me with a look of terror.

"Nonsense, my dear," I said. "There is no need to be alarmed. It is only the blood of a poor little stray dog."

Every body was astonished, and every body's eyes were fixed on me instantly.

"How do you know that?" asked Sir Percival, speaking first.

"I found the dog here, dying, on the day when you all returned from abroad," I replied. "The poor creature had strayed into the plantation, and had been shot by some keeper."

"Whose dog was it?" inquired Sir Percival. "Do you own it?"

"Did you try to save the poor thing?" asked Laura, earnestly. "Surely you tried to save it, Marian?"

"Yes," I said; "the housekeeper and I both did our best—but the dog was mortally wounded, and he died under our hands."

"Whose dog was it?" persisted Sir Percival, repeating his question in a little irritably. "One of mine?"

"No, not one of yours."

"Whose, then? Did the housekeeper know?"

The housekeeper was one of Mrs. Catherick's desire to conceal her visit to Blackwater Park from Sir Percival's knowledge, occurred to my memory the moment he put that last question, and I half doubted the discretion of answering it. But, on the other hand, after the general alarm, I had thoughtlessly advanced too far to draw back, except at the risk of exciting suspicions which might do Count roughly, and placed himself face to face with me, under the open sky-light.

"How came the housekeeper to know it was Mrs. Catherick's dog?" he asked, fixing his eyes on mine with the same close and attention which half-angered, half-startled me.

"She knew it," I said, quickly, "because Mrs. Catherick herself owned it to me."

"Brought it with her? Where did she bring it with her?"

"To this house."

"What the devil did Mrs.-Catherick want at this house?"

The manner in which he put the question was even more offensive than the language in which he expressed it. I marked my sense of his want of common politeness by silently turning away from him.

Just as I moved, the Count's pervasive hand laid me on his shoulder, and Count's cool, malhideous voice interposed to quiet him.

"Be still, Percival—be still—gently—gently."

Sir Percival looked round in his angriest manner. The Count only smiled, and repeated the soothing, "gently—gently."

"Gently, my good friend—gently!"

Sir Percival hesitated—followed me a few steps—and, to my great surprise, offered me an apology.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Halcombe," he said. "I am provoked by a trifle, and I am afraid I am a little irritable. But I should like to know what Mrs. Catherick could possibly want here. When did you see her? Was the housekeeper the only person who saw her?"

"The only person," I answered, "so far as I know."

The Count interposed again.

"In that case, why not question the housekeeper? It will be time enough, then, Percival, to the fountain-head of information at once?"

"Quite enough," said Sir Percival. "Of course the housekeeper is the first person in question. Excessively stupid of me not to see it myself." With a few words he instantly left us to return to the house.

The motive of the Count's interference, which had puzzled me at first, now revealed itself to Sir Percival's back was turned. He had a host of questions to put to me about Mrs. Catherick, and he rightly judged that the housekeeper, to which he could scarcely have asked in his friend's presence. I made my answers as short as I civilly could, and then hastened forward to the check the least approach to my exchanging of confidences between Count Fosco and myself. Laura, however, encouraged by her friend to be extract all my information, by making inquiries herself, which left me no alternative but to reply to her. The sense of being in a trap in the very unenviable and very false character of a depository of Sir Percival's secrets, at the end of it was, that, in about ten minutes' time, the Count knew as much as I knew of Mrs. Catherick, and of the relations which had unwittingly connected us with her daughter, Anne, from the time when Hartright met with her to this day.

The effect of my information on him was, in one respect, curious enough. Intimately as he knows Sir Percival, and closely as he appears to be associated with him in certain family affairs in general, he is certainly as far as I am from knowing any thing of the true story of Anne Catherick. The unsolved mystery in connection with this unhappy woman is now rendered doubly suspicious, in my eyes, by the absolute conviction which I feel that the clew to it has been hidden by Sir Percival from the most intimate friend he has in the world. It was impossible to mistake the eager curiosity of the Count's look and manner while he drank in greedily every word that fell from my lips. There are many kinds of curiosity, I know—but there is no misinterpreting the curiosity of blank surprise. If ever I saw it in my life, I saw it in the Count's face.

While the questions and answers were going on we had all been strolling quietly back through the plantation. As soon as we reached the house the first object that we saw in front of it was Sir Percival's dog-cart, with the horse just to and harnessed by it in the stable-jacket. If these unexpected appearances were to be trusted, the examination of the housekeeper had not produced results already.

"A fine horse, my friend," said the Count, addressing the groom with the most engaging familiarity of manner. "You are going to drive out?"

"I am not going, Sir," replies the man, looking at his stable-jacket, and evidently wondering whether the foreign gentleman took it for granted that he was going to drive himself.

"Aha?" said the Count, "does he indeed? I wonder he gives himself the trouble when he has got you to drive for him? He is going to fatigue that nice, shining, pretty horse by taking him very far, to-day?"

"I don't know, Sir," answered the man. "The horse is a mare, if you please, Sir. She's the highest-coursged thing we've got in the stables. Her name is Minny. Minny, sir! and she'll go till she drops. Sir Percival usually takes four of York for the short distances."

"And your shining courageous Brown Molly for the long?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Logical inference, Miss Halcombe," continued the Count, wheeling round briskly, and addressing me. "Sir Percival is going a long distance to-day."

I made no reply. I had my own inferences to draw, from what I knew through the housekeeper and from what I saw before me; and I did not choose to share them with Count Fosco.

When Sir Percival (who is in Cumberland if thought to myself) he walked away a long distance, on Anne's account, to question the family at Todd's Corner, and that he is in Hampshire, he is going to drive away a long distance, on Anne's account again, to question Mrs. Catherick at Limmeridge!

We all entered the house. As we crossed the hall Sir Percival met us on the library door to meet us. He looked hurried and pale and anxious—but for all that he was in his most quiet manner when he spoke to me.

"I am sorry to say I am obliged to leave you," he began—"a long drive—a matter that I can't very well put off. I shall be back in good time to-morrow—but, before I go, I should like that little business-formality which I spoke of this morning to be settled. Laura, will you come into the library?" It won't take a minute.—a mere formality. Countess, may I trouble you also? I want you and the Countess, Fosco, to be witnesses to a signature—nothing more. Come in at once, and get it over."

He held the library door open until they had passed in, followed them, and shut it softly.

I remained for a moment perversely standing alone in the hall, with my heart beating fast, and my mind misgiving me sadly. Then I went on to the staircase and ascended slowly to my own room.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, Feb. 13, in the Senate, the death of Senator Broderick, of California, was announced by Senator Hunt (Cal.), who took occasion to give a brief history of the career of the deceased. Mr. Broderick was born in Cattsenden (Ky.), Seward (N. Y.), Foster (Conn.), Fessenden (Me.), and Hamlin (Me.) made appropriate remarks of respect for the memory of the deceased were passed, and the Senate adjourned over to Wednesday. Mr. Broderick's child called for the question on his motion to go into an election of Clerk, and Hemphill Johnston, Esq., on the offer that the House shall retain the right to modify existing laws relative to the printing of the Senate and House. It was chosen shall accept the offer with this understanding. The House proceeded to the 57th ballot. Two votes were lost, when further proceedings were interrupted by the receipt of a message from the Senate, announcing the death of Senator Broderick, of California. In the first vote Mr. Johnston received 116 votes—Mr. Morris (Ill.), Sanders of Sexton, 7; Mr. Blanchard, 2; Mr. Mitchell, 1; and Mr. Hickman (Pa.), Dorlinguese (Mass.), Morris (Ill.), and Sherman (Ohio), 1 each. The vote was then announced made of the death of Senator Broderick, and appropriate resolutions were adopted, and the House adjourned over.

On Tuesday, February 14, in the Senate, the Wyandot (Kansas) State Constitution was received. Senator Seward (N. Y.) moved to take up the Committee on Territories. Senator Brown (Miss.) moved an inquiry whether it is intended to act upon the Wyandot State Bill on which there will some discussion, which Senator Douglas (Ill.) replied that the Committee on the Territories be instructed to report immediately a bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union. Senator Wilson (Mass.) rose for a special order arrived, and by general consent the Senate proceeded to the consideration of private bills. Reports, without debating the question on Kansas affairs. Senator Bayard (Del.) moved that the Presidential elections were afterward taken up. Senator Seward (N. Y.) addressed himself to the question in a very exciting speech was interrupted by the hour of 1 o'clock arriving for the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour, which was the Homestead bill.

On Wednesday, February 15, in the Senate, the Wyandot (Kansas) State Constitution was received. Senator Seward (N. Y.) moved to take up the Committee on Territories. On Wednesday, February 15, in the Senate, Senator Mason (Va.) moved an order for the arrest of Messrs. Sanborn, John Brown, Jun., and Redpath, who refused to answer the summons to appear before the Harper's Ferry investigating Committee. The resolution was adopted. The Post-office Deficiency bill was taken up, and the Senate exceeded from its amendment abolishing the franking privilege. The bill to abolish the franking privileges was then taken up, and after various proposition for amendment, the consideration it was postponed when the Senate adjourned.——In the House a memorial was received from the Portuguese Government of the Territory of Jefferson relative to Constitutional Conventions, and the recognition of a Delegate from the Territory. The House proceeded to a vote for Printer. Mr. Defries was chosen on the 36th ballot—Messrs. Ford, 49, and Forney, 43. The next vote was taken with the same result. Among the bills introduced was one by Mr. Morrill (Vt.), donating lands for the promotion of the arts and sciences in the various States; and another for the prevention of polygamy in the Territories. Mr. Waldron (Mich.) offered a resolution for inquiry into the expediency of abolishing the imposition of sentinel and tax. Mr. Fenton (N. Y.) introduced a bill to establish three sections in the Revolutionary Claims. Mr. Latham (Cal.) introduced a bill for a Pacific Railroad bill. Mr. Davis (Miss.) offered a resolution, calling on the Secretary of War for the instructions issued by him to Postmasters relative to the introduction of mail matter. Mr. Grow (Pa.) introduced a bill for the sale of public lands to actual settlers. Mr. Florence (Pa.) introduced a Free-Soil Squatter bill, and one granting a pension to the widow of the war of 1812. A number of other bills were introduced, when the House adjourned.

On Thursday, February 16, in the Senate, Senator Doolittle (Wis.) called for his resolution for the admission of Kansas with the Wyandot Constitution, but the subject was postponed. Senator Grimes (Iowa) moved in favor of a direct mail steamship to the Pacific. The resolution relative to the inauguration of Abraham Lincoln was adopted. The Post-office Bill was then taken up for discussion. It was finally adopted, appropriating $6,000,000 for the service. The District of Columbia Militia bill was then taken up, and, after discussion, postponed. On Monday Senator Brown (Miss.) gave notice of a bill to prohibit offenses against slave property in Kansas. The Iowa Bill was read into Executive Session, and adjourned till Monday.——In the House, a message was received from the President announcing that he had signed the Post-office Appropriation bill. Mr. Jackson (Md.) moved an adjournment for two weeks, on the ground that the Clerk might rearrange members' seats. Rejected. Mr. Curry (Ala.) introduced a bill to repeal the Territory bounties. Mr. Taylor (La.) introduced a bill providing for the acquisition of Cuba by negotiation, and its admission to the Union. Referred. Mr. Sherman (Ohio) introduced a resolution declaring the Union willing wages to members of Congress, declaring that no person has a right to property in slavery, and, making provisions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, to establish the proper circulation of uniform currency throughout the United States, to amend the naturalization laws, to provide for the apportionment of Territories by act of law, etc., to provide for election by the people of Deputy Postmasters, to amend the Post-office laws, and to alter the Act of 1840 for several Public Railroad and Telegraph lines, to provide for Territorial Governments, to repeal the Act for the admission of Kansas into the Union, to provide for the admission of Kansas immediately to admission into the Union. Resolutions were introduced in relation to inquiries into the expediency of organizing the postal system and abolishing the franking privilege. The resolutions relative to the election of Secretary of the coal and iron-ask contracts by the Secretary of the Navy were adopted. The approval of the President to more effectual rendition of fugitives from justice; to facilitate intercourse between the United States and Canada for information relative to the removals, etc., of Postmasters, were referred to inquire into the expediency of acquiring the British North American possessions; for the better protection of naturalized citizens abroad, for the acquisition of Cuba, for the repeal of the navy-yard and shipbuilding district bounties. A memorial was received from Mr. S. G. Daly contesting the seat of Mr. Eastman. The Committee of Elections then went into Committee on the President's Message. Mr. Anderson (Mo.) made a strong Democratic speech. Mr. Fenton (N. Y.) replied in defense of the Republican position of the country.

On Friday, February 17, the Senate not being in session, the bill to admit Kansas into the Union, a bill to incorporate the United States Agricultural Society. Laid on the table and ordered to be printed. Resolutions and debate in the Senate on the Harper's Ferry affair. Mr. Wilson (Mass.) addressed the Senate in favor of the Republican platform. The election of Printer was postponed till Monday. Mr. Sherman (Ohio) moved to take up the resolution to abolish the franking privilege. The Senate refused to abolish the franking privilege was received, and after considerable discussion was referred to a select Committee. Adjourned till Monday.

SYMPATHY WITH ITALY.

A demonstration of sympathy with Italy, in favor of sympathy with the cause of Italian Freedom, was largely attended and of the most enthusiastic character. Resolutions were passed approving of the doctrine of non-intervention, and the pamphlet entitled Le Pape et le Congrès, and speeches were made by Mr. Cassidy, Mr. Wm. P. Prentice, the Hon. Charles King, the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, Dr. James Wynne, Mr. Mitchell, and the Hon. Joseph Hoxie.

THE NICARAGUA NEGOTIATION QUESTION.

"The following interesting correspondence will be read with pleasure by our citizens of foreign birth:

FROM SENATOR TOOMBS, OF GEO., TO HIS CONSTITUENT.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18, 1860.

"Hon. Lewis Cass, Secretary of State:

"SIR: Certain citizens of Danish, Aniline of Ottawa County, Ohio, wishes to obtain a passport, and, at the same time, to visit Europe, and return to the United States and reside in the Duchy of Holstein. He is a native of that country, but has resided in the United States long enough to extend the age of twenty years, and—as you will discover by his application—has taken the necessary steps to naturalize in the Court of Common Pleas for Ottawa County, Ohio, on the 15th day of May, 1858.

"Although not subject to military service at the date of his departure, he will be liable to the charge of desertion (or his absence) by the Danish authorities, and is apprehensive that he may be arrested, detained, or imprisoned, or compelled to serve as a soldier, in case he should return to Holstein. An answer at your earliest convenience will oblige. Yours respectfully,

G. E. PUGH."

THE PRESENT POSITION OF MR. CASS.

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, Jan. 7, 1860.

"Hon. Geo. E. Pugh:

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, and I inclose for your information an extract from a letter of Mr. Wright, the U. S. Minister at Berlin, dated July 16, 1859, which explains the views of the Government respecting the rights of naturalized citizens abroad, and from which it will not depart. It is the duty of Mr. Wright, as the diplomatic representative of our Minister, Mr. Wright, was discharged from the service by the Prussian Government. He will receive that, agreeably to the principles laid down in this dispatch. Mr. Wright has been dismissed from the service in Denmark, as he left there before he had been called into the army or Navy, and therefore could not be rightfully considered a deserter. We deny that conscription, or compulsory service in time of peace, constitutes for their fulfillment, create any liability on the part of an American naturalized citizen, to which he can be subjected when returning to the country of his birth. This principle has been recognized by treaty with Denmark. Mr. Smith, a native of that country, but an American citizen, was forced into the Danish army for military service in September last. Our Minister at Copenhagen, Mr. Bodisco, remonstrated in the strongest terms against the violation of the rights of our countrymen, and urged his prompt discharge by his Government for his consideration. His course was approved, and he was informed that 'the President has taken much interest in this case, involving, as it does, the claim of a foreign Government to interfere with the personal security and liberty of so many of our citizens whose interests may require them to return, for temporary purposes, to the respective countries of which they were once inhabitants.'

"The Minister of Foreign Affairs of Denmark informed Mr. Buchanan, in answer to his application, that the Government was unable upon the point of taking the necessary measures for the discharge of Mr. Smith 'on a special and exceptional measure,' when it was ascertained that be had already been released from the service in consequence of his place having been supplied by a substitute.

"As soon as a satisfactory description shall be received, a passport for Mr. Dutfield will be made out and forwarded to you.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"LEWIS CASS."

DEATH OF A MILLIONAIRE.

At noon, on Thursday, Mr. Stephen Whitney, one of the oldest and wealthiest of our citizens, died at his residence in Bowling Green. Some of his intimate friends state that he was in his 79 year of age, but others allege that he had completed his 80th year. He entered business, in the city, at an early period of his life, and has always been considered strictly upright in his dealings, but, at the same time, close and sharp in driving a bargain. These characteristics laid the foundation for a fortune which has accumulated at the rate of a million estimated at the enormous amount of $8,000,000. Much of this large property consists of real estate, a large proportion of which is situated in the First Ward. He also had large amounts of money invested in productive mortgages and stocks and bonds of various descriptions. Up to the time of his last illness Mr. Whitney retained his vigor to a great extent to collecting rents and to superintending the repairs which it was found necessary to make in the numerous buildings which he owned. Should it this summer be as seldom seen on Wall-street, he will be was not of a speculative character, and it is said that the misfortunes which, a few years since, overtook many of his relatives, who were engaged in the grain trade, involved him only to a limited extent. His will, which exhibits the conservative element of his character more forcibly than his speculative refusal to follow in the acquaintances and neighbors who, years ago, relinquished their down-town residences to look for more quiet and comfortable homes in the upper part of the city. For the last fifty years Mr. Whitney has resided on Bowling Green. In politics he was one of the oldest of the Old-Line Whigs, and a warm supporter of Henry Clay, for whom at one large ship said to have contributed liberally. Mr. Whitney leaves a large number of children and grandchildren. His eldest son-in-law, Hon. J. Phillips Phoenix, retired from business many years ago, after having acquired a large fortune, and died at his residence, which was in the immediate vicinity of the home of Mr. Whitney, twelve or fourteen months ago.

THE CUSTOM-HOUSE OFFICERS AT FAULT.

A late extensive seizure of jewelry on board the Asia has terminated in a verdict in favor of the claimant. The lynx-eyed custom-house inspectors, in the prosecution of their duties, thought that a wealthy Mexican banker travelling in that steamship must surely be the fortunate wearer of jewelry, but "more than the law allowed;" but it being subsequently proved that the jewelry was for personal use, and not for merchandise, the Government consented to surrender the goods to the claimant, which was done.

PERSONAL.

Washington papers style Secretary Toucey's reception on Wednesday night the most successful affair of the season. Miss Lane was present, and also, The States says, Mrs. Senator Clay. Madame Pico, the Mexican minister ladies of the diplomatic corps, with metropolitan belles, and numerous strangers. Among the latter were gentlemen of all positions in public life—secretaries and ex-secretaries, governors and ex-governors, senators and members, reporters and representatives—men of reputation, men of intellect, men of mind, and men possessing neither trait of character.

The Cincinnati Gazette has the following bit of gossip concerning Professor Huntington, late of Harvard College: "We have no authority for saying, though we have heard it mentioned by gentlemen who may be supposed to know, that it is the intention of Dr. Huntington to become a candidate for orders in the Church. The character of his late lectures certainly imparts probability to the supposition."

There is a middle-aged lady who takes her sewing-goes into the Maine House of Representatives, seats herself in the seat used by the Speaker, and listens to the successive responses to the speeches of the members, according to her taste.

Governor Cosas tells the story that when Lieutenant-Governor Stevenson of Tennessee was in Cincinnati on the Kentucky and Tennessee Legislature, he was accompanied by a "body servant," a negro, handsomely clothed—"boy" of about thirty, who was conscious of his dignity. An old darkey was on in the hotel and spoke with him familiarly, seemed him in the hall of the Neil House, and asked the departure of the Governor's party. "Why, Jack, haven't any of the Abolitionists carried you off yet?" "Yah! yah! Mas' Norman Jack, when I seed you go-ne down de street an turn an wid Gobner Donelson and Gobner Wickliffe, I knew you were sure—yah! yah!"

Mr. Speaker Colfax has a peculiar device having had any thing to do with the payment of Mr. Clay's debts, and pronounce its originality fatally by a correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial a fatalistic.

As Mr. Alcott is now in his wife and three children, were driving over the ice on Lake George, the horse and sleigh suddenly went through a crack in the ice. The price of the sufferers were not heard, although they were within a short distance of a house on the shore. The dog Board succeeded in saving his wife and one child. The other two were drowned.

Dr. Brola, of Natchitoches Parish, Louisiana, has devised much interest in the experiment with grapes. He says, says the Natchitoches Union, is the complete success of his plan in producing grapes of the most superior quality, and a demonstration of the fact that wine can be made profitably with comparatively little expense. By grafting the best varieties from France upon the wild grapes that grow so luxuriantly in this section, he has now bearing plants that can not be excelled in Europe. The Union predicts the raising of wine in North Louisiana, of no distant period, which will command one to any of standards.

Edmund About's duel at Meudon is the talk of literary circles. He was challenged by a small disbelief publication, editor of the Orpheon, a musical organ.

Here is a characteristic of the vicissitudes of fortune. A few years ago one of the most active and successful business men in the city of Hudson was Lansing Hall. Every thing he touched turned into money. He once made $150 in a single day on hour, by a purchase and sale piece of real estate. Fifteen years ago Mr. W. was worth $70,000. Since then the luck turned against him. He lost $34,000 by buying stock in the Hudson and Berkshire Railroad. He was followed by misfortune, caused by indorsements. In less than eighteen months Mr. W. passed from affluence to extreme poverty—from $70,000 worth $10,000 to being worth not one cent. Mr. W. is now a resident of Albany, and earns a living for himself and family by peddling candies, apples, and doughnuts.

The Philadelphia Bulletin says that the new pastor of Rev. Henry A. Wise, Jun., Rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Philadelphia, are advertised to preach in the church of Episcopalians. His style is different from that of his distinguished father, the Governor of Virginia, in that it is simple and direct. Mr. Wise is eloquent in delivery, although much embarrassed by a nervous affection which at times entirely prevents articulation, and interrupts him with a distressing cough. His person will be a youthful and delicate, and when animated his gesticulation is graceful and easy.

The New York correspondent of the Charleston Courier says that "a very pretty story is generally told about Gen. Daniel E. Sickles has experienced a change of heart, and now contemplates commencing the practice of a common church. His former friends say that they have noticed a wonderful change in his conduct recently. In Washington he leads a very different life from what he once did. Before he leaves the Capital, it is thought he will make a public profession of Christianity."

It is stated that Mrs. Blandina Dudley has commenced proceedings in the Supreme Court at Albany to have a deed set aside which was obtained from her by Judge B. Miller of Utica, and which conveyed to him a large portion of her estate. She says that her name was procured to the deed by his allegation that the paper was a mere piece of attorney to transact certain business.

Mrs. Mary Hewitt has addressed a note to the London Globe denying that she has joined the sect of Swedenborgians, however she may respect them as a body of Christians, and believing there are many deep truths in many of their religious doctrines.

FOREIGN NEWS

ENGLAND

THE PROPOSED ANNEXATION OF SAVOY.

Lord John Russell made an announcement in Parliament that the Government could not produce the correspondence relative to the proposed annexation of Savoy to France, but he said that Count Walewski had assured Lord Cowley that the Emperor had no intention of proposing the annexation. The British Government sent a dispatch expressing satisfaction at the assurance.

THE SAN JUAN DIFFICULTY.

The London Times, in an editorial, explains the present position of the San Juan difficulty. It says:

"We have reason to think that the proposals made to the American minister will be found to be fair and moderate. Instead of standing out for the Rosario Channel and the whole of the waters to the north of Vancouver's Island and none of them, a third channel is proposed for the boundary line, which will not only evade the two disputed routes, but will leave the Americans in possession of the largest share of the disputed islands. This channel, in its course, cuts off the Island of San Juan almost to the west, and necessarily leaves a large part of this island only, while the Americans will retain the remainder. It is considerable, in fact, in the concession that made, that it reasonably suggests a little compensation, and we believe the American Government will find the fairly set at rest the whole of a certain coast of headland which the fortunate possession of the Island of San Juan necessarily keeps this reasonable proposal will be accepted."

HER MAJESTY'S DRESS.

When Parliament opens the Queen Majesty wore a dress of pearl-colored satin with gold bars; over it a mantle of rich crimson velvet, with a deep and massive gold border. Her head-dress was a tiara of brilliants. The cloak of Princess Royal was of white velvet, that of white tulle over a pale blue under-dress; round her head was a wreath of white roses. The Princess Alice was dressed wholly in white, with a wreath of pink flowers as a head-dress.

BURNING OF THE SHIP "ENDYMION."

The ship Endymion, of the Dramatic line of New York packets, was burned on the night of the 15th on the Isle Sh. She was lying in the stream ready to sail, when a fire accidentally broke out in the unknown cause, about 9 o'clock in the morning. In addition to the crew, men, having 28 passengers on board, were also on board. All of them were saved, together with their luggage. The vessel was scuttled, but the water did not left her out of water, and in spite of every exertion the flames raged for about three hours, when the vessel was totally destroyed. She had a large and valuable cargo, consisting of woollens, cotton goods, hardware, and general merchandise, some portions of which it was supposed would be saved in a damaged state. The ship was insured, but it is not known whether the cargo was insured.

FRANCE.

THE SUPPRESSION OF THE "UNIVERS."

The Moniteur of Sunday, January 29, publishes the following decree, signed by Napoleon III., for the suppression of Univers, signed by the Minister of the Interior:

"SIRE,—The Univers has for a long time dwelt in the persistent press the organ of a religious party the predominant of which are daily more and more hostile to the rights of the State; its incessant efforts tend to dominate over the lay clergy. It not only misrepresents, but outrages the country, to undermine the fundamental bases upon which the ability of the Government and the society are established.

"This open war waged against our most ancient national traditions is dangerous for religion itself, which it compromises in the eyes of the populations; and more of it, by associating it with doctrines irreconcilable with the nature of governments, it tends to separate it from her sacred principles from its respectful submission to the Holy See in the spiritual order.

"The religious press has misunderstood the mission of moderation, which, in virtue of the law of 1852, the Journal d'Univers, especially, heedless of the warnings given to it, daily abused the indulgence with which it is the duty of the Government to treat the press.

"It is with this object in view that I propose to your Majesty to submit to the journal L'Univers the execution of the decree of the 17th of February, 1852, and to pronounce the suppression of the journal L'Univers.

The doctrines and pretensions which that journal would take to revindicate, and which are in open war with modern monarchy always energetically opposed them; great dialogue almost generally condemned by it that opened. Your Majesty will not show yourself less anxious than your predecessors to maintain the principles of the legislation essential for our national traditions.

"I am, with profound respect, Sire, of your Majesty the very faithful and very obedient servant and subject,

"The Minister Secretary of State in the Department of the Interior,

"BILLAULT."

The above report is followed by the subjoined Imperial decree:

"Napoleon, by the Grace of God and the national will Emperor of the French,

"To all present and future greeting:—

"On the proposal of our Minister of the Interior, Considering Art. 17 of the decree of the 17th of February, 1852,

"We have decreed and decree as follows:

"Art. 1. The journal L'Univers is suppressed.

"Art. 2. Our Minister of the Interior is charged with the execution of the present decree, which will be inserted in the Bulletin des Lois.

"Done at the Palace of the Tuileries, the 29th of January, 1860.

(Countersigned) "BILLAULT,
"Minister of the Interior."

MR. CORDEN'S BAGGAGE.

The Paris correspondent of the Augsburg Gazette writes: "I gather from one of the managers of the Opéra de Quai Mr. Corden, whose benefit takes place to-morrow, from England, his luggage weighed about 10,000 kilogrammes (about 10 tons). The luggage of a top immediately forwarded to St. Cloud. This paved considerable patience of every kind of English requisite. An Emperor went with Mr. Corden over the whole of these things, and expressed himself highly pleased. I will write with that of the corresponding articles of French manufacture. As soon as the luggage of Mr. Corden arrived Mr. Corden had established a depôt of English goods in the palace of St. Cloud, and Napoleon was obliged to confer with the Emperor, as he once before had done with Sir Robert Peel. The Emperor made a good use of this opportunity to acquire commercial knowledge, and he then became enabled to meet and conquer the deputations of the protectionists on their own ground."

A LUCKY DENTIST.

An American dentist in France is thus mentioned by the Paris correspondent of the Evening Post:

"There are few persons in Paris who have not heard of Dr. Evans, the American dentist, as he is called, par excellence, and who has charge of the teeth of pretty much all the sovereigns of Europe, and of America too, I suppose, when the latter comes to Paris. He made a fortune during the Crimean war, and also by the instance of the former Empress of Russia. On parting, she presented him with a diamond ring valued at 60,000 francs—about $12,000. The Doctor and Mrs. Evans have recently been enough from crowned heads, in the shape of bracelets, watches, snuff-boxes, rings, and the like articles in gold and precious stones, to make him a millionaire, if he had their cost in money. There is, by the way, a report that he is about to sell the establishment of Europe from whom he has not some costly testimonial.

"The sovereigns of France are warm friends of his; he is a favorite with the Emperor, and has free access to the Imperial family at its town, and he visits them frequently when they are in the country. His intimacy at the court has no doubt contributed somewhat to the demand for his services elsewhere, for it is well known that he has frequently been the bearer of messages between the Tuileries and Windsor, thereby gaining much important consequence, it was desirable not to invest with an official character. He has also been employed, as the simplicity of their domestic life, and the purity of their domestic relations, that his family act as models which it would be well if our country people, when they cross to the continent, would more generally imitate."

THE STRUGGLE OF THE PROTECTIONISTS.

The French Protectionists are making desperate efforts against the Emperor's proposed commercial reform. Petitions are showered upon the Senate, all the manufacturing towns against the measure. On the other hand, the Free Trade party are also active, and petitions are addressed from important commercial bodies.

HOW TO MAKE A NEWSPAPER TO GO.

The Herald correspondent writes: "The process of obtaining an invitation is very simple. You know this: with the people of consequence in Paris, and those living on the de monarchical governments, there is much more difficulty in obtaining invitations to dinner than in any republic than there is for Americans, the rule with the Ministers of the Imperial Government is never to invite a foreigner unless he has not been presented to his own. Any respectable person can obtain an audience of the Queen by leaving his name at the American Legation, will be presented at the Tuileries, and in the name of the Empress at the Tuileries, issued in the name of the Empress, by assent of preparation is required. The recipient must, in the hour appointed, present himself in a court dress, therefore them, as he will not be permitted to enter the Palace without it. Gentlemen wear the full dress of the dress description. The dress worn by Americans is very simple, consisting of a black dress coat, with a single or double row of buttons, straight embroidered collar, with embroidered cuffs, white vest, black pants, with a double pantaloons, with a gold band at its side, a white cravat, and white kid gloves, sword, and a cocked hat; or, if one happens to have a good coat, and is desirous of appearing in it, he may wear it with the steel-grips and pumps, which is the strict court dress."

ITALY.

Writing of one of Mr. Buchanan's Consuls, the Paris correspondent of the Times says:

"Mr. Smith—Marshall Smith, I believe, is his name—has been appointed Consul-General at Constantinople, left home with his first quarter's salary in his pocket, seven $250, or $1,750 altogether. Even told, but his commission, and came to Paris, where he appears to have spent the greater part of it. Consul's commission, and even at Constantinople, was but a step in the career which Mr. Smith has chosen for himself. The American Government needed an interpreter here, just as much as it needed a Consul there, and the consequence is that he is "blocked up at Meurice's. Mr. Smith has already made his appearance at the Tuileries, one an acquaintance which he made on board the ship, and the other since he arrived."

THE EMPEROR AND EMPRESS IN THE STREET.

The same writer says: "Driving a pair of splendid bays attended by outriders, with the white lion in their headdress, and handling them as though he were accustomed to it, the Emperor passed me yesterday on the Champs Elysées Napoleon came along the avenue. He was dressed in a blue frock-coat buttoned up to the throat and wore a cloak of its own. The points of his mustache looked particularly stiff, and his hat was drawn down over his eyes to shield from the latter's. I required a steady hand and a quick eye to guide the horses through the crowds the immense throng of vehicles of every description which filled the avenue, and which, in addition to the usual Sunday crowd upon the streets, was obliged with the other to acknowledge the salutations which greeted on every side, and to be kept up a continual bowing. I consider myself a tolerably good driver myself, but I felt that I was not quite my head as he passed. A great man is he—he has been accustomed to the habit of driving—perhaps more than he supposes is the true measure of great men, after all. The Emperor grew more and more into my good graces. Up on the 20th of April next, but looks as fresh and young, I think, as when he was five years ago, before he began the whole weight of Europe on his shoulders, and the Papal Question to boot.

"A short distance behind him came the Empress in an open carriage with four. She was dressed very simply, but with scrupulous neatness, bowing to every body, and seeming to be the object of what seemed to me l'bon jour." She has faded very much within even the last year, and I should think that the delicate constitution of European affairs has affected her perpetually more than the Emperor. She appears to be about four on the fifth of May next, and it is one of the sad ills that she is a Roman Catholic. Considering the last few years ago, led her to like her increasing figure beneath a mass of crinoline. She was dressed in black, and a few days since she sent a nice, newly-invented bed and mattress, intended, I believe, to be offered when she wounded at Solferino, with her personal hopes and wishes for his speedy recovery."

A ROYAL SCANDAL.

The Times correspondent writes:

"England and Prussia have now finds a nice bit of gossip in the movements of the young Prince of Orange, who is now paying a visit to Berlin. This young Prince, about to enter upon the scene, and heir to the throne of Holland, is, it appears, desirous of marrying one of the Princess Alice, second daughter of Queen Victoria by Prince Albert. Should the needful marriage of inclination, holds essentially to the doctrine that her children must marry for love, and time it has been arranged that, after a short stay at Paris, the young Prince was to go to Berlin, and there meet the second daughter of Prince Alice, or, in other words, that there should be a little courtship between the young people before the ceremony took place. Just before the time fixed for the visit to London, the Prince arrived in Paris, he received a message either, that the young Prince had found some agreeable ladies in the neighborhood of Berlin, and had stayed behind, and that, to sum up the Prince's French visit in one word, he had been 'going it.' Now the Queen is a good mother and a good woman, exactly one heaven, and does not approve of such peccadilloes even in a Prince's visit just as his juvenile Highness was on the point of leaving Paris for London he received a telegraphic dispatch from the Hague peremptorily ordering him to forego his visit to London, and to start instantly for Berlin! The Prince's astonishment knew no bounds. Was ever mother so cruel as to cut off the head of her wild young rover, heartbreaking town of Bordeaux? What did it all mean? But the order came from the King, his father, and must be obeyed. The Queen was not willing to receive the young gentlemen into her family with the Prince's intimate connection, and such a visitation was the wind and her Majesty.' She so intimated to King William of Holland, who seems to have held the same opinion.

"But how comes the most amusing part of the history, and a part which perhaps has not yet crossed the channel. The party had not gone far on the road to Bordeaux when the officers who form the suite of the young Prince of Orange were surprised with the intelligence that the Prince as well as his wounds, found to their consternation that the Prince had left the ladies of the chamber, the Grand Opera, and the particular admiration of the Bordeaux world, and that there was a situation for men charged with so enormous a burden.

"The party turned their faces about, and journey to Bordeaux, and return with the Prince to Paris."

A TALE OF SORROW.

He adds: "A touching tale of sorrow has just been brought to my knowledge through an application for assistance. The husband of the lady who has applied to me, but an orphan, and living in her uncle and aunt, who have brought her home almost from the time of her birth; and after dwelling with him to Canada, then to Rome, and to the principal cities of Italy, and to Paris, where she got, at last arrived in Paris, where they now are. The lady and her husband parties have lived very happy, and the Spaniard was not nasty her for the obvious reason that he was a Catholic and she a Protestant. They have had a complete state of destitution, and with the pangs of hunger, and forced to separate and disunite. The husband, a doctor of my acquaintance was sent for, and he found the lady in a state of the most pitiful food, and almost in a state of insanition. She begged to be sent home to her friends in the north of Italy, and promised to go to her man again as long as she lived. On his part he asked no more than to be allowed to go to Paris, where he had a relative of his Spanish friends in Paris would manage to get him a place. The parties have lived very happily together on the charity of Spaniards and on pauns made to the Jews, and the husband, having never been accustomed to found by the doctor, who has since not only supplied all his wants but has also given him money to pay his debts. He trained for her a lodging-place with an American family in the Rue Richelieu, and has left for Paris, passage to New York."

AN UNHAPPY AMERICAN GIRL.

We read from Galignani's Messenger: "A young woman, twenty-three years of age, was yesterday morning found lying senseless in the Champs Elysées. Upon being conveyed to the Chamber of Deputies, she was conveyed at once to the Hôtel Dieu. Upon the examination it was that an attempt had been made to poison herself. The poison had not taken effect, as it was in her left arm had been opened. He bound up the wound, and administered the usual remedies, and she soon recovered her senses. She then stated that she had attempted to commit suicide in consequence of her father, a working man, having abandoned her. She said that she was a native of the United States, and had left America for Africa. Having remained not to reside there for some months, she was taken home.

ITALY.

THE POLICY OF SARDINIA IN CENTRAL ITALY.

On the 25th January the Sardinian Minister for Foreign Affairs addressed a circular to the Sardinian Ambassadors abroad on the question of Central Italy. Cavour observes that the inhabitants of Tuscany have accepted the Congress with confidence, but important difficulties have arisen in the negotiations.

The pamphlet Le Pape et le Congrès, of which, without seeking to discuss the principles, we have given the substance; the letter of Napoleon to the Pope; the speech of the Emperor at the opening of the session of the Chambers, are the causes of facts which show the impossibility of the Congress being the best means for Central Italy. It is certain that the Congress will not be assembled, and that the Powers, consequently, will not be being satisfied on their part, wished also to satisfy their consciences by proposing the best means for the pacification of the present. Only announcing these facts, Cavour declares that Sardinia will not shrink from the responsibility for the tranquility of Europe, and the pacification of Italy.

THE ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times writes which states that, on the 25th, the Emperor received the Senate, and read to them a speech of which a few words. Nearly two hundred and fifty persons were present, and the Emperor was received by the residents of Chambery, and asked information from the Sardinian Minister for Foreign Affairs, and from the King of Sardinia to cede the Province to France. The Emperor replied that he had not yet received any cede that the statement was received with some cries of "Vive la France!" The Senators of Chambery were completely strangers to the demonstration, which took place in the street, and it was inferred that their feelings were consequently sympathetic with France.

GARIBALDI'S MARRIAGE.

As some doubt has been thrown upon the intelligence of General Garibaldi's marriage with Signorella Raimondi, the daughter of a Florentine Professor, the Mercantile, of Genoa, of the 7th instant, says: "Garibaldi has married the young and beautiful Signorella Raimondi, daughter of a Florentine Professor, was the General's witness."

AUSTRIA.

TROUBLES IN THE AUSTRIAN ARMY.

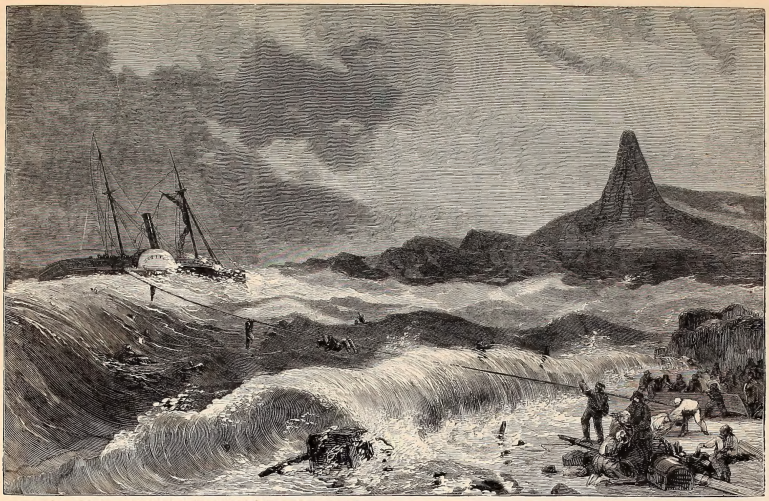
At latest dates it was considered more than ever likely that the Austrian troops would be withdrawn from the Papal States. Agitation continued to prevail in Venetia before long. Arrests were also still attacked and wounded in Verona, and the cavalry were ordered to be in readiness to march against the rebels. At least the Cividale Reg at Chiegnia, Pordenone, and Portogruaro, and the Hungarian Regiment Archduke Albert Venice for insulting persons pronouncing words favorable to the Italian cause. Numerous authorities of Venice had been acquainted with the determination of Austria to retain that province, and defend it to the utmost.

MEXICO

ADVANCE OF MIRAMON ON VERA CRUZ.

The Vera Cruz correspondent of the Picayune writes: Vera Cruz dated to the 19th inst.

The Mexican army, City of Mexico on the 8th for Vera Cruz, with 5000 men, and his advance-guard was reported to be within 30 miles of Vera Cruz.



Vera Cruz had been declared in a state of siege.

The Saratoga was at Vera Cruz.

AUSTRALIA.

TWO EUROPEAN GIRLS RESCUED FROM SAVAGES.

The Sydney Herald gives an account of the rescue of two European girls from the savages. It appears to be the only survivors out of all the passengers wrecked in the Maria in 1834. They were taken from the wreck of the island on the 23d of October, were found sixty miles inland by Mr. Frazer, who, with a party, proceeded to the respective ages of fifteen and sixteen years. Their appearance was exceedingly revolting, their persons from long suffering and exposure to the weather, are covered with a coating of hair; the skin, stained by their tormentors to assimilate with their own, had become spotted and wrinkled, as if from old age; the nose had seeing loosely before they fell into the hands of the natives, and their countenances bore the appearance of despair, apparently quite gone." Other European are believed to be prisoners of the blacks on Fraser Island.

BRIDGE OVER GREEN RIVER—LOUISVILLE AND NASHVILLE RAILROAD.

THIS structure, of which we present an engraving herewith, is one of those great works which, as triumphs of man's intelligence and energy over the obstacles interposed by nature to his free communication and commerce with his fellows, are looked upon in every country as fit subjects of national pride and eulogy. It is—with the single exception of the Victoria Bridge at Montreal—the largest iron bridge on this continent. It crosses the valley of Green River near the town of Munfordsville, Kentucky, and twenty miles above the celebrated Mammoth Cave, which is located on the same stream. Its total length is 1000 feet, consisting of three spans of 208 feet and two of 288 feet each; is 118 feet above low-water; contains 638,000 pounds of cast and 381,000 pounds of wrought iron, and 2500 cubic feet of timber in the form of rail-joists. There are 10,220 cubic yards of masonry in the piers and abutments. The cost of the superstructure, including that of erection, was sixty-eight dollars per foot lineal—that of the entire work, $165,000. The plan of truss is that invented by Albert Fink, the designer and constructor of the bridges and viaducts on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad; and is peculiar in this, that it is self-compensating and self-adjusting, and no extremes of temperature can put it in such a condition that all the parts can not act in their accustomed manner and up to their full capacity.

The construction of the masonry of this bridge was commenced in the month of April, 1857, and completed in March, 1859. The iron work of the superstructure, which was built by Inman & Gault, of Louisville, was begun in July, '58, and the entire bridge was in its place, and ready for the regular passage of trains, by the 1st of July, 1859. The first span was erected in February, '59. The work of raising the false works for the reception of the superstructure was one of no inconsiderable difficulty. Before the regular use of the bridge it was thoroughly and severely tested with the heaviest loads that could possibly be placed upon it, as also with loads moving with the greatest attainable velocity. The deflections caused by the different loads agreed in all cases with those previously calculated from the known extension and contraction of the materials, thus affording mathematical proof of the excellence of the design, the faithfulness of its execution, and the correctness of the builders' estimates of its proportions and consequent strength.

"I DRANK MILK FROM THE CUP SHE HANDED ME."

"I FILLED MY JOINED HANDS WITH THE WATER, AND SHE DRANK EAGERLY."

THE PYTHAGOREAN:

A TALE OF THE FIRST CENTURY.

"Who shall deliver me from this body of death?"
ST. PAUL.

"I REMEMBER," said Claudius—an old, gray-headed man, a minister of one of the early Christian churches in the first century—"I remember my youth. I was the son of an Athenian. Both my parents died before I knew them, and left me to the care of an old man, my father's eldest brother. He was a disciple of the doctrines of the Pythagoreans. He taught me well. From him I learned how to live; the luscious fruit, the sweet honey, the wholesome grain—these were our food. Exercises of all kinds, and study in its season, helped the flight of time till I became a man, then he died and left me his small property. I knew a trade—that of a carpenter—and with the money he left me and my trade I traveled much—in Greece, Egypt, and Italy. Still I felt unsatisfied with my lot. There was a void here," and the old man placed his shriveled hand upon his heart, "that would not fill.

"One day—that day is as yesterday—I felt the void was gone; the place was filled! I was walking in one of the woods, near to a city in the north of Italy, when I heard a footstep behind me. The leaves rustled as though dancing to the music of the faint breeze that sighed among the tops of the young trees. I turned, and beheld—Virginia! just such a sun shone on her."

The old man paused in his walk, full in front of the window. The reddish light cast a glow upon his features, and he seemed to blush as did the youth when first he saw his idol.

"Virginia! Shall I ever forget thee!"

He had quite lost his hearers now, while they eagerly drank in his words.

"Her step, her mien, her face! The void was gone. She bore upon her head a vessel of milk, which she poised gracefully with one arm uplifted, and with the other held her tunic from contact with the damp grass, for the dew was falling. I followed her—saw her deliver the vessel which was emptied—and returned to her. She came back by the same path, carelessly swinging the vessel by one of its handles and singing some childish lay. I had heard in my own city the voices of the hired singers of the great, but never did my ears drink in such melody as flowed from that swelling throat. She thought she was alone, and warbled like a bird. I followed her still, and saw her enter a poor, mean cottage near the borders of the wood. It was not long before I found an excuse in my thirst to call there. I drank milk from the cup she handed me. It was the nectar of the gods."

His hearers started. Where was the Nazarene now? He was gone. It was a young man with the full tide of passion flowing in his veins to whom they listened.

"The father was a slave of Sporus the magistrate of the district, but was allowed by his owner to have all the privileges of freedom on payment of a certain sum at every month. He was a carpenter, his wife kept a few cows from which the household of Sporus was supplied. I soon hired myself to the father, and being a good workman raised myself in his esteem; why need I delay, I wooed Virginia—I won her. All the freshness of her girlhood's love was mine. At evenings she would listen to me as I detailed for her my travels by sea and land. She, too, could teach me something, for she had with her mother joined the Nazarenes, the Christians.

"SPORUS WAS AVENGED!"

"We were to have been united—all was ready, two moons only had to run their course and she was mine. Alas! how we build on sand.

"Sporus had often seen Virginia. He knew she was his slave. I knew it too. I must buy her freedom. I went to his house, saw him; he asked to see her again. I urged that it could not affect the price—he would see her. He saw her—he refused—I could not marry a slave. What could we do? I offered him thrice her value as a slave—he still refused; and, why? He wanted her for himself!

"Virginia not my wife, but the slave and mistress of Sporus! The thought was horrible. Wealth can do much. I persuaded her to flee.

"It wanted but a week of the day fixed, when she, as her custom was, went to the house of Sporus with her milk. I was at work, and saw her go. She was longer than usual returning. I watched the openings in the trees through which she was to come. She came not. I could not endure the suspense—I went to meet her. I reached the wood, I heard her scream. I should have known that voice any where. I ran—I found her with disordered dress and disheveled hair struggling in the arms of her master, Sporus.

"I struck him to the earth, and she twined her arms round me and clung to me, as though dreading to lose me.

"'Loose me, dearest, I am powerless. See he rises.'

"She left me free, but took fast hold of my girdle, as though there was safety in the very act of touching me.

"He rose. 'Glaucus, she is my slave, her father is my slave, leave her to me.'

"Sporus, thou wretch accursed, I will not leave thee. I will with these fingers tear thy vile heart from its place to feed the dogs if thou darest but to touch the hem of her robe.'

"Glaucus, I warn thee. Thou hast struck me. I am a Roman. I never forget an insult. Yet if thou will leave her to me, and leave this place thyself, thou shalt cheat my revenge.'

"Domon that thou art, I will not leave thee with her. Thou art more vile than the very beasts whose cries do nightly echo through this wood. They wed with no unwilling mates, while thou—waif that thou art—wouldst have despoiled this poor lamb but for me. I will not leave thee with her.'

"Once more I warn thee, Glaucus, tempt not the vengeance of Sporus. Virginia, if thou dost love him, bid him go. I will make thee my queen; thou shalt have slaves at thy command. Thou, who art thyself a slave, shalt have thy freedom; thou shalt wed Sporus the magistrate. Bid him go.'

"Sporus, I would not be thy bride for all the riches of earth. Glaucus, leave me not with this wretch; I will live with thee or die with thee, but leave me not.'

"Once more, Glaucus, I warn thee, go!'

"I will not, thou doubly condemned wretch. I defy thee—thy country's laws thou darest not ask to help thee now.'

"Glaucus—Virginia—I have warned ye thrice. Beware the vengeance of Sporus!'

"He left us—she fell into my arms—I carried her home. The seven days had passed—the night of flight had come. We stole out together, reached the wood in safety; not a sound but from the leaves—the waving of the living, the crushing of the dead under our feet. Hope lit our hearts. A few hours more and we should be safe. I heard a sound—other feet. O God! They had us bound, blindfolded, gagged, in a moment. Hope's lamp went out never to be rekindled.

"They hurried us through the wood, and then I know not where, till we came to a building. I heard the gates shut. They fastened my wrists with fetters softly lined with leather, and light. I was chained. They led me farther into a room of stone vaulted corridor. I heard the echoes, and I heard her footsteps. A door opened; my feet rustled on straw. The gag was taken from my mouth; the bandage from my eyes. Oh, Christus! what a pitiable sight met my gaze. Virginia was kneeling on the ground, her face upraised to mine. I could see by the dim light that came from a large opening above that she was bound as I was, but—oh, Sporus! thou child of Tartarus—her fetters were so heavy she could scarcely lift them unaided.

"There was a window in the place. I rushed toward it. She screamed, and was dragged with me. We were licked together—most cruel mockery!

"I sat down on the stone bench against the wall. She knelt on me. We spoke not. Our hearts were too full. I noticed that my slightest movement caused her pain. I could see the eyes close and the lips compressed even in the midst of sleep.

"Morning broke at last; then I found why the lips compressed in pain. Her fetters, four fingers broad, had the edges turned in to the wrists and filed to points like a fine saw. They had cut through the skin, and the blood flowed on the hands and arms. No wonder, now, the poor child screamed so piteously at my movement.

"The window were in was a small square room with a partial roof, the middle open to the air. Through the centre, in a channel cut in the stone floor, ran a stream of water. I dipped my fingers and tasted it. It was salt to bitterness. On one side of the room was the stone bench on which we had sat the long night through. On the opposite side ran two small fountains—the one water, the other wine. The wine flowed into a basin till it was full, then ran over and was lost—it was the wine; the other ran away at once—there was no basin to collect that. Between the fountains, at a man's height from the ground, was a circular metal mirror. Other objects the room had none, except a trough or shelf under the mirror. The windows were high—higher than my head—I could just catch sight of the distant hill-tops through them. Such was our prison.

"I looked from the windows to her face. It was the old look, grief of love and confidence, which it spoke better than words:

"'Glaucus, thou hast not kissed me since we came here!'

"'My poor child' (she was small and delicate; I called her child sometimes), 'I have had sad thoughts; to think that I have brought her to this suffering, those fetters, galls me to madness.'

"'They do not hurt me much when you are quite still; it's when you move they hurt me. But oh, my Glaucus! is it that brought them here, not thou me. Thou mightest have been happy but for me. Ah! woe is me that I should that have harmed thee!'

"Yet, Virginia, I would rather be here with thee than free with any other. Thou art mine in life or death.'

"'Must we to starve us here?'

"'Alas! I know not what he means. See, there is water—drink!'

"I lifted her fetters, and she came to the fountain and knelt. I filled my joined hands with the water, and she drank eagerly.

"'Will not thou drink, Glaucus?'

"And she tried to fill her hands as I had done, but now the lips firmly set and the tears start to her eyes with the pain of those horrible fetters' teeth.

"'Nay, love, I will thus,' and I let the full stream fall into my parched mouth.

"We went back to the bench. I threw her fetters on my knee, to take their weight; and so the day toiled slowly away. The blood coagulated round the wrists, and the least movement tore open the wounds afresh. She slumbered at last with fatigue and pain. How fair she looked as, lying on my breast, she slept! Her breath was shorter and faster than I had ever known it. Evening came, and the sun was just sinking, when I saw the mirror move and close again; and at the shelf there stood bread and flesh—the flesh was scarcely dressed.

"I dared not move, though hunger was rampant within me. At last she woke, and started with surprise, then shrieked with pain. Those accursed fetters! she had forgotten them.

"'I am hungry—is there no food?'

"I pointed it out to her, and she eagerly seized the bread and began to eat ravenously. Then stopped—put down the bread.

"'Forgive me! I did forget thee, but hunger made me. See! there is flesh—it is of swine—I can not eat it. I am a Nazarene. Thou shalt have the flesh, and I the bread, Glaucus.'

"She had forgotten I was a disciple of Pythagoras. She ate—I gave her drink—and still I was famished.

"Thou dost not eat thy flesh,' she said, with an effort to smile. 'Ah! I had forgotten, thou didst tell me that thou hadst never tasted flesh and all the bread—all is gone. Oh, wretch that I am! I have killed thee. Thou wilt perish of hunger while I am still. Oh, woe is me!'

"'Dearest, fear not! I hunger not. Sorrow hath taken away desire for food.'

"I felt the mad wolves gnawing in my vitals then.

"And then came another night. I had placed her on my own knee as before, with her hands resting on the other, on which lay our chains. One arm was round her form, and I thought the weight the chains lent they should slip. She slumbered. The stars grew dim; I was awakened by a wild shriek and a jerk at my chains. She still fallen asleep, the hand relaxed its hold, a movement of hers had thrown the chains from my knee toward the ground. The jerk of the chains united mass was jerked on her slender wrists. What wonder that wild scream of anguish! She had fainted. I carried her to the bench, and laid her bleeding arms. The stream was less! She recovered, and expressed such sorrow for having awoke me that my eyes filled with tears. She slept again—day, and again we sat as before, till morning once more broke.

"I had noticed the previous day that all round the room there were openings near the bottom of the wall reaching to the floor about a span high. There came to each opening a large rake, which pulled the straw from under our feet, then a large piece of wood on the end of a pole with which the floor was washed; and soon after a large bundle of straw was flung down from the opening in the roof. Then we understood why it had touched in some time: God only knew how long.

"How I longed for evening—for food. She talked to me of her youth, and how her change of faith; never had she been so dear to me as at that moment. All the longings of my nature after purity and truth which I had felt when I sat with the professors of the various religions. I was half inclined to think there was no truth or purity in any worship, in any faith, save that she taught me of the God of the Nazarenes—of the Man-God Christus; told me of his deeds, his life of love—pure, his cruel death. I could say only that truth was here, here. was purity; and as she talked to me I felt I could believe. I was a believer in the Prophet of Nazareth from that time.

"At last evening came. We both watched intently the mirror. The hour drew—the moment on its surface; it turned, the bread and flesh were there, the mirror closed again.

"Glaucus, thou shalt have the share of bread to-night.' She broke it in halves: there was less bread than the day before. She saw it, too.

"We ate and drank, and thought that was her the last portion of mine. She kissed me, and devoured it most eagerly, and looked at the shelf in her turn.

"'Not yet, dearest!' I said, 'not yet.'

"She understood me, and we lay down again for the night.

"Days and nights passed. Each day saw the fresh straw, each night there was less bread. One night there was none at all, and but little flesh. That night I saw it first!

"She lay asleep, breathing quickly, with the fever-flush on her cheek; not a sound save her breathing, the murmuring of the salt stream at our feet, and the trickling of the two fountains. I saw it then—I could not look at her. I could not endure that she should be there so still. I woke her with kisses.

"'What dost thou want, Glaucus?' she said, peevishly, 'thou hast awakened me to pain. I was dreaming of home, and Christus, Christus there, and thou hast put them on again. Thine are soft, thou dost not feel them; let me sleep.'

"I murmured some low reproach, and again she slept, and again IT came. I shut my eyes, it was still before them; I looked up at the stars, it hid them; I could not see for it.

"Morning came—she awoke fevered and dry. 'Water, Glaucus, or I perish!' I led her to the fountain. The stream had become drops!

"I held my hand, as drop by drop it fell into the pain, and then put it to her lips.

"'More, Glaucus, more! Stay, let me come.' She put her lips to the aperture, while I held her fetters, and drank—drank as one whose arms exhausted with the effort. The day passed in a sort of torpor.

"Evening came—no bread, and less flesh. It was nearer.

"'Glaucus, I must eat! Christus, forgive me! but I must eat. Give me the flesh.'

"I gave it her. She tore it from my reluctant hand like a wild animal, and with her teeth and nails rent it into shreds, which she boiled whole. Ye gods! what a sight for these poor eyes it was!

"'Eat, my Glaucus,' she said, fiercely, 'eat, I say.'

"But 'thou'lt not have enough, Virginia.'

"True! Thou, Glaucus, shalt eat to-morrow.'

"Eat to-morrow! I kissed her lips, still wet with the juicy flesh, and tasted—oh, it was life! To-morrow! to-morrow! would it never come?

"That night I saw IT more clearly than ever. I could not look at her as she slept, IT was so clearly there.

"Morning again—again the fountain—the water drop, drop, drop! The wine gurgled in its basin—we both heard it, had heard it, it always was so.

"No love; not yet, not yet.'

"Evening came. I had horrible intensity we watched the mirror. It moved—it turned, there was flesh—less than before.

"She ate—I held her head to her mouth in a moment, and threw herself on the floor to take the weight of her chains off her hands.

"'Virginia, I prithee, give me to eat!'

"She tore off a morsel, and dropped it in the straw. I seized it and ate it. It was fullness of life—more than life!

"'Virginia, more!—more, for pity's sake! Thine own Glaucus asks it of thee.'

"She tore off a smaller morsel than before. It was maddening. More I must have. I held her hands, and tore the remainder in halves.

"The poor wrists bled afresh with her resistance. She swallowed her portion, and then with eager tongue licked mine.

"I was a man again. The food was like new life: but still I saw IT.

"'Glaucus, I faint. Let me drink.'

"Once more I led her to the fountain: there was no water! The wine ran gurgling into its full basin, and I drank.

"Glaucus, I must drink, my throat is on fire!'

"I saw frenzy in her eyes. I could not deny her longer. 'Drink, dearest Virginia! but a little.' She put aside my hands with the wine in them, impatiently, and stooped down to the basin and drank.

"I thought she would never cease; at last she did—raised her flushed face to mine.

"'Drink, Glaucus, drink! My fetters pain me not: I am cool now.'

"The fever-flush she looked at me again, and put her arms about me: her fetters were lighter now. I met her look.

"I was wounded at nightfall through the streets, and soon eyes that as a boy I wondered at, as a youth admired, as a man pitied. 'My God! my God! Virginia, I love you now!' My own Virginia, pure as an angel, was looking at me as those eyes only can look.

"'Glaucus, Glaucus!' and her arms tightened round me, and her lips were pressed to mine. Her breath, odorous of wine, half-suffocated me. Oh, Christus! I had died before I had been obliged to recognize in this fierce drunken girl my own Virginia!' Yet it was so. I could not return her kisses.

"'Dost thou not love me, dearest Glaucus?'

* * * * *

"The old man paused, choked with his emotions.

"The horrors of that night I shall never forget. I struggled, and I conquered. She slept at last, the fever's grip had been given to mine.

"I wiped the dews from her brow again and again till morning came, the woke not; the night day came, and still she slept. I saw IT all the time—all through the lone night as she lay in my arms I saw IT there.

"As the sun was going down she woke and looked at me with a new light in her eyes; cried for water. I had my own. Then she sang again some hymn of childhood, then knelt in front of me.

"'Marcus' (she thought she was a child again and I her brother), 'I'll make thee a garland,' and she gathered the straw of the place, put the ears together, and made a crown; then put it on my head. I helped her by holding the fetters; she thought I held her.

"'Let me, Marcus—let me go.'

"'Nay, Virginia, thy Marcus loves thee too well.'

"She looked from my face to her hands. 'See, I've found some poppies among the corn and squeezed them; see, the juice is running down my fingers. I'll paint thee, Marcus, as we saw the man from Britain painted in the market-place; it's red, not black, that we want;' and she took a few pieces of the straw and put them to her poor arms, and with her own dear blood streaked my face.

"'Now I'll kiss thee, Marcus, and we'll go home. I must have milk.'

"I loosened her, we walked about the room. I gave her a few drops of wine, and she was contented and slept.

"Evening again. I watched the mirror alone. The flesh came—less than ever. I feared to wake her, yet I must eat. I took her softly in my arms, and moved her gently. She slept. I reached it. I must free one hand for a moment. I reached the flesh, but I felt her heavy chains slipping. They fell, pulled her down, and with a loud shriek the clang reached the floor. She woke, gave one look at my face, all blood-stained as it was, and shouted 'Glaucus, Glaucus! help! Sporus—then demon, let me go!' She tore my face with her nails and bit me, and then the wildest of all sounds, the heard the cry of the wild bird—I've heard the cry of the despairing seamen, as they struggled in the waves I've heard the wild wailings of wounds, the wail among the mountain pines, but I never heard such a sound as that before or since. I hear it now! and the old man put his hands to his ears, as if to keep out the sound.

"She thought it was Sporus; and struggled for life.

"'I am thine own—thy Glaucus.'

"'Liar that thou art,' and again the cries for Glaucus, and the same wild scream. She tore herself from my grasp and fled round and round the cell. I could have held her by the chains but for the poor wrists; at last I caught her robe and she fell, but it was on the sharp edge of the wine basin, and the blood flowed from a great gash in her fair forehead, and then she swooned, and in the odor of that blood as I stanched it I saw IT with terrible clearness. I dare not kiss her forehead while it flowed. I held her and lay by her side while I ate my feast. I felt strong again, and reproached myself for eating—I was but the longer to live, and why live? Yet I could not but eat.

"The moon was shining brightly on her face, and again I saw IT as she lay. What would I not have given to see it not? In vain I tried to sleep to sunrise; the stars were growing fainter in the grey morning light when she woke. Oh, what happiness! the old look—the look of love when she sat at my feet in the wild free woods.

"'How I have missed you, Glaucus? I have had such dreams; I have been a child, and then I dreamed of the woods and Sporus again, and I have dreamed that I was happy, but that you did not kiss me on our nuptial couch. In vain I called thee, kissed thee, pressed thee to me—thou wert dead; and I a widowed virgin.'

"Dearest, thou hast been sick nigh to death; it was not all a dream. Art thou in pain now?'

"'Yes, Glaucus, more! It was no dream. I knew when she said that.'

"Nay, love, I shall leave you soon. You will think of those things I said to thee of my god Christus? Will thou have any thing to live for, when I am gone?'

"I shall go soon too, I hope—I know not how to live without thee, my Virginia.'

"Let men die not when they will, save with guilt; thou yet mayest escape this when I am gone.'

"'True, dearest.' I should not have been there an hour but for her and her chains. Freedom or death was the work of a moment; the windows I could reach easily.'

"Glaucus; will thou grant me a last request?'

"Ay, my life; any thing that thou wilt ask.'

"She smiled on me. She knew her face to look had no strength. She fell back. I stooped and kissed her. We could have wept, but nature had no sense of sorrow left—the fountains were exhausted and dry.

"Promise me that thou will become a preacher of those truths I have taught thee so humbly, yet so willingly—then wilt, my Glaucus?'

"Thy God helping me, I will preach Christus among men till death summons me to thee, love. Soon, soon! O God, soon!'

"I am happy.' She looked so. I felt she was happy.

"Christus, bless with thy spirit this thy servant. Make his labors for thy cause be lovely, successful. Bless us both, O Christus!' She paused, put up her chained arms to my neck, drew me to her, and I kissed me tenderly. 'Glaucus, Glaucus, O Gracus Christus!' she murmured, and so died.

The old preacher sobbed not alone.

"I let her lips chill mine, still I moved them not. She was dead! Sporus was well avenged: his slave, my Virginia, was dead; I thought of the evening. It came—the mirror moved not—there was no flesh. The wine still gurgled and sparkled in its basin. I looked toward the windows, they were gone!—there was no escape. IT was there. IT was there with me all that night, all that long day.

"Evening came again—the mirror moved not—IT was there dreadfully near. I took my chains, twisted it into a rope, and put it round my throat —drew it tighter and tighter—I could not keep my consciousness—I could not—I could not take upon IT longer. Tighter and tighter—IT was going, thank God! All was growing dim and indistinct. Tighter and tighter—I was nearly gone, IT—the earth opened. I fell down a fathomless abyss, and all was darkness. I knew no more.

"I awoke in a cell. It was night. I felt weaker—I saw I was still there; the robe had broken and saved me. To what? There she lay as calm, as lovely, so holy, by the side of death. I could hardly think she was dead, yet she was, and I saw IT there.

"I must die! I crawled to the wine fountain —I drank—deeply—but hunger was now more furious than ever, and there was no food.

"I carried her carefully back to the bench. I saw IT coming now! A giddiness seized me—IT was always—I was weaker. I stooped to kiss her lips. IT was nearer still again. I stopped—and once again—and then—My God! IT had COME! I saw IT. IT was THERE! God forgive me! but I must die!

* * * * *

"I was a king! I feasted royally, plenty was mine. I slept on a bed of softest down. I ate when I pleased, I drank—how I drank!—'twas strange, my hands were bound still.

* * * * *

"I was a runner in the games. I saw the assembled thousands, heard their murmurs when they saw my form. I had fleetness—we started. The circus was small, very small. I could have effaced it with my hand. I knew no such game—it was new, but I would run. I ran faster and faster; the pace was killing me; my eye started from their sockets, the golden apple rolled before me—I stooped for it—I fell, and all was dark once more.

* * * * *

"I woke. I was a gladiator. Once more the arena, and still so small. I saw my foe. He was as large as myself. He must have fought just before, the fresh blood was on his face. I moved cautiously—he was gone—I watched—moved again—he came back. I lifted my hand to strike, I was not free—neither was he—it was a new game, but I would fight. He raised his foot, struck at his face with all my force—I hit him—but we both fell —he was under. He was bound to me! I struck again and again. I had killed him now. Again and again I struck—he moved. I seized him by the throat. We rolled over and over each other—I knew he was quite still. I watched and drank, and slept while I watched.

"I woke again: it was dark. I was a prisoner chained to—what?—a stone—a wet stone! Ha! ha! they had tied me with ropes, with knotted ropes! I felt for a knife—I had none—I could not see.

"They forgot the prisoner's teeth! I gnawed and twisted the ropes all the long night—they were old and rotten—they stank in my nostrils; but I gnawed on, and I was free once more.

"I was free! I ran, I jumped, I leaped. I danced to wild music that seemed close to me. I was free! I was in the wild woods once more—the trees waved, the wind kissed my cheek as of yore. I lay down beneath a tree and slept. I dreamed of Virginia—she came to me—sat beside me—she was soon to be my bride. My heart leaped at the thought. She was my bride now—I had her from the time—the day passed, the night came, I lay beside my bride. I pressed her to me—she answered not—she was cold!

* * * * *

"I awoke. I was not mad now; but where was I? It was the same place—the old square opening to the sky, the same gurgling of the wine fountain, my chains on my wrists. But the foul odor! I could not bear it. And then—what was that? No! it could not be she. It was she—shall I ever forget that sight?

"I see it now—my God! I see it now," shrieked the old man, "that putrid mass, bruised, torn, mutilated—without a trace of humanity about it—the bones showing through the torn shreds of skin, the flesh eaten—yes, eaten away! Those ears in which I whispered words of love—those eyes in which I saw my happiness—those lips that pressed so lovingly to mine—those tender breasts on which I hoped to see my children hang—gone!—gone! all were gone! and by their gleam I saw the eyes from their fleshless sockets glared on me, while the lipless teeth seemed to gnash at me from their bare skull. Armless too—and the arms!—I started. The bones were in the fetters still—her fetters. They still hung to mine. I was free in all but them.

"I looked round and saw the mirror; the matted beard, the blood-stained visage that became me ALL!

"One window was open now. I leaped, caught the sill, and I was free, completely free if for life if not that sight from mine eyes. It would not go; never went—never has gone. Thirty years it—this remaining horror—has been before me. I have seen every thing through that as through a veil. It was growing indistinct. To have called it back again. I see it now. My God!—my God! I see it now!" and the old man would have fallen, but that his friends caught him and laid him on the couch.

A few minutes and he revived. He raised himself into a sitting posture, his eyes strangely lighted. "Brethren, before I depart I would pray with ye once more." His hands were uplifted in prayer; the voice came low and faint. "Our Father who art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come; thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses—as we forgive them that trespass against us—" A spasm crossed his face, his chest heaved with a mighty effort; his voice, low before, burst out now with a violence that shook the walls. "Help me, O God! I must—I will—I do forgive them. Spoura, then, even them, art now forgiven—Christus, have mercy, have mercy—the trespass—" He struggled, knelt, leaned forward as though he saw something in the air, stretched out the old withered arms to grasp the phantom, while a smile of happiness unspeakable lighted up the pallid features.

"Virginia! I come—I come!"—then fell back into their arms—dead.

It was night; the sun had set. He was with Virginia now.

It was gone forever.

THE WRECK OF THE "NORTHERNER."

We are indebted to the civility of a California correspondent for the sketch of the loss of the Northerner, which is engraved on page 120. The sketch was made by a passenger at the time of the wreck. We condense from the accounts of the survivors the following narrative:

It was about five o'clock on Thursday, the 5th inst. that the disaster occurred. The rock upon which the Northerner struck was about midway between Blunt's Reef and the coast, and perhaps two miles from the latter. It is always covered.

There was no confusion or noise after the accident. The pumps were sounded, when it was found that the ship was leaking fast. The bell then ordered the steward to inform the ladies in the cabin, most of whom were in their berths at the time, that they would be taken to the boats, and to leave their clothes on, ready for any emergency, but not to alarm them. At the same time the ship's head was put toward the shore, and the sails on the land at full speed. The steward says, I went into the cabin and told the ladies that they had better dress. Some of them said, "Oh no: we don't want any dinner," thinking that the second time he got ready to serve. I told them that the ship was leaking some, and that perhaps they might have to take to the boats. They thought I was joking, and it took some time for me to convince them of the truth. They then dressed, and all went into the after cabin to take room, on the starboard side.

Gradually we neared the shore, toward the mouth of Bear River. It was growing dark rapidly. The weather had suddenly changed, and it had commenced blowing from the southwest, with fine rain. We saw that we were running into a heavy surf.

It was about six o'clock when the ship first struck; I should judge she went stem on, and being in the surf, a roller came after her the moment she stopped, washing fore and aft the ship, and taking several off their feet, but none were washed overboard. This was, however, but a small specimen of the surf which afterward made up as the wind increased.

The first thing that was done was to lower a boat on the larboard side—all the starboard boats having been left inboard and taken over to that side of the ship for that purpose. The sky lay with her head to the southward, and her larboard side was consequently in-shore. Mr. French, the first officer, was directed by Captain Dall to lower his boat and try and save the ladies. No attempt had been made yet to run a line to the shore. The boat was got overboard safely, and four ladies, Mrs. Tew, Miss Hartney, Mrs. Sweitzer, and Mrs. Thompson and child, with three children of Mrs. Tew—were placed safely in board. No more could see fifty yards in-shore from the wreck, and none knew whether the boat would live in the surf or not; but Mr. French took the chance. The ladies behaved nobly. There was no whimpering, no screaming, nothing.

Two boats were lost, and Mr. French, the first officer, started again for the ship, but was caught in an eddy, and not captured, and his immediate charge, "I guess we'll goes on to say."

About this time a tremendous sea struck the ship, carrying away the stern, but fortunately no person was aft at the moment. The wreck of the stern did not take the other two boats were lost, and we waited some time for them to return. Seeing that something must have happened to prevent their return, Captain Dall asked Mr. O'Neil, the chief engineer, whether he could carry a line to the shore. He said he would attempt, "I will try," and took the last boat, and all our hopes seemed centred in him, with the belief that we were ourselves by the line. Fortunately, the boat reached the shore in safety by that means. A larger one was lent on from the ship and hauled to the beach. Gregg was still on board, as was also her brother.

Meanwhile the passengers were commenced to try the line. In almost every instance they were washed away from the rope before they had gone fifty or sixty yards. The force of the surf was tremendous. It came in from the ocean in toppling walls of water, and kept the rope almost constantly buried. Many had a terrible fate of those who had gone before, the next few made a running jump, and succeeded in getting into the water over a fatal expedient, for they got entangled in the line, and were quickly drowned. Fifteen persons in the water were for even a moment.

Some of the passengers reached the shore safely.

A number of others remained amidships on the wreck, determined to take their chances of being washed ashore, but fortunately, before the ship broke up, two or three more after, the fragment upon which they were drifted away, and all were saved. Mr. Gregg, one of the last right, at intervals, the cries of those persons who had lashed themselves to the forward paddle-wheel were heard distinctly above the whistle and the wind. Among these were Mr. Gregg and his sister, who had refused to take the rope, preferring to remain together. When the wreck broke up the heavy iron-work among the wheels, which was very strong, remained comparatively stationary. At daylight not a vestige of the wreck could be seen save this iron work. All the wooden part of the hull had been washed ashore. Some of the crew were along the beach for eighteen or twenty miles, in search and aid, but found no one living or dead except Gregg.

But the most sorrowful spectacle was that of the body of Miss Gregg, which after her death, during the horrors of that dreadful night, the force of the surf had not been able to wash away from her side. Her brother's love was securely lashed. The other two bodies were gone—only to be washed ashore a few days after. Gregg recognized the body of the poor unfortunate young woman, and had her wrapped in a blanket, and with the help of a young man bore with the long hair floating over the face. When the surf broke the body would swing out, and with the recoil, fall back upon the iron. This was continued from the beach—there being no means of removing the body. At last the tide fell, when it was carried by those joining hands, and thus extending themselves out into the surf. The water was not then more than four feet deep—a large sand-bar having been formed inside of where the wreck had been. This last one climbed up the beach and placed on the corpse deck, where it was taken ashore and placed with the rest.

In the meantime the bodies were found on the beach. Some of them bore marks of bruises about the head and face, received from floating timbers, and from the wreck floating in the surf. These were all buried behind a small hillock, a few hundreds yards from the beach.

THE STEAMER "PACIFIC."

AMONG the many fine steamers that ply the waters of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, the steamer Pacific is in the front rank. She is built exclusively for a passenger boat between Louisville and New Orleans, and has won a high name with the traveling community for her many good qualities.

The Pacific is a first-class boat in point of size and steam-power, having capacity for the burden of 1200 tons and cabin accommodations for 120 persons with state-rooms. Her extreme length over is nearly 350 feet, with 40 feet breadth of beam and 8 feet depth of hold. The model of the hull is very nearly that of a shark at the bow and stern, with good bearings, which makes her buoyant on the water; and her immense power propels her against the current of the strongest tide, or the force of the wind, and with an ease of locomotion that is both agreeable and astonishing to the traveler.

The cabin of the Pacific is very large, and is built in style; the build semi-Gothic and Corinthian, with lofty sky-lights, and her state-rooms very large and convenient, each being provided with every convenience the most fastidious could desire, including wash-stands, dressing-cases, mirrors, and all else required. She has also a nursery, nurses' room, bath-room, barber shop, etc., making her in all requirements a floating well-arranged hotel. The furniture of the cabin is of the best materials, rich, beautiful, and durable; while in her centre outlet, bets, and saddling-room the same has been spared, to make her a most desirable boat for the Southern travel, and the comfortable accommodation of families.

THE CHIEF ENGINEERS OF THE FIRE DEPARTMENT.

We publish on another page portraits of Harry Howard, ex-Chief Engineer of the New York Fire Department, and John Decker, his successor in that office.

Mr. Decker's election has been quite a triumph for him and his friends; he is likely to prove a very popular and efficient officer. He is of a Staten Island family; his father dealt in oysters, and was a noted connoisseur in bivalves. It is told of the old gentleman that having no one occasion ordered from a sloop-owner a load of oysters, the master omitted to insure his craft and cargo, and both were lost on the reef up the bay: Mr. Decker, however, paid him the amount stipulated. Both he and his wife are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

John Decker, the present Chief Engineer, was born in Vesey Street, New York, in 1823; joined the Department in 1844; became foreman of Company 14 in 1850, and held that position for one or two years. In 1852 he resigned, and in the following year was elected to the board of Assistant Engineers, which office he has held to the present time. He was elected Chief Engineer, a few days since, by a majority of 800, out of 2840 votes. He is a quiet, plain man, of unassuming manners and irreproachable character.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE MISTRESS of The Parsonage.

By ELLA RODMAN.

PART II.

WE were back again at the quiet Parsonage. There was Arethusa, with the same pleasant smile, and she led me in, and wrapped me up comfortably before the fire. But there was now one who considered his own right the strongest; and between the two I seemed in danger of being overwhelmed with an excess of care.

Arethusa continued her housekeeping duties, as before; she smiled at my offers of help, and Mr. Winesale looked as if not of the study—as he declared—"to keep me out of mischief," but as I knew to keep me in his sight. His sadness had departed—his pale cheeked with new light, and it flattered me to think that I had worked this change.

Arethusa sewed on buttons and mended stockings, as in the days of her brother's bachelorhood; she had gained nothing by his marriage except the additional care of a grown-up baby. Mr. Winesale knew that I was not fond of needle and pin, and Arethusa's heart had long ago made the same discovery; so I was as tenderly cared for as a waxen doll, and expected to do nothing but idly amuse and smile upon them.

I found this kind of life very pleasant; and I rejoiced that I was a clergyman's wife, and that no one would ever call me "Miss."

The winter passed rapidly away, and spring came with its buds and blossoms. Then did I begin more than ever to feel the loneliness of a manse. Arethusa was more than ever locked up more thankful that the lines had fallen to me in such pleasant places.

I remember well the inexpressible feeling of langnor, the loss of appetite, and inability to exercise, which had always heralded the advent of spring in my life. I was conscious; and with what indifference my grandmother and Hester would see me in the room my untasted breakfast to pursue my weary routine of household duties.

Now, freshly-laid eggs and luscious cream tempted my appetite; and Mr. Winnesile's anxious look, at any failure on my part to dispatch the good things placed before me, was a loving reminder that there was some one to watch my every movement.

Good, master-of-fact Arethusa, to whom the budding or the falling of the leaves was only a signal for house-cleaning and summer or winter clothing, having finally gotten through with the first duty mentioned, reminded her brother that it was time for her periodical visit to the city, and remarked that she would get me a summer bonnet as she was there herself, and if my dress would be upon the same scant pattern? However, I said nothing; but Mr. Winnesile, who had remained silent for some time, had, it would seem, been troubled by the same surmises, and my heart beat wildly to see his pride in me, when I Mistress Winnesile.

"We will all go together to the city, so that Fairy can choose for herself; your taste, my dear sister, may not be exactly to her liking."

Arethusa looked surprised, but acquiesced at once, although she said something about a clergyman's wife "in public." Upon which I immediately informed her that I was going in search of a pink bonnet, blue dress, and yellow shawl, as a penalty for jesting me thus always in her common-sense nature that she believed it all, and answered me with a sort of mournful regret until I thought I must be undeserving her.

Mr. Winnesile understood it all, and shook his head reprovingly, but I only laughed at him, and danced off to make preparations for what seemed a perfect era in our quiet life.

My husband had an aunt in the city, living comfortably in a spacious house, and thither he conducted me. She was a very agreeable old lady, and when I was presented to her said, archly, to Mr. Winnesile,

"Ah, well, it's one thing to preach and quite another to practice. Theory, model woman who respects her husband and keeps her household in order; practice, a pretty child whose long curls and sparkling eyes have put all philosophy to flight. Ah, Arthur! you're no better than the rest of them, after all."

This was not intended for my ear, but it reached it, nevertheless. Her nephew looked quite confused at this attack, and the old lady added lightly, as she took my hand,

"You need not be ashamed of your apology, though."

I wondered if he was ashamed of me; but a stolen glance soon told me that, and my spirits rose at once.

Mr. Winnesile seemed to have fallen in love with me afresh; and, petted and flattered on all sides, I laid my head on my pillow with an elated heart, and my locking, I am afraid, "for ornament of a meek and quiet spirit." Perhaps Arthur was more lenient to my faults than he should have been, but if so, this was his weakness. Never had I imagined a more perfect, noble character than my husband.

Our stay was limited, and the next morning we were deep in the mysteries of shopping.

Mr. Winnesile, man-like, felt specially in love with a rich, rose-colored, quiet-looking, fine silk, of an exquisite shade; and when I tremblingly asked the price, and put it from me as what sounded to my simplicity exorbitant, he whispered in my ear,

"Take it, darling, if you like it! my purse will stand it very easily."

The silk was measured off, and then came the pleasant affair of the bonnet, which I had never gone "a shopping" in my whole life before, could scarcely believe my own identity. Mrs. Cleveland's knowledge of the ways was a great advantage to us; and being conducted by her to a tasteful milliner, a pretty straw bonnet, trimmed with rose and white ribbon, with a cap of violets, was soon selected; and this, with a small quantity of fine lace muslin, completed a tout ensemble the like of which I had never figured in before.

"If you are suitable for a clergyman's wife," Mr. Winnesile declared; and when Arethusa remarked, rather doubtfully, that "she hoped the Simsons wouldn't go without an invite as they generally did," he had quite a long talk with her about being "too austere," telling her that it was the duty and proper for us to show our sense of beauty in a reasonable degree, and asking her why God had made the flowers if life were to be a mere stroll of duties and cares.

To all of which Arethusa, whose logical powers were not largely developed, only replied that "she hoped the princess wouldn't go to ruin."

I cared very little for "the Simsons," or any one else in Meadowbrook, as I equipped myself in my new dress and becoming cap, and Mr. Winesile was so delighted with my appearance that he got positively angry at Arethusa.

"And now let us take our walk," said he, when this little ebullition was over. "And Aunt, dear Arethusa, we will call upon your grandmother and aunt."

"Not there!" I exclaimed, in dismay, as I felt the blood leave my hand from my face. "I never want to see those horrid people again!"

"My dear child," said my husband, reproachingly, "duty will never do. Time, years reconciliations have not displayed much affection for you; but you owe them, notwithstanding, a certain degree of attention for your father's sake. We must not give way too much to impulse, Fairy; and we never neglect any of the proprieties of life without regretting it either. Poor child!" he added, noticing my dismayed face, "I did not think I had become tired of her, and wanted to take her back? No, no, Fairy. You are quartered upon me now for life, and I wouldn't part with you if I wished it."

I smiled at his ridiculous conceit, and with a delightful feeling of security I approached again the house where I had spent so many weary years.

Hester opened the door, just on a crack at first, as was my way of old; and I just bowed to read a person's beart in the opening of a door. A free, widely-opened door is the sign of a generous nature; while a door opened on a crack, through which appears an eye, cold, calculating, and watchful, bespeaks a nature from which the contrast would need a very successful prayer. Such a nature was my Aunt Hester's.

With a scarcely-suppressed grunt of dissatisfaction she surveyed us from head to foot, and then gave entrance to a most scanty "come in." I remembered what Mr. Winnesile had said to me, and inquired politely after my grandmother, as I accepted this scanty invitation.

"Well, she's complaining," said Hester, "as usual."

I heard my husband sigh as he glanced around the dreary room; and I looked at him with more love in my heart than I had ever yet felt, as I thought of what would have been but for him.

My grandmother soon made her appearance.

"Hoity, toity!" she exclaimed, as her eye fell upon me. "What a fine lady Teena has grown, to be sure! They always called me by this odious name.

My aged relative planted herself close beside Mr. Winnesile, and began to tell me what I had me very hard to manage; giving, in illustration, various juvenile misdemeanors that had quite escaped my memory.

Hester attacked me; and after commenting upon the expensiveness of my dress—adding that "she always knew I had an extravagant turn"—she told me that "a silk dress like that ought to last a life-time;" and then gave me various recipes for dyeing. My maiden aunt preached me a long lecture upon economy, which, she said, was a most important virtue in a minister's wife; and endeavored to instruct me in the process of making soft soap. I was weary, and looked at Mr. Winnesile, who understood my appealing glance; but the old lady had him firmly by the button-hole, and getting away was not an easy matter.

When we at length rose to go Hester drew herself up, as if for an effort, and shortly remarked: "I always thought that Teena would manage to take somebody in—she had just the way for it."

This was the first time I had seen my husband angry. He glanced at my fast filling eyes, and a crimson streak crossed his forehead, as he replied, passing my hand through his arm:

"I beg you to understand, madam, that I do not consider myself in the least 'taken in.' I should have supposed that I, a man old enough to be her father, had taken this poor child in, had I not seen that I have probably secured her from a worse fate."

Mighty pretty!" said my grandmother, tossing her head; while my aunt remarked, in a tone intended to be extremely cutting, "I think you call yourself 'the Rev. Mr. Winnesile?'"

We had gained the door, but as we passed through it, Hester threw after me, as a malediction, the words: "Mark this, it won't last."

Was her evil spirit suddenly gifted with the spirit of divination, glonting over what it saw in the future?

"We will not go there again, darling," said my husband, in answer to my flushed face and tearful eyes; "your grandmother and aunt appear to be very singular people."

To his charitable and loving heart they were only "singular"—I wished that I could be as lenient.

We went back to Meadowbrook; and, as Arethusa had predicted, "the Simeses" did talk. Miss Sally Simes had suffered a bitter disappointment when Mr. Winnesile placed me in the position of clergyman's wife, and she now took every opportunity of revenging herself. My attire was described by the envious spinster almost to rival the magnificence of the famous "field of the cloth of gold;" and quite threw into the shade Buckingham's little practice of dropping jewels along his path, as deserted children, in the fairy tales, dropped crumbs to find their way.

The poison took effect; and Meadowbrook began to look upon me with averted eye. I did not care for Meadowbrook; but, for my husband's sake, I put by the offending silk dress for a time, and resumed my white muslin. I smiled to myself as I reflected that Miss Sally Simes could not take out my eyes and substitute her own green ones for them, nor replace my flowing ringlets by her grizzly head-covering. There was comfort in that. I often wondered if she wouldn't like to know Aunt Hester, and if they wouldn't be fast friends.

Sister Arethusa sometimes made visits. She had some relations living at an outlandish place, some miles distant, called "Hog's Point;" and were it not that before these departures she wound up the kitchen machinery and warranted it not to run down before her return, our meals would have occurred with delightful irregularity, or probably not have occurred at all.

I really thought that if any one was safe from the entangling meshes of Cupid, it was sister Arethusa; I had come to regard her as an institution—as much of a fixture as the fire-place; and nothing had as yet occurred to upset this little theory of mine.

But one memorable afternoon Arethusa and her bandbox returned from a visit at Hog's Point, but, alas! she came not alone; for with Arethusa and Arethusa's bandbox appeared a tall man in green spectacles, who reminded me of an elongated strip of parchment. I was alone in the parlor when this arrival came, and Arethusa, considerably flurried, presented her companion to me as "Professor Boggs," and then hastily made her escape.

The Professor started at me, called me "Miss," and endeavored to make himself agreeable until Mr. Winnesile came. The visitor shook hands with Arthur as though he were a pump-handle, and then graciously remarked,

"Your daughter, Sir, has been entertaining me very well in your absence—a promising young lady."

My husband glanced at my "baby frock" of white, with its blue sash, and the long ringlets shading a face that was dimpling with a suppressed inclination to laugh, as he replied, with a smile,

"Your mistake, Sir, was a very natural one; but allow me to present you to Mrs. Winnesile."

"Bless my soul!" exclaimed the Professor, with the sudden stunt of an awkward man completely "taken aback," and he pushed up his spectacles in a comical manner to look at me.

He appeared to be a plain, good-hearted individual, and let Arethusa do all the "courting." That elderly damsel was in a nervous flutter of uncertainty, as she sat there pouring out tea; and her singular mistakes caused her brother much perplexity—he being evidently busy in detecting the incipient stages of insanity. But I saw it all at once. Professor Boggs was the son that blushed to all things else, and the poor soul was divided between admiration for him and her anxiety to note the effect produced by her lover on others.

For that Professor Boggs was a lover was speedily made known by his applying to Mr. Winnesile, in due form, for the hand of his staid sister; and as "youth and inexperience" certainly could not be pleaded in Arethusa's case, there was no reasonable objection.

The bride-elect said that "she felt it her duty to settle at Hog's Point—she might be the means of doing some good." It is really astonishing how plainly duty is discerned when viewed through the spectacles of inclination!

But Arethusa was certainly a kind sister, and I really loved her. It was, perhaps, this very thing that disposed me to look unfavorably upon the wooing of Professor Boggs. I should miss her sadly; and as to Arthur—why, he might get breakfasts, and dinners, and suppers, and buttons sewed on, and—he might not.

Professor Boggs's mistake about me seemed to have troubled my husband, for the next day, as I was twisting my ringlets, he looked at me in an uneasy manner, and remarked,

"I am afraid those pretty curls are rather childish, Fairy. Couldn't you arrange them in some more dignified way—something like Arethusa's, for instance?"

I was quite provoked with him for this; but I only answered,

"Oh yes, certainly, if you wish it." And when he had gone down stairs I resolved to punish him well.

I completely saturated my rebellious curls with water, and then, culling to mind distinctly every queer crook and turn in that marvelous head-structure of Arethusa's, I piled up my own luxuriant locks in exact imitation of it; and having daubed down a love-lock on each cheek, I saw that the transformation was complete. The arrangement was very top - heavy, though, and made my head ache badly; but I was determined to carry it out for that day, at least, and I walked down stairs with a demure face.

Mr. Winnesile started visibly when he saw me, and evidently took me at first for a stranger; while Arethusa exclaimed, in her astonishment,

"Why, Fairy! what have you been doing to yourself? You don't look like yourself at all! Where are the curls?"

"Mr. Winnesile requested me to put them up," I replied; "he thought them 'too childish,' I believe."

He looked in amusement at my grave face, and whispered, as he followed me to the window: "Don't try this again, Fairy—your own way is the best. What does very well for a woman of Arethusa's size becomes a perfect burlesque on you."

So the curls were retained, as I meant they should be.

Arethusa was married at the Parsonage in a drab-colored merino dress; for it was autumn, just a year after our marriage, and she equipped herself with a view to the journey to Hog's Point.

She looked very solemn, and made very loud responses; while the Professor seemed frightened, and had the audacity to behave as though this were his first attempt, although he had been married three times before! As an old lady present remarked, "he was unfortunate in his wives." But Arethusa clung firmly to his arm, and looked sturdily resolved to make him a good wife as long as she lived.

Almost from the moment that they were pronounced one my sister-in-law designated him as "husband," and "husband" he has been ever since; never by any possibility "Professor Boggs," or "Jonah" (Jonah calls up such unpleasant ideas of whales)—always "husband." If it was "husband thinks this," or "husband thinks that," until I became tired of the very sound of the name.

Well, Arethusa went "for good," as the children say; and I felt like a ship afloat without a rudder.

"La!" said the worthy creature, as I sobbed upon her shoulder, don't take on so, Fairy.

"You can come to Hog's Point and see me, you know—you ever often." I often think it is well that the objects of our affection don't know how much selfishness there is mingled with our love.

"And, Ernestine," she continued, with a sudden gleam in her face, while I listened eagerly for a crumb of comfort, "don't forget the flannelcakes on Friday, dear—Arthur always likes flannel-cakes on Friday."

These were my sister-in-law's parting words; and I walked back into the parlor under the melancholy influence of the reaction that always follows a wedding, or any excitement.

But my husband drew me to the fire, and I was folded in his arms, close, close to his heart.

"All alone, now—you and I, Fairy," said he, with a loving smile. "Now we will see what a notable little housekeeper you'll make."

But I looked serious.

"I am afraid," I replied, with a mournful shake of the head, "I am really afraid you'll starve!"

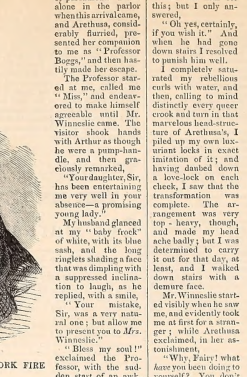
Mr. Winnesile laughed at my earnestness.

"One would suppose," said he, "that you were contemplating the impossibility of providing for an Ogre! I am not so altogether given up to eating, Mrs. Ernestine—I know somebody else, I think, who likes good things quite as well; and if you can eat your own manufactures, I am sure that I can. But cheer up, darling; there is no fear of our suffering—Minnè will see to that."

"Minnè" was a substantial American woman, who governed the kitchen completely; and I am not sure that her dominion didn't extend considerably beyond it. Minnè understood things, with the exception of some few articles for which I had received particular instructions from Arethusa; but somehow, I did not remember them as I should have done.

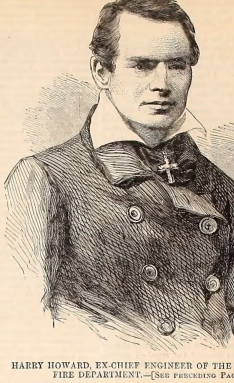
My first batch of mince-pies were spoiled with pepper—I had always an idea that mince-pies were extensively peppered; and in consequence of this novel ingredient they were "love's labor lost." The flannel-cakes, of which Mrs. Boggs had so impressively reminded me, were flanned by nature and flannel by nature, and repulsed all the loving advances of knives and forks. Thus my attempts in the cooking line were nearly always failures; but my husband appeared to be satisfied, and this was all I cared for.

The winter passed quietly and pleasantly, and I never felt lonely. When Mr. Winnesile was writing his sermons or visiting his parishioners, I sewed, or sat on the floor in his study, surrounded by piles of volumes that I had dragged from the book-case to find the most interesting.



Frequently we had long walks, when we stopped at the cottages of the poor to leave the warm garments which my needle had, perhaps, put together in the morning. It was pure and peaceful, this simple life, and my husband soon taught me to call our Heavenly Father home.

At Christmas came Professor and Mrs. Boggs from Hog's Point; and we dressed the old Church with greens and had a merry time of it.



Arethusa was just the same as ever, except, perhaps, an addition of dignity; and immediately after her arrival she went into the kitchen on a voyage of discoveries. She evidently discovered dreadful things; for, when I asked her if it did not look well, she only reiterated,

"The closets, child, the closets!"

My sister-in-law compared the kitchen to "a whited sepulchre," and various other unpretty things; it was "slicked up," she said, on the outside, while all sorts of things were stowed away in holes and closets. Now, I thought we had done very well, and Mr. Winnesile immediately put in a disclaimer; but Arethusa shook her head, and evidently considered me a hopeless case.

"CLINGHAM & CO., BANKERS."

BY FITZ HUGH LUDLOW,

AUTHOR OF "THE HASHEESH EATER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER VIII.

RELATES HOW A BANK SUPERINTENDENT AND A DEMON OF UNFAITH GOT TURNED OUT OF DOORS.

As the morning with whose dawn our last chapter closed advanced to nine o'clock the doors of Clingham & Co. opened for business as usual, because, in the first place, banking hours commenced then by the immutable laws of sober progress; and, in the second place, Mr. John Manton took down the shutters at that hour—a fact only less predestermnate and inevitable than the astronomical one. But the doors opened only on just so much possibility of transacting business as was inherent in the one very sleepy and mopey head owned by Mr. M'Dowlas. And it was not until full ten o'clock that the other young gentlemen had all arrived, and were sitting or standing indifferently at their posts, with the exception of Ernest Beckford. All that day went dragging by the eyelids.

Whenever it was possible, from a temporary slack in the tide of business, or an unusual nonchalance as to whether there was business or not, the various officers of the bank gathered in a little swarm at some one desk, and canvassed the main event of the preceding night. Canvassed it with the most minute ferocity which a disagreeable subject excites in under-slept men; canvassed it, calling all sorts of undutiful names, and implying all manner of unpleasant imprecations, but always coming to the conclusion at last, that the wallet-snatching was merely a drunken freak on the part of a man not used to liquor, and so quite maddened thereby, and that on returning to his senses he would be very much ashamed of what he had done, returning to ask forgiveness and repair his error. Would they receive him back among them, and treat him as if nothing had happened? Some one thought that he might be made something of after all, though he did do a thing which no gentleman of honor would do. But the majority leaned to the decidedly expressed opinion of Mr. Bradby that they'd be d—d if they would.

They had hoped to receive a fillip to their lagging senses in the coming of one or the other of the prominent actors in the last night's occurence; but when hour after hour went on and no Ernest appeared to cry peccavi, to look ashamed of himself, to be sent to Coventry, or to produce any sensation whatever—and when the speculators, the men wanting discounts, the poor widows, and the agents of worthy causes had all to be sent away one after another with the answer, "Not in, I tell ye"—and there was no information, no suggestion, no hypothesis to fall back upon except their own—the young men of Clingham & Co., Chiswick Branch, found each other very bad company.

Long after bank hours were over and the doors shut, at the gray of dusk a very sorry and used-up rag drew into the livery-stable yard of the Brothers Grant at Chiswick, a light wagon, much mud-bespattered and weather-beaten. Upon the seat, just arrived from Bloodfield, sat Mr. Luke Green. And with as perfect a sweetness of voice as if he had just arrived from an airing for pleasure, he turned to one of the proprietors, who stood smoking his pipe outside the stalls, and said:

"My venerable friend breathed his last just after I arrived. I was so happy, by the speed of your excellent mare, to have reached Huddersfield in time to close his eyes!"

Uttering which cheering and praiseworthy reflection, he slipped the value of his vile into the hand of Richard Grant, who took it, feeling as if the blessing of a most pious character went with it, putting a new gilt on the two quarter eagles, but who would have been less of this sentiment had he followed the gentle and self-forgetting soother of death-beds just outside of his yard, and seen the square, polished, white under-jaw shut tight, and the small, long fingers clench till the veins knotted on the back of the hands. Had he seen the smooth, ivory forehead mapped by livid branching boundaries, the calm cheeks grow sunken as with death in unpleasant smile, like a glary, quiet pool on the sea, where a shark lies underneath; had he heard that single word which Luke Green uttered, through lips that hardly opened to let it out, "Beckford!" Not a, grunt in it, not a qualifying expression of any kind: but the manner in which it was uttered told of a crowd of satanic bad wishes, for this word and the world to come, covering so hard behind it as fairly to keep the doors of speech from opening to let them out, such as never was a dollar should be sounds in any merely human vocabulary. "Beckford!" as if that simple name must stand representative of all hellish desires, sponsor for the fulfillment of all fiendish threats which otherwise could get no airing even indirectly. "Beckford!" and repeating it again, he passed quiet and unnoticeably away to his house.

The next day in the bank went more briskly. Messrs. Todds, Bradby, & Co. unburdened their minds freely, at various times, to Mr. Green upon the sly—and being a man with that gentleman never to appear too familiar and confidential with the subalterns before others—and felt a great deal better for it. But only during its answer that they received to any of their remarks was, that every body had been disappointed in the young man Beckford; but that the whole subject had better be forgotten. It was his desire that it should be so. The wallet was not of much consequence: if the unhappy fellow was betrayed into stealing it, he thought very likely the excitement of bank and drinking had been at the bottom of it, and that now he was ashamed to return, for fear of being dealt with according to law. But he would not prosecute him—oh no! let it go! That was the better way. And the young men left the superintendent's room with a feeling of relief that Green's nature never played all-fours for small stakes merely to add to the interest, you know.

Three o'clock came and shut the doors of Clingham & Co. It was then that Luke Green, briskly concluding the two or three letters he had to send after business hours, and seeing that all the janiors under his superintendence had departed, rose and passed across the hall to the room in which John Manton usually sat at this hour—looking at, rather than into, the first volume of Rollin's "History of the World," of the style and finish of which he had indeed satisfied himself, or it not Rollin, something else of the same kind, and equally unreadable—Foxe's book of Martyrs, or Jonathan Bibb's sermons, for instance. Invariably from one until four or five in the afternoon he was still from dinner state of mind, and having a book in his lap thought himself meditating. At a reasonable time before dinner, he considered himself on having been historical, devotional, philosphical, as the work on his knees had partaken of either of these characteristics, and addressed himself to getting hungry by either walking or whirling his arms about like a windmill. Poor old man! Luke Green had been told twenty years before that he would ever have reached this state of being, this perfect content in all vegetation, but that he was still but settled, like a bright tar-coal, under the wet bog of many troubles, and that a little breath from a slanderer had been knocked down. But, line by line, the Mansoul within him had ebbed down to the beach of his body, leaving it dry and to senses barer and barer, until it seemed as if, long before the time had come, according to the manner of men, for the tide to be quite out with him, the slack-water of his soul was nigh at hand, and he would be left a mere physical existence—an eater, a drinker, a sleeper—and here and there just a memory or two to mock the departed mind, like the little pools of brine that stand in old sailors' wooden legs after the above the water-line when the tide is down.

I have said long ago that Green read to her father in the evening. Sometimes, as on the evening when we first saw her, the thing read was the newspaper; sometimes it was one of the driest of dry books of polemic theology; but the book or the paper, or whatever it might be, was many a time gently and noiselessly folded up when the poor old man's head fell wearily on his breast, and a pair of overflowing girl eyes looked at him as if their bright well was their fountain would break. It seemed to her as if he slept more sweetly for being watched with love. And joyous tears did not, unless perhaps it would have disturbed him to have her weep. The aforesaid girl had been left his office to pay John Manton a visit had been spent by Nora in her father's room. She was darning—I know it is unromantic, but it is not in the best sense prose, rather poetry of the highest order, when we think how often those same woman fingers that rear invalid stockings glide thence to knit up the thread of raveling hearts—she was darning, and a pile of blue socks just from the wash grew low and low, while unwinding afternoon, being rolled up as fast as discharged cured, and laid in a basket at her side. John Manton addressed not a syllable to her of any description, for Rollin was in his lap. It was a warm, lazy day, the windows were open, and gradually the sensible stillness of every thing put John Manton to sleep. Nora, as ever when he slept, sat looking at him with an unspeakable tenderness, until at last she found that she slept threads by darning at the same time, and for a while stopped the latter. The long alspace sack which he wore had been black when it was new, and having been pressed only once, and not sponged at all, did not shine greasily in the seams at that time, as it did now. It fluttered in the little breath of air that came through the half-closed shutters, and showed not only its own rustiness to perfect advantage, but several delicate yet not indiscernible lines whose three cornered tears had been wounded down the knee-sprung legs of the old man's pantaloons. And following the outline of his form, flung on the settee in a childish abandonment to sleep, Nora's glance rested on his shoes, and the eyes that had been filling poured over, for one of those queerly tender thoughts in which so truly humor sits by the deepest well of pathos in our souls.

"To think that those poor dear old feet that have so many, many and all their weary way to the grave, should have to wear patched cowhide, while some people—"

She did not complete the thought even to her own mind, for the spirit of envy is drowned in a good woman's tears. She arose, and planting on the rather fantastic for the softest kiss, as a real to sweet sleeping till she came again, passed quietly out of the door that led to her own room.

A moment after, Luke Green came to the hall door and tapped. The old man awoke and listened. The tap was repeated, and he called "Come in." Upon which Luke Green entered, and with an obeisance such as he would have made to a king, whom he wished a favor, drew a chair up to the settee on which the old man had been lying.

"Dear sir, I find myself in this rather protrating weather? Are we doing pretty well, considering?" said Luke Green, opening the conversation with a reverent cheerfulness of tone.

"Oh, so so—very well for me—yes, yes, very well, indeed, thank you."

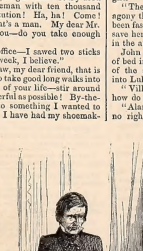
"I have had to be out of town for a day or two, which accounts for my not coming in to see how my dear old friend was getting on. Now, are you sure there's nothing I can do to soothe your pain—you haven't any pain? No? Very really. Most thankful we ought to be for that. I am so glad to hear it. Nothing I can do to make you comfortable in any way? See if you can't think of something—"

"Oh, you're very kind, Mr. Green, very; but really I don't know of any thing that would be one tenth part worth the fact is, I feel rather tired. I have felt tired for a good while. I don't know when I haven't felt so. I suppose I always shall."

"Isn't it the liver? Or the stomach? Are you sure it isn't the stomach? Boggs's Frailon is highly recommended for that. Let me get you a bottle of Bogg's Frailty's Friend—"

"I don't think it is the stomach, Mr. Green. It may be the liver. I can't tell. I only know that I'm very tired, and always am."

"Back? Limbs? Shoulders, perhaps?"



"All over; no one place—tired of seeing, hearing, feeling, smelling, feeling—tired of every thing."

"Ah! a case of ennui! really, now, must we be so fretfulness? Excuse my word, a rogue, a regular rogue! Oh you funny fellow, honest and hearty as you are, to get blase—really used up at fifty! Ah! a constitution with ten thousand a year and no constitution! Ha, ha! Come! we must rouse up: that's a man. My dear Mr. Manton, I've got it to you—do you take enough exercise?"

"I go to the post-office—I saved two sticks of wood one day last week, I believe."

"Oh, pshaw! Pshaw, my dear friend, that is nothing! You ought to take good long walks into the country every day of your life—stir around and make yourself cheerful as possible! By-the-by, I have got to something I wanted to speak of at any rate. I have had my shoemaker make me a capital pair of shoes for English walking shoes lately, and while he was about it, thought he might as well make another, they pleased me so much—let's look at your foot—ah! that is the size of mine, as I thought—and—wait a second—how—how are they are—will you accept them, my dear friend, as a great favor to me —for a small token of affection?"

As Mr. Luke Green said this he was drawing a bundle from behind the easy chair, which he had very unobtrusively brought in and hidden there —breaking open the paper that wrapped it—and displaying to the eyes of John Manton what were indeed a very handsome pair of the article mentioned.

"OUT WITH YOU. OUT!"

The old man arose from his reclining position and took them in his hand. Then seemed almost dispossed to hand them back. Then looked down at his patched and time-rusty shoes of hide. Then looked back and contrasted them with the sheeny pair in his hand—and stroking their rich, smooth gloss, was seduced. Moreover, Luke Green had already begun playfully untying the strings of the pair he wore, and kept saying, "Try them on! try them on—they don't bite—you needn't be afraid of them." So they were on almost before John Manton was aware. And the seductive Green regarded them and him with a suave smile that seemed to encase him in a suit of glaze from head to toes.

Mr. Green's eyes now wandered for a moment about the room, as if with the purpose of putting his friend at ease, by appearing not to hear his repeated thank you's. And in its wanderings fell upon many additions which his own beneficent hand, coming noiseless as the dew, sinker of grass-thirst, had made to the comfort and the obligation of the Manton family. In the corner was a little card-table, which held the family daguerreotypes. That table he had sent in on the sly—one birth morning of Nora Manton—with a card marked "From an unknown friend" in the boldest strokes of his well-known handwriting. The pretty brocatelle curtains that shone through the summer muslin—making a pleasant subdued rosiness at the window sides —he had hung those with his own hand one day when John and his daughter were at dinner, happening in in the course of the afternoon to be catechised and look conscious upon the subject of "whose doing they were." A handsome little plated epergne, with a flower-glass replenished from rose and violet beds daily by Nora, to infuse a breath of summer into her father's wintry life, several books such as come with the compliments of the season, table ornaments, one of the engravings from Goupil's, which hung upon the wall—all these Luke Green could look upon with complacency, as being so many reminders to him of his past goodness.

The subject of the shoes now being passed over comfortably, and the two men preceding that they had never thought of them—Mr. Green whistled abstractedly, put his hands in his pockets, paced up and down the room three or four times, and then, with a sigh, sat down again, and began critically examining a spot in the carpet. The deep dejection apparent in his countenance could not fail to arouse even the dormant faculties of John Manton, who looked at his visitor for a moment with an air of puzzle, and then said,

"You're not ill to-day, I hope, Mr. Green?"

"No, not ill precisely. Oh! it is nothing; I shall soon be over it—"

"But I beg—please let me know—if—if something can't be done for you."

"I'm afraid not: I wish something could be done. But it's impossible for any one to keep any thing from you. I will tell you: I must. My dear, dear friend, Mr. Manton—you believe I was you?"

Here Luke Green seized the trembling hand of the old man, and gazed into his eyes as one who would read his soul.

"Yes; I believe you do."

"And you are sure that I love your daughter Nora? that I have the interest of that charming angel at the very bottom of my heart?"

"You have often told me that you had her very much. And she is a good girl—a good girl."

"Then be sure that I tell you with heartfelt agony that she is the dupe of a villain; she has been fascinated; she will be destroyed, unless we save her, by a man whose knavery is unequaled in the annals of crime!"

John Manton, like one groping his way out of bed in a dream, lifted himself up by the arm of the sofa, and looked with bewildered eyes into Luke Green's face.

"What? Fascinated? Destroyed? How, how do you mean—not my Nora, is it?"

"Alas! my old friend, your, our—as I have no right to say our—dear, dear Nora! Now don't be excited; be quite calm: there is no serious harm yet; I will tell you all. Do you know any thing of a certain young man, who has been employed here in the bank in a subordinate capacity for the last few weeks—a young man with a very innocent, plausible face, blue eyes, and light-brown hair, named Beckford?"

"Yes, yes, I've seen him; is it he? Oh, go on!"

"Be quite calm, my old friend, your health will not permit of this excitement. Perhaps all may be well, he may not be quite the doubledyed villain he appears."

"Good God! Go on, go on: has he hurt Nora?" And twenty years at one dash of the sponge of passion were wiped off of the face of the father.

"All in time. This Beckford knows your daughter?"

"Yes: she has met him at a party; they have bowed in the street. Will you go on?"

"I know still more: she has been seen walking with him, and I have myself seen them look at one another at church, when their little thought that they were noticed, as no people ever look unless they love. And this Beckford is —no; but I will not prejudice you against one who may even now be your daughter's accepted lover."

"Luke Green, will you drive me mad? In the name of God speak on!"

"Very well: but remember if it tears your soul you wished me to—you made me. I must bear all that I have to say, making every allowance for youth, frailty, and the natural evil of our hearts. This unhappy young man is a thief! an accomplished thief, probably out of one of the very worst gangs in New York. Sit still! I'll tell you particulars—proofs. Two nights ago I sat at the house of a friend where he also was visiting. When I arose to leave he went out first and in great haste, and there is one person at least ready to swear that he saw my watch, which I had carried too carelessly in my pocket, in Beckford's hands. At any rate, when it was too late to follow the—Beckford, I discovered that it was gone, and in a mere twenty-five hundred dollars."

"Oh! oh! Go on! Go-o-n!"

"I must go as quickly as I could. He had fled from there, leaving word that he had gone to a place many miles out in the country. I took a horse and carriage, and, well, sent the police in pursuit of him. They returned, saying he could not be found. Under his bed was discovered a false stomach, and a pair of such glasses as are worn in disguise by criminals wishing to elude the detectives. I have heard that a box of burglar's tools have since been found, but I haven't seen those yet. And there is but little doubt he goes by other. See this piece of paper I found under the bureau in his room. Look!"

"Read, Ernest," said the old man, peering mazedly through his glasses, "why, that isn't Beckford, it's—"

"Sh! don't speak it aloud, there may be listeners, and the crime's forgery! He has enough for one head to bear on it now. And let me give you a hint. I've been trying to look into affairs of this Bank from getting on to the uncertainty I have heard the rumors on the street about Clingham & Co., going to the dogs for some weeks past; and I tell you I don't see but its going to be fort pretty soon. There's been a defalcation lately: the books are coming short at the yearly audit some five thousand dollars; and don't see how I could hide it if it were for my own brother. Clingham & Co. will have to know who's the defaulter, and I must tell 'em."

"Beckford?"

"Sh! not so loud. I don't say any thing about it. I'm listen! As you know quite a love for Miss Manton, beware lest she disappear some night to become the mistress of a burglar!"

Once too much, Luke Green! a little beyond the mark of policy!

Luke Green saw that he had said one of those things which few men, even the most abject, pass unresented, and was about to recover, for he had not been in a passion; in his engineering, he had carelessly laid his hand upon the wrong cord, misjudging the delicacy of the work he practiced on—that was all; but it was too late—he had done the harm.

Sir Frank Manton, standing erect and untrembling as a young man, "there is not the being on God's earth that could say that thing to me of Nora and stand under my shelter. Leave the room, Luke Green! The little that is left to me of honor shall not be polluted by the foot of a man who comes to say such lies of her! Out with you. Out!"

"But, my dear friend, one moment—"

"Not an instant! Oblige me by not making more words or acts necessary!"

"Very well, John Manton, very well!"

And uttering these words in the tone of one who is pretty sure that it is going to be my thing but very well in reality, Luke Green glided out as quietly as he had come.

The moment that the door was shut John Manton sank into a chair, and, feeling that he was about to abandon his self-control, he threw himself back upon it, wrists and cried like a child. The shadow of the last twenty years fell over him again, and he withered and bent in it like a cellar-grown leaf. The fire went from his eye, the tension from his muscles, and even the manly sense of indignity from his heart. He only knew that his poor old time-beaten and crumbling tenement of a body had been visited through every crack and cranny by such a gust as had not shaken it for many and many a day. And now, in childlike tears and trembling, he lay exhausted under the reaction.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

An avaricious fellow in Brussels gave a large dinner recently. Just as the guests sat down a specific shriek was heard in the court-yard. The host hurried out, and returned pale, afflicted, and his hands covered with blood.

"What is it?" was the inquiry.

"Alas!" he said, "a poor workman, father of a large family, has met with a terrible accident. He was pressed down by a cart, and grievously wounded. Let us eat in peace."

A collection was taken up, and the guests contributed fifty francs. Generous souls! It was the miser's ruse to make them pay for the dinner.

There is a story of a respectable lady, who being pestered for alms by a professional mendicant wife—"Do, there's a dear lady! Do, there's a good lady!" finally and unwillingly responded, "If I want's a lady, I'd poke this here parasol in your mouth."

"If's a melancholy thing when those you depend on turn against you," as the gentleman said when the baker asked him to pay his bill.

"Sally," said a fellow to a girl who had red hair, "keep away from the candle, or you'll get fired."

"No danger of that," replied the girl, "you are too green a-ready."

A candidate for the honor of representing four Fifth burghs in Parliament calling upon an honest shoemaker for his vote and influence, found the liberty of kissing the gude-wife, who was a middle-aged woman, and, in doing so, he took no further liberty of slipping a couple of guineas out of his own mouth into that of the matron, and thus left being offended by such a breach of decorum, the lady slyly said, as she pocketed the two shining pieces, "Ca' yea like, Sir, ca' yea like, gudder, Sir."

Some time ago a professor of legerdemain entertained an audience in a village which was principally composed of soldiers. After various feats of the latter with various tricks—metamorphosing wine into water, etc.—he said the loan of a half-penny for the use of the company. A soldier, with a little hesitation, handed out the coin, which he gravely pocketed, and exhibited, as he said, transformed into a guinea.

"Ay! is that my bawbee?" exclaimed the soldier.

"Undoubtedly," answered the juggler.

"Let's see't then," said the soldier, turning it round and round in examination with an acrimony of delight, he watched the juggler for his chance to slip it back into his pocket, said, "Tae wan'st ye'll no turn't into a bawbee again."

A small boy was caught stealing dried berries, and was locked up in a dark closet by the grocer. The boy commenced singing most lustily, and, as he stopped, and after using all the persuasion that his young mind could devise, he promised, "Now, if you'll let me out and send for my daddy, he'll pay you for them, and lick me besides." The grocer then could not withstand this appeal, and released the urchin.

An Irishman being asked whether he did not frequently receive letters from a friend in America, who, indeed, Jemmy often speaks to me in Irish, but I always answer him in English, for I don't like to show off, you know, I don't want Jemmy to know that I understand Irish."

A fashionable visitor thus addressed a little girl: "How do you do, my little dear? I am very well, I thank you," she replied. The visitor then added: "Now, my dear, I've asked you how I do, and you said, honestly replied, 'I don't want to know.'"

"Ah, did you ever dabble in stocks?"—"Well, yes, I put my foot in them once."

The respectable old lady who "raised the rising hop" has given the search of the blacksmith who "riveted the chain of friendship."

In some cases authorship is but another word for perjury.

At Newcastle the people must be a youthful set—for all are miners.

In a speech on behalf of a blind asylum the orator gravely remarked that "if the world were blind what a melancholy sight it would be!"

He that scrils in prosperity will shrink in adversity.

A medical man asked his legal adviser how he could prescribe a best way to get rid of a client who had become small. "I am not aware of any Act," says the lawyer, "but I should tread to kill him myself."

When Mr. White looks black does he change color?

A manufacturer invites the public to come and see his invisible wire fences.

"Come here, Tom: do you know your A B C's?" "Yis, sur, I know a bee see."

A French writer has lately observed, with commendable caution, that "matter is not always to be depended on."

A proxy novel is opposed to the laws of natural philosophy. Here the line of reflection should never be greater than that of incidence.

What is the difference between a blunder and a wedding? One is a mistake, and the other a take miss.

If a bashful marries, does his wife become a bashful-ess?

A provincial reporter elegantly observes of a female pickpocket: "She comes like a sunbeam, and, like it, steals noiselessly away."

When Lord Byron was asked whether he did not think Miss Bird's acting in "Ion" was good, he said that he considered it "exceedingly natural; he replied, "I really can not say; I have never enjoyed the acquaintance of any other species."

"I say!"—Mrs. Jenkins was in the habit of using "I say" to almost every sentence to which she gave attention. On one occasion, during the lull for a conversation, on his entering she said, "I say, James, I have been to Mrs. Brown's to-day, and heard such news! I say, I am in the habit of saying 'I say' to every word I say. Now, if I do say 'I say' to every word I say, it does not become you to say that I say 'I say' to every word I say, James."

The following explanation of the privileges accorded in Leap Year to ladies to choose husbands is from a work entitled "Courtship, Love, and Matrimony," printed in the year 1606: "Albeit, it is now become a part of the common laws of regard to every relation of life, that as often as every bissextile year doth return, the ladies have those privileges during that time, as to choose or make or love unto the men, which they doe either by words or deeds, as their owne tongues prompt, and, moreover, no one will be entitled to the benefit of clergy who doth refuse to accept the offers of a lady, or, in like sort, in any wise treat her proposal with slight or contumely."

A writer says that the gentle sorts of animals are greatly lessening now-a-days, and that the ferocious ones more gentle. Perhaps, then, the time may come when the golden age, in spite of the ferocious sheep, will run with all his might—and mane.

A man who had been married twice to ladies both named Catherine, advised his friends against taking dupli-Kates.

An old cynic, at a concert one night, read in the programme the title of a song—"Oh! give me a Cot in the Valley I Love." Reading it over attentively, the old fellow finally exclaimed, "Well, if I had my choice, I should ask for a bolstead."

THE ADVANTAGES OF POVERTY AND ADVERSITY.—You wear out your clothes and shoes. You are not troubled with many visitors. You are exonerated from making calls. Horse do not bore you. Sponges can not hang your table. Itinerant bands do not play opposite your window. You avoid the nuisance of serving on juries. No one thinks of presenting you with a testimonial. No tradesman insists on his bill by asking, "Is there any other little article to-day, Sir?" Begging letter-writers leave you alone. Impudent know it is useless to treat you. You practise temperance. You swallow infinitely less gluten than others. You are saved many a dispeptic misery and headache. And lastly, if you have a true friend in the world, you will find, in a very short space of time, to discover the agreeable fact.

An advertisement reads as follows: "Stolen, a watch worth ten pounds by a gentleman; if the thief will return it he shall be informed where he may steal one worth two of it, and no questions asked."

The Irish shopkeeper, who was cheated by an old woman stealing a jar of whisky and leaving a jar of water in its place, which, on speaking a strange dialect, neither Irish nor English. A punster said he had reason to complain of being watered.

HEARTLESS HOAX.—An agriculturist in London, on the 1st of April, goes to the Zoological Gardens with a recommendation, which he follows, to ask to be shown the two-horned dilemma.

EXTREMELY GREEN.—Secret drawers should never be made of green wood, for, in a very, at least, short time he deposited in them, from the very great risk they run of shrinking.

BEFORE AND AFTER.—A ben-pecked husband writes: "I before married, my domestic life would be all sunshine; but afterward I found out that it was moonshine."

One ought to have dates at one's finger-ends, seeing they grow upon the palm.

Apropos of earthquakes—one should not raise an alarm while others are quaking.

"Whose son are you, my little boy?" "I ain't nobody's son; I'm Mr. Thomson's nephew, Sir."

We suppose that a man who never speaks may be said always to keep his word.

"Sir, have you read the ode I composed to Sleep?" "Oh yes, and it composed me to sleep."

Isn't it rather an odd fact in natural history that the Aerial Navy is never at sea, but always in the harbor?

An eminent artist of the day is about getting up a "panorama of a low-suit." It opens in the year one, and ends with about 1860.

Why should potatoes grow better than any other vegetable?—Because they have eyes to see what they are doing.

There is a man in town so knowing that people who don't know their own minds come to him for information on the subject.

It should be remembered that a hare assertion is not necessarily the naked truth.

A bad hat, taken to an evening party, frequently comes out the next day as good as new.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Bronchial Affections.

A clergyman writing from Morristown, Ohio, speaking of the beneficial effects derived from the use of "Brown's Bronchial Troches," says: "Last Spring I feared my people were becoming deeply involved, and until I obtained your Troches could not preach a sermon of ordinary length. Within a few weeks after using them the utterance of 'Troches' I have in the past few weeks preached some forty sermons."

Announcement.

Important to Teachers, Schools and Families!

Now in Preparation:

Harper's Series of School and Family Readers.

CONSISTING OF A PRIMER AND SEVEN READERS.
By MARCIUS WILLSON.

☞ The Primer and the first Four Readers will be ready shortly. ☜

These Readers have FAR HIGHER AIMS than any hitherto published, and it is confidently anticipated by enlightened teachers that they will be cordially welcomed with their plan, and seen in execution in part, that they will introduce a new era in the cause of popular education.

The Leading Idea of these Books is

To furnish a series of Progressive Readers, which shall popularize, to the capacities of children, the "Higher Logical Branches" of study, so that a new useful knowledge of the various departments of NATURAL HISTORY and NATURAL SCIENCE shall be familiar to ALL the pupils in our schools, while they are engaged in their ordinary Reading Exercises. This is the only plan by which useful instruction in all these departments can be brought within the reach of all the youth in our country. If these Readers shall accomplish this object, and result in the incidental way of the ordinary Reading Exercises in School, without diminishing the time and the value of these Exercises, and without additional encouragement to teachers, they will introduce a most valuable beneficial influence upon Popular Education most be immense.

But while INSTRUCTION is the great aim and ultimate object in the PLAN of the Readers, it has been constantly kept in view in carrying out the plan, that the Reading Lessons must be GRADED to suit the capacities of the different classes of pupils for whose use they are intended, and that the books must be made so INTERESTING that children will seek for them with delight—and that, in short, every of matter, and in elementary instruction every must be adapted to the purpose for which Reading Books are primarily used in schools—that of teaching the ART of Reading.

The plan of Readers hitherto published makes any approach to this in SEVERE, VARIETY, BEAUTY, and UTILITY OF ILLUSTRATIONS.

Not only does the plan admit of very extensive illustrations in all of the Readers, but, in point of utility, the illustrations, especially in the Natural History divisions, are decidedly in advance of what can be found even in works exclusively devoted to the Natural History.

Thus the various divisions of Zoology, occupying a place in the Reading Readers, beginning with the Third, are extensively illustrated, upon a scale combining the greatest degree of interest and utility. For example, when a Class of Animals—Quadrupeds, Birds, Fishes, &c.—is described, the leading species of the class—sometimes embracing ten or twelve, or more species—that the books must be made so INTERESTING that children will seek for them with delight—and that, in short, every of matter, and in elementary instruction every must be adapted to the purpose for which Reading Books are primarily used in schools—that of teaching the ART of Reading.

The plan of Readers hitherto published makes any approach to this in SEVERE, VARIETY, BEAUTY, and UTILITY OF ILLUSTRATIONS.

Not only does the plan admit of very extensive illustrations in all of the Readers, but, in point of utility, the illustrations, especially in the Natural History divisions, are decidedly in advance of what can be found even in works exclusively devoted to the Natural History.

Thus the various divisions of Zoology, occupying a place in the Reading Readers, beginning with the Third, are extensively illustrated, upon a scale combining the greatest degree of interest and utility. For example, when a Class of Animals—Quadrupeds, Birds, Fishes, &c.—is described, the leading species of the class—sometimes embracing ten or twelve, or more species—that are one engraving, in which their relative proportions as to size are given, with an accompanying scale of measurement. Thus, in the class of Animals of the Deer Kind (Third Reader), a group is given, containing the leading species—from the large as elk and ox nearly larger than a rabbit. In the same manner the various Classes of Orders of Birds are illustrated, and also the leading forms of the Fourth Reader. Each Cut then becomes an interesting lesson in Natural History, and (what is better) for we believe the plan is original with Mr. Willson. Separate cuts are given to illustrate the great variety of authentic anecdotes of animals, which fill the Fifth and the numerous selected gems of prose and poetry.

Historical Readers, Lessons in Geography, Astronomy, &c., &c., are also fully illustrated by engravings unsurpassed in beauty and accuracy.

In the FIFTH and EARLY READING special efforts are made to form correct Habits of reading, by the introduction of pieces in Prose and Verse, Dramas, and especially by frequent use of the conversational style, with numerous blanks for proper inflection. Hence results here is, "Each pupils, at the very beginning, not Rules, but correct Habits of reading." Superior illustrative engravings are made the subjects of most of the primary lessons; and the principle is constantly kept in view, that in childhood it is through the medium of the Eye cognize faculties that the attention is the most readily awakened, and memory and judgment the most successfully cultivated.

The Series will be a Choice Library in itself, which every family should possess. Though especially designed for Schools, its utility will not be confined to them.

Notwithstanding the ENORMOUS EXPENSE incurred in getting up these books, THEY WILL BE FURNISHED AS CHEAP AS OTHER READERS.

For Terms of First Introduction into Schools, and Agencies, address HARPER & BROTHERS, or MARCIUS WILLSON, to their care.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $3 50 A YEAR.

The First Number of the Fourth Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY appeared with the 4th January, 1860, and from over 4,000,000 Numbers of HARPER'S WEEKLY were sold, nearly half of which have been issued for reprints. In commencing the new volume, the proprietors desire to state that it has been their aim to render HARPER'S WEEKLY, in the first place, and before any thing else, a STRICTLY CLASS NEWSPAPER, a pictorial history of every current event, equal to the daily press in fullness of description, and superior to that daily press in the combining illustrations with text. How far they have attained their aim, the three hundred thousand readers will show. The Illustrations in the Third Volume will bear evidence to the fidelity with which every important event of the globe, and men related and illustrated in the pages of HARPER'S WEEKLY. They would allude, especially, in this connection, to The Italian War, the Great Eastern Steamship, the Harpers' Ferry Outbreak, the Japan Expedition, the Paraguay Expedition, China, etc., etc. The value of the paper can be best realized by supposing that all these things and by trying to conceive how little people would really know of passing events if they had to rely on the ordinary descriptions alone. In this respect, the arrangements for the coming year will be more complete than they have been heretofore. HARPER'S WEEKLY has regular artist correspondents in every quarter of the globe, and commands the pencil of the first artists at home. It will, moreover, be always present its readers with a complete illustrated history of our age, continue to transfer to its pages the best and most generally interesting pictures from foreign illustrated journals. In a word, the subscriber to HARPER'S WEEKLY may feel sure that in the pages next year an accurate, well-drawn, well-engraved, and faithful picture of whatever is interesting to each will occur, and a portrait of every man who attracts the general attention of the people of this entire land.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue, as heretofore, to publish the best tales and sketches that can be had of our foreign authors. It has already published a Tale of Two Cities, by CHARLES DICKENS (with original illustrations drawn for HARPER'S WEEKLY); What will he do with it? by Sir E. LYTTON BULWER; Lady Audley's Secret, by MISS WILKIE COLLINS; Lois the Witch, by MRS. GASKELL; A Good Fight, by JOHN CASTLE; and Tempest and Sunshine, by MRS. WILLIAM CURTIS; it is now publishing The Uncommercial Traveller, by CHARLES DICKENS; My Lady Ludlow, by MRS. GASKELL; The Woman in White, by WILKIE COLLINS; The New Forest, by Orphans & Co., by JAMES HAIN FRISWELL; by TOM HOOD, LEDRU, both of which are illustrated by MRS. WILLIAM CURTIS, and The Mistletoe Bough, by MRS. PAYNE, by ELLA ROSMAR, illustrated by WINSLOW HOMER. By the close of the year the conclusion of these tales will be effected, and others will be commenced. It being the intention of the publishers to issue every week a tale of permanent excellence that is written here or abroad. It is hardly necessary to add that while the foreign serials appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY are purchased from their authors by the publishers of HARPER'S WEEKLY, who, in many instances, give for a mere right of priority what amounts to a handsome sum of money to the author.

In addition to serials, each number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will contain a complete tale by a writer of fiction, by the publishers of HARPER'S WEEKLY, as with the serials, the publishers will pay for the tale what they can obtain, without regarding their reputation.

The other specialties of HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue to receive careful attention at the hands of the publishers.

CHARLES DICKENS'S NEW SERIAL.

WE publish in this number the Second Journey of "THE UNCOMMERCIAL TRAVELER"—being a Report, by CHARLES DICKENS, on the Work-house of Wapping. We need hardly add that it is intensely thrilling and affecting. This new series fully sustains Mr. Dickens's world-wide popularity.

We continue in this number our serials, to wit:

1. THE WOMAN IN WHITE, by WILKIE COLLINS, with MCLENAN'S illustrations—commenced in No. 152.

2. THE NEW PARTNER IN CLINGHAM & CO., an exquisite Story of American Life, by FITZ HUGH LUDLOW, with illustrations by MCLENAN—commenced in No. 159.

3. THE MISTRESS OF THE PARSONAGE, by ELLA RODMAN—another charming Tale of Life in the country in the United States—with HOMER'S illustrations—commenced in No. 164.

We can supply back numbers on receipt of the money.

A NIGHT ON THE ICE—THE ESCAPE FROM DEATH.

A NIGHT ON THE ICE.

WE had been to a picnic, in the Canadian backwoods, some six or seven miles beyond the Tircouagn, and were returning home in two light one-horse sleighs, the first containing Mr. Norton and his elder daughter, the second her sister and myself. The night was calm and beautiful in its dim snow-light, and the red glow of the northern streamers above our heads flashed and leaped and quivered in a thousand brilliant corusecations; while strangely and sweetly through the gray old woods sounded the clear girlish voices of the sisters, as from the different sleighs they sang in alternate stanzas one of the quaint old ballads of the Middle Ages. At length we reached the banks of the Tircouagn, which lay between us and our home, a mirror of ice, and we at once commenced its passage. As we swept quickly on, it seemed to me that some other sound mingled with the firm footfalls of the horses, and the chime of their bells—a low threatening murmur like the echo of a distant tempest. But Mr. Norton drove gayly on, as if he either heard it not, or thought nothing of it, and I dismissed it from my mind, until as we drew near the centre of the river, strange dark spots, like cloud-shadows, began to flick its gleaming surface.

The next instant one appeared right on Mr. Norton's path, and too close for him to avoid. With a long leap the horse bounded over it, and as the sleigh was drawn quickly after, there was a plash that told it had struck against water. I could see Mr. Norton spring hurriedly up.

"Back, back, for your lives!" he cried to us; "the ice is breaking up!"

I turned to follow his directions, but it was too late—two or three such spots lay between us and the bank. I looked around; but they were rapidly appearing on every side; and then I remembered to have heard that the ice of the Tircouga was treacherous at the appearance of hot springs in the bed of the river, which at times burst forth; and that particularly in the early part of the winter the mercury in the tube was five degrees below zero, of which before evening not a trace would remain.

Perceiving how matters were, Mr. Norton bade us follow him, and quickly, for that not a moment was to be lost; and then dashed off at a rapid pace for the opposite bank, leaping the chasms, and spreding lightly on over the frozen portions, as if he hoped by swiftness to diminish the danger; and with the same breathless speed we hastened on in his rear.

Meanwhile, larger and more numerous grew those dark blue spaces, and longer and more frequent our horses' leaps. At length there came a chasm none could not venture. I looked eagerly round for some more favorable spot; but as my eye glanced onward, it fell on constantly-widening water, until it had gone the circuit, and, with a sensation of surprise and horror, I perceived that we stood upon an ice island, from which the main, rounding its way, rapidly returning. I looked after Mr. Norton; but, unsuspicious of what had happened, he was still making his way with accelerated speed over the ice: so I felt we were left to our own efforts for escape, and my utter inexperience rendered the chances few indeed, unless we could again draw near enough to the main ice to leap the space between; and none can tell how anxiously I watched each movement of our raft as it began to yield to the influence of the current. But each fathom that we were swept down the river seemed to bear us a greater distance from its icy fetters, and we soon found ourselves floating on a comparatively open space of water, and surrounded by numerous islands.

I could almost have echoed poor Annie's cry of agony when the certainty of our position burst upon her, so fearful it is. Alone at midnight, on a fragment of ice, floating down a rapid river whose future course I knew not, while on each side stretched tracts of trembling ice, and beyond them rose banks of inaccessible steepness! What could exceed the dreariness of such a position, and the hope could it leave to us of life? While, to complete our misery, we had not even the power to struggle against our fate, but must passively await its coming.

How deeply I pitied my young companion, as she sat there weeping such bitter tears. It was hard for her to part with life, after sixteen years of such bright and joyous experience as hers had been; hard to lay it down thus suddenly and mysteriously, absent from all she loved, and yet harder the unresolvable fears for her father's and sister's safety which our own danger had awakened. I tried to utter words of consolation as I wrapped the poor girl in the buffalo robes from the sleigh, right and left our position rendered doubly cold. She looked a sad contrast to the bright creature of the last few hours, whose joyous ballad-notes were yet lingering in my ears. But when the first shock was over, poor Annie struggled bravely with her grief, and during the remainder of that long dreary night of peril she sat calmly by my side, the most patient and resigned companion man ever had in danger.

Meanwhile, the river was bearing us swiftly on past rocky headlands, and dark pine forests, waving above their edge, on to yet wilder and grander regions, where it seemed even the red man would scarce pitch his wigwam. Sometimes the river swept us smoothly along on its broad bosom, at others it contracted into narrower limits, and hurried on with a quicker current; and as our frail raft was swept about by the broken waves, we ofttimes thought either that it would part, or we be swept from its watery surface, while every hour and then our poor horse beat the ice wildly with his hoof, and, as he recognized its unsoundness, his low plaintive cries of distress rent piercingly far and wide over the river, and quivered through the dismal woods beyond.

Day at last broke upon us, still floating down that lonely river, between its frowning banks, and on our raft, whose limits were now small indeed. Death seemed close upon us in one of his most repulsive forms, and we no longer pretended blindness to his coming, but spoke together as they should where fear was at hand.

Suddenly the river took an abrupt bend, and, aided by the waters of another river, which here fell into it, spread almost to the dimensions of a lake; but still it was bordered by those monotonous, wild-like banks, shutting out every hope. At length we sighted something like a chasm dividing the cliff down to the water's edge. I sprang to my feet in a moment. Here was at least a chance of life—the first that during all those wretched hours had presented itself—and I resolved at once to profit by it.

Without a moment's delay the horse was cast loose from the shafts, and Annie was tied securely to his back, then with a few words of encouragement and hope to the poor young girl, doomed to so many hardships and dangers, I took the halter in my hand, and sending the horse into the water, leaped in myself, and then commenced swimming to the shore.

But the struggle was a long and arduous one, for we were more than a mile from the land, and both the horse and I were cramped and stiffened with cold. Many a time I thought the effort was in vain, and that neither the horse nor I would ever reach the shore, that to my weariness seemed to recede as we advanced. Moreover, the current pressed strongly against us, striving to sweep us down beyond our goal, against the steep rocky barrier that lined the water. Fortunately the hot springs had raised the temperature of the water, for poor Annie's girlish form was almost hidden in it, as the waves lightly surged around her, sometimes even sweeping above her head. But the young girl's courage rose with the occasion, and she bore without complaint the last phase of suffering.

But they strive hard whose prize is life, and after more than an hour of hope, and doubt, and fear, we reached the land we had never hoped to tread again. As we emerged from the water the wintry wind pierced through our saturated clothing, with an icy chill that threatened to freeze them on us. Providentially, however, God, we found a settler's house near at hand, where we obtained dry clothes, refreshment, and the loan of a horse and sleigh, in which we speedily soon speeding along the road to Tircouga. As we proceeded, fresh fears for her father's and sister's fate assailed poor Annie, which were only set at rest when she found herself in their arms.

THE LOSS OF THE STEAMSHIP "HUNGARIAN."

WE publish on the preceding page a picture of the wreck of the steamship Hungarian, which was lost on the morning of February 20, on Sable Island, Nova Scotia. At the time of writing very few particulars of this terrible catastrophe have come to hand, but the Halifax Citizen dated 21st, said:

"The large steamship ashore on the west side of Cape Sable is the steamship Hungarian, which sailed from Queenstown on the 9th inst. for Portland.

She is a total wreck, and all her crew and passengers are supposed to be lost.

A small portion of her hull is now visible at low water.

Nothing like the news dispatched for the Associated Press can be learned, but it is thought it may be in the mail, a small portion of which has been saved in a damaged state.

One passenger ticket has been found with the name of Ellen Sheehan upon it.

The following has been sent from Cape Sable to Messrs. Cunard & Co.:

"A steamer's lights were seen on Monday morning at three o'clock; at daybreak the spars and rigging were seen standing, and at 10 A.M. all had gone by the board. Then the ship settled fast. A heavy sea was running, breaking mast high over the ship. Communication with the ship was impossible All on board must have been lost, unless the boats left the ship before daylight, which is not likely. At low water part of the ship is still visible."

The Hungarian left Liverpool on Wednesday, the 8th inst., under command of Captain Jones, and touched at Queenstown, Ireland, as customary with the vessels of the Cunard company, the next afternoon (Thursday, the 9th ult.) for Portland.

The Hungarian was on this occasion on her third voyage from Liverpool to Portland, her preceding trips having been accomplished in good time, and under very favorable auspices.

Other dispatches, dated 24th, say:

A dispatch from Ragged Island, 24th, to the Postmaster General's office, says the supplementary mail bags for Canada and New York have been picked up, and are in safety, out in a very damaged state, and are awaiting orders. Postmaster General Woodgate has ordered the mails to be brought to Halifax to be arranged, as the bags are burst and the letters torn.

The following is the latest news from the scene of the wreck:

BARINGTON, Feb. 24—9 P.M.

Thomas Nickerson informs me that, on Monday morning at three o'clock, he saw the main lights of a steamer's light. It was stationary for some time, and he supposed a ship had struck on the Horse Race, about two miles off the Cape. He was then seen to move. At daylight a large steamer was seen ashore, with one mast standing. He thinks he saw men on it when it first struck, which was soon after daylight.

A report has reached me that the steward's pocket-book has been picked up, having some passengers' names or extras. I will inquire into it and report.

On Wednesday the body of one small child was found, and yesterday that of one man, supposed to be a fireman. The Coroner is attending to them.

Portions of the mail and cargo are being yet picked up.

COMMERCIAL LEGISLATION.

LANE, the man who cheated the Fulton Bank of several thousand dollars, which he spent on fast women, horses, and other forms of dissipation, has been convicted, and will be sent to Sing Sing. No one will pity a fellow who was equally infamous as a confidential servant, as a husband, and as a son; who, not content with robbing his employers, reduced his old father to beggary, and deliberately involved his wife, family, and friends in ruin and disgrace.

But it is a mercy he has been convicted. Eminent counsel, before the trial, gravely doubted whether he had committed any offense of which the law could take cognizance. Our commercial code is so imperfect that it is a mere chance that he was caught in the net. He very nearly escaped. Indeed, such is the laxity, and such the omissions in the penal statutes against commercial frauds, that a man may cheat and steal to a hundred times Lane's amount without running any grave danger. Schuyler, it is said, might have returned to New York in safety; under our present law he could not have been punished. A man walks the streets, rules political meetings, and fills offices of honor in the State who, a few years ago, deliberately robbed Wall Street brokers of nearly a hundred thousand dollars, yet was held to have committed no penal offense. Peter Funk sells brass watches every day to Provincial mechanics, and the law can do no more than compel him to refund the stolen money when his victim has the nerve and the means to prosecute. The other day a rascal was taken before the Mayor for robbing a stranger by selling him a spurious ticket for a passage on board an Atlantic steamer; he was told to refund the money; he refused, and was about to be taken to prison when he suddenly recollected himself, and observing, "I can't afford to be locked up the day the California steamer sails," reluctantly disgorged, and was liberated. In plain words, he consented to forego the fruits of one robbery for the prospect of half a dozen others.

They order these matters better in England. There, for many years, the commercial code has been ceaselessly improved year by year as new statutes being passed to meet every new form of roguery devised by the increasing ingenuity of rascalism, or suggested by the development of commerce. The consequence is, that in London, where rogues abound, the rogue who is punished is the rule, and the rogue who escapes the exception. It is high time that we took a lesson from our neighbors over the water in this respect. Our commercial laws are entirely inadequate to cope with the modern forms of fraud. Who will undertake to revise them?

DELIBERATE MURDER.

THE spread of diseases of the throat has latterly attracted much attention. Deaths from throat diseases, especially that form of them known as diphtheria, are much more frequent than they used to be, especially in towns. Various causes have been assigned for the appearance of diphtheria as an epidemic; few of them, however, are to be compared with the facts. The climate is not more severe than it used to be. Latterly the clothing of women and children has been rather lighter than it was half a dozen years since; the faculty and the press have inveighed so loudly against thin shoes and unsubstantial coverings for the body that a better style of dress has been generally adopted. The only good reason that has been given for the surprising development of throat disease in these days is the habit—more common in most of our large cities—of hastening the melting of the snow in the streets by mixing it with salt. In New York, Philadelphia, and elsewhere, during every snow-storm, the streets are plentifully salted by the omnibus proprietors, whose profits are diminished during the sleighing season.

The consequence of this is the conversion of the snow into what an eminent surgeon styles a sort of ice-cream—intensely cold, and so penetrating that it chills every thoroughfare without boot. The air, too, is impregnated with a saline vapor most trying to the air-passages. Thus during the saline season, every pedestrian in the large cities is sure to have wet feet, and to breathe an atmosphere as irritating to the throat as the fumes of poisonous fluid or noxious gases. Why should we look any further for the causes of the throat epidemics which are ravaging the country?

Salting the streets, we believe, contrary to law. Yet the omnibus proprietors continue to scatter their salt as though the laws were waste paper, and there were no one to account in comparison with sixpences.

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

For Harper's Weekly.

At a meeting of ladies—the wives, sisters, and daughters of Masons in attendance upon the National Masonic Convention at Chicago—in September, 1859, in the ladies' parlor of the Richmond House, on the 14th of that month, it was resolved to form a society to raise funds for the completion of the Washington Monument, now in progress of erection in the city of Washington. The following States—Connecticut, New York, Virginia, Tennessee, Louisiana, Texas, Missouri, Mississippi, South Carolina, Michigan, and Illinois—were represented.

A constitution for the government of the society, and an address to the people of the United States was adopted, and Mrs. Finlay M. King, of Port Byron, New York, was chosen President, and Mrs. Anna M. Cosby, of Washington City, Secretary.

The names of the Vice-Presidents for the different States of the Union will be furnished for publication when the list is completed, and answers have been received to all the letters of appointment to that office.

The Constitution, Address, and By-laws are in the possession of the Secretary for publication and distribution, as soon as the preliminary arrangements for a complete organization in the several States of the Union are concluded, which, it is confidently believed, will be in a very short time.

MRS. ANNA M. COSBY,
Secretary of the Ladies' Washington National Monument Society.

THE LOUNGER.

EDITORIAL.

THE trials of a magazine editor have not been sufficiently considered by the public. But they are very many and severe; the chief of all being the necessity of refusing the contributions of his friends. Often enough he may unjustly refuse them. Man is mortal, and editors are but men. But the secret of such a refusal is his friendship; for the editor suspects himself of partiality, and the sonnet that would be a good enough sonnet if it were Jones's, unknown to the editor, is condemned because it is Jenkins's, his lesson friend.

Besides, let all friends of the editor consider what his position really is. He is a captain of a ship, which he sails not for his own pleasure, but for the profit of the owners and his own honor and emolument. He can not give away passages. He can not stop and have a game at Acrambo when he is heading for Ceylon. He may infinitely prefer to please his friend by taking a glass, but it is understood that what he is commanded to build not drink. The editor is that captain. He is sailing a ship which labors to other people, and his port is public favor. It is his duty to avoid, with much prosperous voyage—that is, the best and most salable magazine he can; of course, if he can do it without prostitution of his mind or character, he will throw up his command. But it is no prostitution of his power, it is only a pain in his feelings, to say, "Friend, I can not take you, for I have no right to indulge my private partiality at the expense of the owners. I would gladly take you, to gratify my friendship, but I have no right to make other people lose for my gratification."

Apollidore sends his last poem in ten mortal cantos; "good for ten months," he says kindly in his note. It is not very good. It would sink the magazine. What shall the editor do? What can he do? What ought he to do?

Now if he does it, how harshly Apollidorus will feel toward that editor! How he will criticise the poetry that does appear! How grieved and hurt and mortified will be! And, if the disappointed Apollidorus, the editor is not there to please himself altogether, nor you, but the average public taste. Therefore, what ought he to do in the magazine, because he knows what people like; his people, the readers of his magazine. Perhaps he may think they could like your poetry. Then, confidently the world owes you as much as that. But if it won't pay? That is always the rub. If people won't like your poetry, and won't pay for it, and think it a bore, and swear at it (for the world is remarkably profane when poetry it does not like), why should you make the editor your scapegrace? Do you suppose he has not vexation of soul enough already?

Remember that every month, or every week, he has to prepare a feast, the same yet different. He must have a variety, neither too short nor too long, nor too monotonous, nor too much "to be continued." He must have poetry, and humor, and politics, and fiction, and adventure. And he must have all these in such combinations, and of such quality, as he can not explain nor describe, but which he recognizes instinctively. And after answer he can make is, "Respectfully declined." If you insist upon knowing why, he can merely reply, "Because it is not magazine stuff. If you say, 'I don't know what that is.'" He must answer, "I do." And must not explain it. And if you are the poet and the gentleman he believes you to be, you will not scowl, and say that really you had supposed your poem was as good as Milton's, generally published, but you will shake his hand heartily, and say, "Never mind, my dear fellow, I forgive, pity, and thank you."

THE ARCTIC PROBLEM.

CAPTAIN MCCLINTOCK'S book, Captain Osborne's article in Once a Week, and now by an Arctic officer in the first number of the Cornhill Magazine, and a brief and luminous resumé of the history of Arctic adventure from Captain Lyon's time in Harper's Monthly for March, bring down the records of polar exploration to the latest moment —the discovery of the fate of Sir John Franklin and his ships and some of his men. Dr. Hayes, now in will be the last the company of Kane in his last voyage, has also just issued a narrative of an over-ice journey to communicate with a civilized settlement in Greenland; and Doctor proposes to head another expedition to complete surveys, and, if possible, discover what yet remains as a full knowledge of the fate of Sir Franklin expedition; perhaps also—who knows?—to sail into the Polar Sea, where Kane and his companions fancied the ships of Franklin might yet be drifting.

The fascination of such a search and of the Arctic life in general, has been manifested during the last hundred years, especially, by the incessant departure of ships for the North, and by the wild, eager interest with which the world hungers on the story of the voyage. The expeditions of Parry and Ross, of Buch and Franklin and Richardson—the detail of strange life among the strange northern people —the description of the irresistible might of inclenate nature, so to speak, have a charm like that of the "Arabian Nights." Who was ever tired of it? It is the very reverse of fairy land, and yet as interesting. Of late years we have had no more who was so popularly a hero as Dr. Kane. One evening, after his first voyage, when he lectured in the old Tabernacle, the building was crowded by a throng who stared at him with curious wonder, as if he had been the Calif Haroun al Raschid.

And yet to how many—certainly to the Lancers who writes these lines—the whole Arctic world was confused as that same fairy land, or the England of Mr. Arthur, where certain names that had a kind of clear, polar music in them, but no meaning of locality. "Lancaster Sound," "Prince Regent's Inlet," "King William's Land," "Melville Bay," were names as familiar as Camelot and Caerleon, but as exquisitely vague. Somewhere M'Clintock has cleared them up, and given them a permanent place in memory as they have a fixed one upon the map. Undoubtedly it is not because the other writers are not clear enough if you study them with a map, but that for the first time the Lancers read carefully with the map in their hair. The style of M'Clintock also is so simple and clear that the dullest of Loungers can easily follow him as he goes with a perfectly local idea of the situation of Franklin's party when their ships were finally lost and their fatal retreat began. How gladly one thinks that the intuitive sense of a woman secured the knowledge of the explorer's fate! Captain M'Clintock, indeed, the loyal friend both of Lady Franklin and her husband, declares, and Sir Roderick Murchison confirms it in his preface, that Franklin was really the discoverer of the Northwest Passage, and that had he only taken a course to the east instead of the west of King William's Land, he might have sailed through to Behring's Straits; for there was no land, there was only ice between the spot in which the Erebus and Terror were lost, and a point which had been reached by ships from the west.

If he were a discoverer, then, he was an unconscious one. And in an effort in which success is essential to fame. The great moral of the Arctic exploration is this, that as man was sent into the world to subdue it, and subdue it, so there is no obstacle that he will not overcome in subduing it.

SPIRITS.

The Rev. Mr. Harris, who has been long what is called a "Spiritualist," is reported to have recently deserted his body of believers, or rather to have declared that he has no faith in the goodness or intelligence of such spirits as he has been in the habit of dealing with.

Now there seems to be no reason for calling those whose faith in spiritual things would seem to rest upon mere material phenomena "Spiritualists." That name, certainly, one would say, should be reserved for those who believe without assistance from sight or touch.

Yet every man must confess that a seer or a shrug does not dispose of that singular tendency of the world to mistake things which lingers in tradition from age to age, and constantly reappears in literature. In the work of Robert Dale Owen, "Footfalls on the Boundary of another World"—is the latest collection of this curious evidence, stated in a most remarkable spirit. It has the transparent credulity of old Increase Mather, in his "Remarkable Providences;" but it has one fault which, however, which have been explained in so judicious a work of the kind. There is no mention made of the incidents, equally remarkable with those given, which have been explained by purely natural and intelligible causes, thereby creating an analogical inference in regard to these which are not so explained.

A few weeks since a party of Loungers were discussing the subject in a class, when one of them read from old Mather's "Providences" the case of the Newburyport family who suffered so sadly from devilish imperfections, until one day a voice came from sea, and after witnessing the diabolical phenomena said that he thought, if he could have his ears bored, and a young boy who shared the afflicted family, there would be a cessation of the dreadful phenomena. So for a day he reasoned with Satan, locked in the youth. In fact he knew Satan a good deal better than he sent, in the shape of thwacks and flagellations, and the happy result was an end of the infernal antics. Mather took the whole story as seriously as if it really were the devil, and not the boy, who had afflicted the family.

There is a vast collection of ghost stories, of traditions of supernatural appearances, of inexplicable sounds, &c., which can hardly be dismissed as old women's fables and nursery tales. No man can tell when, or why, or where we strike suddenly upon the line that separates the visible from the invisible, and what we call natural from the preternatural. The whole distinction would be, would and unusual. We make our human experiences the standard of nature, whereas nature is the divine method. But such a faith in spiritual things should be developed or chiefly cultivated by the extraordinary phenomena, and not by the ordinary processes of nature, is likely to be as uncertain in duration as it is questionable in quality. Men differ in their susceptibility and organization: but as a man who is persuaded of immortality by three knocks upon the floor, is certainly no more distinctively a "Spiritualist" than he who has never heard them, and to whose mind the song of every bird and the beauty of every flower certifies it.

THE NEW PRIMA DONNA.

"Collegian" writes enthusiastically of the young singer of whom the Lounger spoke several weeks since. "Collegian" is probably a Boston boy, for she has lately been in Boston. He says he wants first to know how to pronounce her name. "Dear Lounger," he writes, "spare me! They say that it rhymes with fatty, as all the people here make it." That, again, suggests a doubt whether he be from Boston, because the Italian language is probably pronounced in its purity in that city, and every Bostonian knows that the true pronunciation is Fah-tée.

Here in New York the managers call her in the cards "Miss Patti," because she is an American prima donna, you know. By the reverse operation of the same law, probably, that capital singer, Mr. Drayton, is Henri. It is a curious inquiry, from this point of view, whether we were baptized Henry or Henri. It doesn't make the slightest of an iota either way; and yet there is a widely-diffused superstition to the contrary. Some years since there was an excellent lady who taught singing, and whose advertisements announced Madame Valentini. We have no reason to doubt that she is still living somewhere, and, we sincerely hope, prosperously: but we should like to know whether she is not called Mrs. Valley. We have no reason to suppose so—except that of analogy.

Some years ago, also, there was a début of Mrs. Simson. She was studied to be—Simonson, to whom had she not studied? She had letters of compliment from— Well, from the most illustrious people, and from Jenny Lind—it was evidently Mrs. Sutton; you saw it at a glance—she did not cooper exactly; and since every body did—That last was the fatal word. If she had only thought to call herself something ending with a vowel! Dear me! dear me! It is always the slight, lazy final consonant that chokes, as it were, the success of all singers who are not born Italians!"

So few a great deal more than it used to be, attached to that final consonant, as we have sometimes hinted. In the present c.. se little Patti is successful because she has a wonderful voice, the admirable method, the suavità of youth. If she had a poor voice, or sang badly, or was perfectly unintelligent, all the vowels in the alphabet would not save her. And when managers have discovered that what is wanted is not a long semi-Italian advertisement but a sweet singing, we shall have an Opera; but not until then.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A DESERVEDLY verdant-looking individual called upon a lawyer in Montreal, and asked if the latter's services were accessible, by hard labor for the few past years, some seventy-five dollars would be found in his pocket, and upon whereby he might make money a little faster; and he had understood to take some of his stock and profit with him. The jeweler selected what he thought would sell readily, and the new partner left the store. In the course of but a few days when he returned, bought a new gold watch, and ordered a large extra supply of stock, returned and greatly increased his stock. He succeeded so well, and prospered to such a degree that one day he asked him how much profit he obtained on the value of his stock.

"Why, I put on 'bout 5 per cent."

The jeweler thought that a very small profit, and exclaimed, with surprise:

"Well, I says he, puddles, I don't know as I exactly understood about your per cent; but an article for which I pay you one dollar I rarely sell for less."

A new Sunday-school has been established in a neighboring town on the Troy and Boston Railroad, and the other day the superintendent gave out the instructions to hang out the red flag whenever there were enough scholars present. The boys soon came pouring in, next morning the engineer saw the flag out, and stopped. He scanned looking and found no scholars, but on the car but the agent, asked him if there were any passengers to get, and was answered with an honest "No."

"Then why did you stop the train?" said the conductor.

"Why," exclaimed the agent, "I thought somebody had a wash to get off."

That agent was immediately promoted to a professorship in a Sunday-school.

Two sons of green Erin were standing by a hydraulic press superintended by a friend of mine, when one called out to the other:

"Jim, I'd like to put ye under and squeeze the divil out o' ye."

"Would, ye indade, my boy?" was the answer, "supposin' the divil out of you an' there'd be nothin' left!"

I remember asking an irreverent brother of mine some years ago if he could tell me where the exact spot on my vest. After rubbing it, and smelling it, and examining it in all lights, he had the unfeeling conclusion—

"Well, I declare, Buck, I believe it's a clean spot!"

"I'll give that fellow a piece of my mind!" exclaimed a sour-tempered lady in New Orleans, the other day.

"I wouldn't," replied her uncle, "you've none to spare."

A waggish citizen of Stonington, Connecticut, went into a Boston store some years since to buy a carpet. Having got his taste he asked the price.

"Two dollars and five cents."

"I'll take it at that rate."

"No, I couldn't sell that carpet for two dollars and five cents."

"Oh! well, I won't chaffer."

And then he went to the car citizen returned to the pedlar.

"I suppose you would sell on credit with good security?"

"Certainly."

"Six months?"

"Yes."

Then another random talk, and the subject came up again.

"Of course you make the usual discount if one takes up his purchase at once?"

"Of course."

"Well, then figure up my discount and I'll take the goods."

SHOPKEEPER (after exploring a moment). "Zounds! I'm selling my carpet for two dollars after all!"

The clerk—

"An old gentleman, long a resident of this city," writes a Western correspondent, "though now gone to that bourne from whence no traveler returns, was noted for his dry humor, and not, any manner of expressing himself. One fall, a year or so ago, he purchased a barrel of what purported to be cider, though really so dilute as hardly to taste like the beverage. The old gentleman remarked that the cider was well watered, which upon in one case came to be literally the case. He waxed very wroth, and, on meeting his customer, said:

"Mr. A——, I understood you had sold me a barrel of cider that had water in it."

"Yes, sir," was the reply, "I only sold you cold me a barrel of water with a little cider in it."

PENCTUALITY.—Dr. Kitchener, whose name fully bore out his derivation, was remarkable for his pigeon himself upon his punctuality, and was in the habit of having the following motto hung over his study door: "Come at seven, go at eleven." Theodore Hook, who always liked to get into what he called the short hours, added the word "it" to the above, and great was the surprise of the doctor when he came to be found that, by the alteration, the notice read as follows: "Come at seven, and go it at eleven."

An Englishman dining in a Chinese village was greatly enjoying a savory dish, and would have expressed his pleasure to the host in Chinese, understood nothing of English, nor could our friend utter a word of Chinese. The smacking of lips and other gestures of the kind caused the question, ingeniously put. Pointing at the portion of meat on his plate which he supposed to be duck, the Englishman, with an inquiring look, said, "Quack, quack?" The host, with a grave, gravely shaking his head, as much as to say "No," replied, "Bow, wow, wow!"

"How to Raise the Wind."—A number of drastic measures (says the Versailles Record) having drunk themselves completely out of the Emperor's head their "heads" should soon come to an end, yet their brains setzep know to raise the wind. The former constitution one of them, with characteristic slowness and a great amount of originality, has invented a lottery. It is "all the rage." While the rack was being sought for all eyes were fixed upon it. The rack was brought, and he immediately set about getting into it. After some bustling and considerable trouble, which the whole assembly, he was got up to the neck in it. This done, he, poking out his head, grave to the following answer, "Now, I'll be off hanse, and you'll tell me for as much as ye can get." A sum was at once made up, and the prisoner was let out, and just slowly apprehending Thomas's meaning, he said it was "a splendid novelty of ingenious Loyalist, who invented Javelin's novelty.
